One of the Japanese industries which seems likely to receive a great impetus from the new tariff is the manufacture of condensed milk. Attempts have already been made to push this enterprise in Japan, and it is claimed they they would have succeeded if the duty (5 per cent.) on the imported article had not been so small, and if Formosan sugar had been obtainable on easier terms. When the new tariff goes into operation, foreign condensed milk will have to pay a duty of 20 per cent., and the difficulty about sugar will be largely overcome. Therefore the question of technical ability alone has to be considered, and the Japanese claim that there is no difficulty on that score. The amount of condensed milk imported at present represents about 3 million yen annually, and is rapidly on the increase.

We read in the Asahi Shimbun that the enterprise of the Mitsui firm at Tomakomai in Hokkaido has not proved financially successful. The idea was to manufacture paper with materials obtainable on the spot. Technical difficulties interfered at first, and a United States expert, Mr. Wordsworth, was engaged as assistant. Excellent paper was then obtained, but the trouble was that its quality and the expense of production exceeded the original estimate. The Mitsui had entered into an agreement with the Oji, the Fuji and other firms to sell paper at a uniform rate, but if the Tomakomai product be disposed of at that figure, a loss will result. Thus an embarrassing situation has resulted, and a sum 4,700,000 yen invested by the Mitsui for the enterprise remains unfruitful for the time being.

Japanese newspapers state that the Rising Sun Oil Company, which is under English direction, will make no attempt to invade the sphere of Japanese industry. But the Standard has no such scruples. It sets no limit to its transactions, and it will employ its resources wherever opportunity offers. Our readers are aware that an attempt was recently made to establish a trust which should include the Japanese, the English and the American producers. The above remarks are suggested by the failure of that attempt. It is predicted that next month will see the announcement of keen competition between the standard and the Japanese companies, namely the Hoden and the Nippon, and that the latter two will be seriously affected.

On the 15th instant the ceremony of opening a Japanese elementary school took place at Port Arthur. Marquis Katsura is the patron of this institution and an address of congratulation from him was read. It appears that the opening of the school is by no means premature, for already no less than 200 lads are borne on the list of students.

It is announced that Viscount Sone's funeral will leave his Tokyo residence in Sakurada machi at 1 p.m. on the 19th inst. and will proceed to the cemetery at Aoyama. Two Korean high officials are coming expressly from Seoul to attend the ceremony.

Some alarm seems to have been created by the fact that the foundations of the Prince Imperial's new Palace have sunk three inches. The building covers 2,000 tsubo, and was commenced in 1898 and finished in 1907. On consulting the experts, however, an assurance has been obtained that the uniform sinking of such a building to the extent of three, four or even five inches, is a common occurrence. Other large buildings in Tokyo have shown a similar result, and so long as the settling is uniform no reason whatever exists for uneasiness.

According to returns compiled by the Bank of Japan there was an appreciation of 1.16 per-cent. in the average price of commodities during August as compared with July. Out of 56 staples, 21 appreciated, 15 depreciated and 20 remain stationary.

The Official Gazette announces that Captain Sir Douglas E. R. Brownrigg has been appointed British Naval Attaché in Japan in succession to Rear-Admiral Dundas of Dundas.

The Centenary of Mexican Independence was celebrated at the Mexican Legation in Nagata-cho, Tokyo, from 10 a.m. on the 16th inst., and in the evening the Minister Plenipotentiary gave a banquet at which Marquis Katsura, the other Japanese Ministers of State and the Foreign Chefs de Mission were present.

The two ships forming the Training Squadron, namely, the Asama and the Kasagi, returned to Yokosuka at 9 a.m. on the 16th inst. They had been to China, Chosen and the home coast. It is stated that one month hence they will start on a voyage to distant seas.

There is another scheme on the tapis for providing Tokyo with a harbour. Associated with it are the names of Mr. Asano and Mr. Yasuda Zenjirō. The idea is to dig a big canal from Haneda to Shiba Rikyu, and to reclaim a large tract of land at Shinagawa and at Ōmori with the dredgings. The calculation is that the entire work will cost 15 million yen, and a 99 years' charter is asked for. The tonnage dues charged would be 10 sen per ton and the reclaimed land is put at 6 million tsuba, an apparently excessive figure.

The Official gazette announces that a ticker has been set up in the Department of Communications. It is called Dōhō Denshin, which signifies (simultaneous telegraph) and it will come into operation from the 21st instant, when all the operations on the Tokyo Stock Exchange will manifest themselves immediately on the face of the ticker. The number of brokers to whom this information will be accessible is about 80.

The scene witnessed in the share market on the 10th instant had no parallel since the year of panic in 1907. Speculators seemed to have entirely lost their heads and the Katsura Cabinet, which until recently was blessed for its efforts to reduce the rate of interest, came in for nothing but abuse when people found the market turning against them. The curious point is that every one acknowledges the weather to be primarily responsible for the débâcle, yet, people seem disposed to hold the Katsura Cabinet responsible, as though political wisdom should be able to provide against natural calamities.

It appears that the total losses incurred by the Fuji Gassed Spinning Company owing to the recent floods were 470,000 yen and its working profits for the half year aggregate 300,000. The Managing Director, Mr. Hibiya, insists that the proper course is to devote the whole of the working profits to meet the expense of reparations, supplementing that sum with 170,000 yen from the reserves, which will then stand at 1,690,000 yen. This plan entails the non-payment of any dividend for the half year, and it is feared that the shareholders may object to that course.

There are no less than nine Sugar refining companies which are about either to install new machinery or to supplement their old. Thus great competition exists among firms acting as agents for machine-builders. Japanese journals speak of competition extending to the United States of America, to England and to Germany, but in the list of agents given by them we do not find any American representative. Three firms are acting for English manufacturers. They are Messrs. Okura & Co., Messrs. Yonei & Co., and Messrs. Samuel Samuel & Co., (whoses agents are the Mitsui). Two agents are acting for Germany, namely, Messrs. Sasuga & Co., and Messrs. Takata & Co. The last named firm is said to have already obtained an order amounting to about 820,000 yen. Of course there is talk of bribery and corruption. One firm, the Hokko, is said to have sent representatives to Europe to inspect the machinery in site, with the result that a combination of British and German methods were adopted, though how that was contrived we are left to conjecture.

In spite of the fact that the maritime carrying industry shows little improvement, the shipbuilding yards of Japan are tolerably busy. In addition to orders from the Japanese Government for the construction of cruisers and large destroyers, they have commissions from the Chinese Government. As to building on private account, the Hochi Shimbun gives the following list:—

Place of Building.	To order of	Number	Tons.	H.P.

We read in Tokyo journals that out of 36 schooners or sloops which went north during this season in pursuit of fur-seals, the number captured has been six, namely, four by American preventive vessels and two by Russian. With regard to the American captures, only one out of the four, namely the Tora Maru (68 tons) has been released up to the present. She was sentenced to a fine which her master paid immediately. Three others, namely the Tokai Maru (95 tons), the Miyako Maru (?) and the Kōyō Maru (98 tons) are still under detention. The two vessels captured by the Russians are the Kōyō Maru and the Kano Maru and their masters and crews are still in prison.

A difficulty has arisen in the Jinseng Market of Yokohama. Hitherto it has not been the custom to make any allowance for what is called kwanberi; that is to say, for reduction of weight owing to leakage or rough handling during transit. On the other hand, a small reduction of price has been conceded on this account. Buyers in Hongkong and Shanghai have for some time been demanding an allowance of 1-per-cent., and lately they insisted on an allowance of 5 catties on a loose parcel of 100 catties and of 2½ catties per bag of 100. The Japanese are not disposed to make any such concession and they are said to be very strong, inasmuch as the Korean crop this year is exceptionally bad.

Considerable attention is concentrated on two schemes, proposed by Mr. Asano and Mr. Okada respectively, for constructing canals, the former from Haneda to Tokyo and the latter from Tsurumi to the same city. Practically the two enterprises have a corresponding object, but their dimensions are very different. The Asano project is for a canal 400 yards wide, and capable of accommodating steamers up to 7,000 tons, whereas the Okada scheme is for a canal only 30 yards wide navigable by steam launches. The former programme involves an expenditure of 30 million yen; the latter of only 5. As yet Mr. Asano's scheme has not assumed practical shape, but Mr. Okada's has been actually submitted to the Authorities for approval. Both are strenuously opposed by the inhabitants along the sea-coast, who insist that the building of either canal would destroy the crop of edible sea-weed annually gathered along this shore. Mr. Asano and his associates talk of buying up this crop, but the feasibility of such a measure is deemed problematical.

The Katsura-gaw Hydro-Electric Company has at length been definitely formed. It held a meeting for the purpose of organization on the 20th instant. Mr. Amenomiya was appointed Chairman of the Board of Directors and Messrs. Iwata and Hara were chosen to be Managing-Directors. The Company is to supply power to the Tokyo Electric Light Company. We observe one evil feature in its methods, namely that a sum of no less than 77,000 yen is allotted for expenses of organization and for the remuneration of promoters and directors.

Another company called the Electric Supplies Manufacturing Company, has also been formed under the Presidency of Mr. Amenomiya. The latter Company has a capital of 1½ million yen and the former 6½ millions. They are to be amalgamated.

It is stated that, after much deliberation, the Railway Board has decided to maintain the present narrow gauge on the Tokyo-Kyoto line, and to lay an additional track of wide gauge for the Tokyo-Yokohama service. By and bye this wide gauge will be extended to Kozu. The trains on the wide-gauge track will be run by electricity. This explanation is not nearly sufficiently detailed, but fuller information is not yet forthcoming.

Meanwhile we do not find any reference to the future of the Kei Hin Electric Railway, though evidently the Government's project has a vital bearing upon the welfare, if not upon the very existence, of this Company. The traffic between Yokohama and Tokyo cannot be sufficiently large to give employment to two electric railways running parallel at a short distance from each other.

Tokyo newspapers have a great deal to say about the arrest of Mr. Matsumura Takeshige, the banto of Messrs. Babcock and Wilcox. The charge against Mr. Matsura, who has been for over 20 years in the Firm, is defrauding the Customs. It is alleged that for some time back he has been passing in goods under forged invoices, and while charging the Firm the full import duty, has pocketed the difference, the Customs being the sufferers. One or two newspapers suggest the possibility of these frauds having been committed with the cognizance of the Firm, but evidently very little evidence is attached to that extravagant notion. This may be one of the cases to which allusion was made at the last general meeting of the Yokohama Board of Trade. We may be sure that every possible facility will be afforded by Messrs. Babcock and Wilcox to the efforts of the police in investigating the frauds.

The remains of the late Viscount Inouye have reached Japan and the obsequies are to be held at the temple Tōkaiji on the 25th instant at 3 p.m.

Rumours continue to be busily circulated to the discredit of the Yalu Lumber Company. For some months past the operations of the enterprise have been said to be very unsatisfactory from a financial point of view, and it is expected that the situation will be now greatly aggravated by the appointment of a Chief Director who is distinctly anti-Japanese. The name of the Director is not mentioned in the telegrams, and the whole story is exasperatingly vague. It will be remembered that the last official report did not take by any means so lugubrious a view.

TOKYO NOTES.

RAILWAY REPAIR WORK.

As one who has recently passed over a considerable extent of railway, more or less interrupted by the floods, it is a pleasure to bear witness to the remarkable expedition displayed by the Imperial railway authorities in accomplishing repairs and restoring communication. A good example of this is seen in the line between Naoetsu and Ueno along which the washouts were too numerous for any but a railway man to remember. When it is borne in mind that the big iron bridge at Shinmachi and the still larger one nearer Takasaki, were both down for some hundreds of feet, and that the numerous culverts and smaller bridges, as well as the big embankments and brick bridges of the tunnels, were all more or less destroyed, and that nearly all these have been repaired in a little more than four weeks, it seems really a marvellous achievement; and still more so when one is reminded that this is but one line of the many all over the Empire to which the Department of Railways had to give attention in the same way and at the same time. Here we have a vast work undertaken suddenly under the necessity of circumstances, involving the exercise of skilled supervision over thousands of workmen in hundreds of separate places along a great extent of line, and yet the labour of each and all combined in a most unerring manner to carry out carefully the aim of the Superintendent in Chief, so that with the minimum of inconvenience the public were enabled to resume their wonted movements. It may safely be said that such achievement could not be surpassed in any other country in the world. In the work of Baron Goto and his skilled assistants we see the same genius for combined efficient effort that was displayed by the Japanese Army in Manchuria during the late war, when, though separated by vast stretches of territory, every detachment of the Army nevertheless was able to fulfil the aim of the leader and Commander-in-Chief, to crush the enemy and save the Empire. In considering a matter of this kind there are some persons who can see nothing but the mistakes. Well, mistakes matter little so long as the main purpose has been achieved. The railway Department makes mistakes no doubt, as well as all other human organizations and efforts, but it has finally accomplished its purpose and accommodated the public. Those who bought first-class tickets during the last few weeks were somewhat disappointed that more often than not they had to ride in second-class cars, and at times even in third-class cars. But they had sense enough, it is to be hoped, to remember that they were fortunate in not having to walk instead of ride; for it seems a matter more due to Providence than good management that cars of any kind should have been found between the numerous breaks on the railway line. Some of these breaks left a track of but a few miles between them, and had it so happened that neither locomotives nor coaches chanced to be laid up in those sections, there would have been no way of getting such conveniences to the isolated stretch of track after the breaks had occurred. In fact it looked very much as though the railway authorities had been wide awake enough to forestall the flood and place engines and cars at various places along the line in case of isolation by washout and flood. Moreover at every place of changing cars the railway had seen to it that plenty of akabo were on hand to transfer quickly all hand baggage. Nor were exorbitant charges permitted. Each man asked no more than his five sen apiece for luggage, and in most cases it was well earned. At present there are but three breaks unattended between Naoetsu and Ueno; and these will soon be repaired. This means that the passenger has to leave the train but three times on the journey, but as his baggage is carefully looked after, the change of cars brings very little inconvenience. The extent of walking involved is not more three or four cho, and even ladies and children can attempt it without either trouble or fear.

SUPPRESSION OF SOCIALISM.

A considerable degree of excitement continues in Tokyo over the Government's determined suppression of Socialism. Several arrests have been made and it is said other are contemplated; while all literature encouraging socialistic ideas has been put under the ban and is being weeded out of the book shops and banished from the reach of youth. Those who see that Socialism in itself is not wholly evil are glad to notice that the causes leading to the arrest of certain of the accused were not crimes naturally associated with socialistic teaching but with what is far worse, Anarchy, that black spirit that has created such terror in Europe and has been responsible for the assassination of rulers and other great men. There is no doubt that so far as Socialism lends its countenance to anarchical doctrines and tendencies it ought to be weeded out root and branch. It has been said that the real aim of such deluded persons is not intentionally evil; they simply wish to make the world better and deliver their fellow-men from what they regard as intolerable evils. But they as well as other people have to learn that history proves the world is not made better by doing evil. To do evil that good may come is a pernicious doctrine which may justify the most horrible of crimes. What we want is more instruction in the schools on the subject of social evolution and ethical development. The youth of the nation must be taught from human history that the happiness and prosperity of the nation as well as of the individual have always resulted from honest and loyal citizenship, each man doing his duty to his fellows, and not by fighting the Powers that be and defying authority. If authority is bad, unjust, inherently corrupt, it will decay and fall as naturally as a rotten tree, without the knife of the assassin or the cruelty of the anarchist. Let each man look to his own behaviour and circumscribe his own conduct; and if he is convinced that duty calls him to reform the State, let him take his part in doing it in concert with his fellow citizens, rather than by setting out as a free lance to force mankind at the point of the pistol into acquiescence with his individual notions. In point of fact anarchy and certain brands of socialism are simply egoism gone mad, and as such, cannot be tolerated in a free State. Such notions of civilization have to be treated as insanity if not as crime.

Some time ago I was discussing this subject with a foreign missionary who has a large knowledge of the country-folk in Japan. From what he told me I should judge that this menacing variety of socialistic propaganda was going on in the rural districts to a greater extent than even the authorities are aware. One evening and, for that matter, on several occasions, while this missionary was conducting a service, a young man was noticed distributing pamphlets at the church door; and one of these was handed to the pastor of the church among others. He took it home and translated it. The ideas expressed and the courses of action suggested in it were not only highly immoral, but positively wicked and indecent. Next time they met, the pastor asked this youth if he knew the contents of the literature he was distributing through the country. He replied in the affirmative, and said that of course preachers and missionaries would naturally be opposed to his propaganda as it tended to destroy their influence and deprive them of their jobs. Here then was a young man fairly well educated, but who had no more idea of citizenship and common decency than to go about circulating the most immoral sort of literature, in the avowed belief that he was doing his people and his country a great good. To destroy or even to injure the moral life of the individual or the community is as heinous an offence as to destroy or injure the physical life of the citizen, and it is not to be wondered at or thought illiberal on the part of the Government if both offences are treated and ultimately punished in the same manner. The citizen who teaches or lends his sympathy to crime cannot be permitted to go free. He is like a disease whose contagion will spread if allowed to germinate. For people have their tendencies that make them susceptible to moral disease, just as some are more susceptible to physical disease than others, and it is the duty of the State to protect its citizens from such. As intimated by the Japan Times recently, the great force against anarchy in Europe and America is religion, but for which the labour of Governments would be much more difficult than it is at present. Religion is the salt that preserves the mass even though here and there the fringe frays out or goes to decay. Thus the body politic itself is kept sound, because the controlling spirit of religion is moral perfection, efficiency of personal character; and its most powerful motive is honour and reverence for the Creator and His divinely appointed servant, the Ruler of the nation. The citizen who has neither reverence nor respect for Heaven will have neither reverence nor respect for the Son of Heaven.

REPAIRING OF FLOOD DAMAGES.

According to the report of the Home Office, the estimates for repairing the damages caused by the recent floods, have been made up in Tokyo and three other prefectures as follows:—

	Yen.
Tokyo-fu	1,790,000
Chiba-ken	900,000
Ibaraki-ken	1,460,000
Miyagi-ken	1,110,000

It is reported in this connection that the Government, which intended to propose a bill for the expansion of naval forces at the next session of the Diet, will postpone its presentation for one year in consideration of the fact that much money will be required for the above repairs.

A NAGASAKI telegram reports that early on the morning of the 13th inst. a cyclone raged for five minutes at Yuzuki and vicinity in that prefecture. Three dwelling houses and seven sheds were blown down by the wind. Fourteen casualties are reported.

MR. ROOSEVELT AND AMERICAN POLITICS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 17.)

THE trend of American politics at the present time presents features of more than ordinary interest to the observer in the outside world. There are conditions at work, internal and external, which threaten to bring about a general upheaval, with a subsequent re-distribution of parties. To begin with, there has been brought into the arena the forceful personality of Mr. ROOSEVELT—a circumstance which of itself is pregnant with possibilities. For was it not the ex-PRESIDENT who, fresh from the African wilds, extolled, as the chief of the primitive virtues, “to work, and to fight?” Mr. ROOSEVELT’s past career has given ample evidence, to friends and foes alike, that he possesses these virtues in a high degree; and American history of the immediate future will, in all human probability, confirm that evidence up to the hilt. It requires no prophetic instinct to foresee that the impending political struggle in the United States will have for its central figure the ex-Colonel of Roughriders. At present the outstanding feature of the situation is the momentous fact that the great Republican party which has for so many years held sway over the destinies of the United States, is at length divided against itself. A new political party has made its appearance upon the scene under the name of the “Insurgents”—it will doubtless assume some more significant cognomen as its principles crystallize into definite shape—and the Republican “bosses”—the “Old Guard” of a historic party—are not a little perturbed at the potentialities of this new development. For this movement has at its head, a man who is a host in himself and whose influence throughout the Republic, from Maine to Colorado, can only be compared with that of the greatest figures in American history—GEORGE WASHINGTON and ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

That “there is something rotten in the State of Denmark” is evidenced not only by the revelations of municipal and political corruption which with painful frequency affront the ears of America’s friends, but by the unconcealed eagerness with which the bulk of the population welcomes the ex-PRESIDENT as a Hercules for the cleansing of the Augean stables of American public life. An English journal compares the present situation in the United States with that of the revolt of Lord RANDOLPH CHURCHILL against the effete of his party, or of Mr. CHAMBERLAIN against the Gladstonian separatist policy; but it seems to us that the movement with which Mr. ROOSEVELT has now definitely associated himself—if, indeed, he was not its fons et origo—is a movement in the direction of national righteousness, of cleanness in the political world. Such in fact is the complexion which the ex-President himself imparted, to it, when, at the opening of his Western, speech-making tour, which has already become a species of triumphal progress, he singled out political crookedness as the one vital issue of American politics, and announced his intention of “making it his particular business” to hunt the “crooks” out of his own party. One thing is certain, that the “crooks” and the various corporations they represent will not surrender their lucre-strongholds without a struggle, and it will need all Mr. ROOSEVELT’s vast popularity to carry him victorious to his goal. Nevertheless, it is a now generally accepted belief that 1912 will see the strenuous ex-Colonel marching to the White House over the ruins of the once omnipotent Republican Party. Meanwhile the significance of such events as the sweeping Democratic victory in Maine is not to be ignored. The divided Republicans may, indeed, leave the way open for Democratic supremacy, and there are many Americans, even of unpronounced political sympathies, who would regard such a denouement as a national disaster. Be that as it may, however, the advent of the Democrats to power would involve a complete reversal of American foreign policy. Such external entanglements as the Philippine Occupation and the Liberian Protectorate, are as anathema to the mind of the Democrat, and the assumption of the central control by the followers of WILLIAM JENNINGS BRYAN at a time when the Republic is entering upon a world-policy could hardly fail to result in some curious developments. But that danger, as most Americans regard it, is rendered the more remote by the fact that the Democrats (with all respect to Mr. BRYAN’s platform gifts) possess at the present moment neither a leader nor a policy. The man of the hour is not with them; and where it is a question of the will of a people so strongly swayed by sentiment as is the American nation, we are inclined to pin our faith to the man of the hour. Mr. ROOSEVELT may even now say, with vastly more truth than the Fourteenth Bourbon, “L’Etat, c’est Moi!”

MISSIONARY VERACITY.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 20.)

THE Japan Herald, having forwarded to Sir HIRAM S. MAXIM, an article which appeared in these columns two months ago in reply to some injurious statements about missionaries from the pen of that scientist, Sir HIRAM has addressed to our local contemporary an answer from which we take the following:—

The article in the Japan Mail has a strong family resemblance to many other articles that I have seen in missionary papers. If you point out to one of these gentlemen that he has told something which is not strictly true, his reply is that you, in pointing out his error and giving him a little bit of real truth, are telling a “stupendous falsehood” yourself. It is a fact that the missionaries, not having one iota of truth to support their position, are reduced to using other weapons. If they told the truth, their subscriptions would fall off. It is therefore necessary for their very existence, to misrepresent the facts.

I propose sending you very shortly plenty of evidence to substantiate everything that I have said, when I think you will be able to agree with what Colonel Carr said when he returned to the United States from China, and read the missionary reports: “The missionaries in China are the greatest liars on the face of the Earth.”

If one really wishes to know to what extent lying may be carried, I advise him to purchase a little Roman Catholic Book which gives a life of St. Francis Xavier. If we can believe this little work, this great saint could beat Baron Munchausen and Ananias out of their boots, in fact he was the boss liar of the World, and the boss missionary at the same time, therefore the greatest missionary was the greatest liar.

Yours faithfully,

HIRAM S. MAXIM.

P.S.—More anon.

We return thanks to Sir HIRAM S. MAXIM for this letter. It condemns him effectively out of his own mouth. He sets out by an attempt to mislead his readers into supposing that the article in the Japan Mail was written by a missionary. It was not. It was written by the editor of this journal. We are not acquainted with any missionary who would think it worth while to notice such charges as those preferred at the outset by Sir H. S. MAXIM. Happily for themselves missionaries are absolved from many of the unpleasant duties which fall to the lot of journalists. But Sir HIRAM S. MAXIM is not exempt from the duty of refraining from baseless insinuations. We thank him, however; for this preface of his is consistent with the text which follows. “If you point out to one of these gentlemen,” he writes, “that he has told something which is not strictly true, his reply is that you, in pointing out his error and giving him a little bit of real truth, are telling a ‘stupendous falsehood’ yourself.” It would be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to pervert the issue more flagrantly than Sir HIRAM S. MAXIM here perverts it. What he did in his original indictment was to denounce the whole body of Christian Missionaries as unvaracious, and to compare them to pigeons which, by careful breeding through many generations, had developed abnormal faculties. He did not adduce any evidence in support of this wholesale slander, for his reference to the solitary case of Mr. TORREY misrepresenting Colonel INGERSOLL’s attitude, was absolutely worthless for the purposes of such an extensive libel. And now he promises to send testimony which will convict the “missionaries in China of being the greatest liars on the face of the earth.” Moreover, he commends attention to a life of Xavier which proves him to have been “the boss liar of the World.” There is no lack of superlatives, it will be observed. But there is a conspicuous lack of sober reasoning. And as for the accusation that all the Missionaries are liars, it is laughable. That is all that need be said about it. We repeat what we have already written from out of the fullness of a much longer experience than Sir HIRAM S. MAXIM’s, namely, that “among all sorts and conditions of men there are none whose general level rises to a higher standard of scrupulous integrity” than does that of the Christian Missionaries.

MR. LUCIEN WOLF ON THE ANNEXATION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 22)

ELSEWHERE we reproduce an interesting article by Mr. LUCIEN WOLF, writing in the Daily Graphic, on the subject of the annexation of Korea. It will be observed that Mr. WOLF is obsessed by the old chimera. He thinks that the Japanese Government has successfully subjected British trade in Manchuria to disabling discrimination. This charge has been preferred again and again but in no one instance has anything like convincing proof been adduced. It is indeed one of the two phantoms which no effort of reasoning can exorcise. The other is the notion that the difficulties as to the construction of a railway from Chingchow to Aigun were of Japanese manufacture. However contrary to fact that allegation has been shown to be, it is still repeated with confidence; however signal has been the failure to convict Japan of differentiating against Occidental imports in Manchuria, the slander retains its vitality. Mr. LUCIEN WOLF adds another curious feature to the indictment. He thinks that by annexing Korea Japan will be in a position to close the commercial door there in the face of other nations; not by means of hostile tariffs but by a process cognate with that adopted by her in Manchuria, namely, by charging differential rates on the railways and by countenancing fraudulent invoices. Two things escape his attention. One is that had Japan been disposed to pursue these evil tactics in Korea, she need not have waited for annexation. The railways were already in her possession; the Customs were under her control, and the conduct of the country's foreign affairs was in her hands. If, with all these facilities available, she made no attempt to violate the principle of equal opportunity, why should she be expected to abuse the same opportunities now? The other point lost sight of by Mr. LUCIEN WOLF is that by annexation Korea becomes an integral part of the Japanese Empire. Has Japan ever been seriously accused of discriminating against foreign trade within her own dominions? We are not aware that she has. What warrant is there, then, for supposing that she will make an exception in the case of this newly added portion of her realm? It is well to guard against all eventualities, but it is not well to waste strength in grappling with mere shadows; and it is very far from well to insult a friendly nation by making it the object of suspicions which its history furnishes no warrant whatever for entertaining.

Readers will further observe that Mr. WOLF compares Lord SALISBURY's diplomacy in the case of Tunis with Sir EDWARD GREY's diplomacy in the case of Korea, very much to the discredit of the latter. "France was reluctant to give a formal and legal shape to her de-facto annexation of the Regency," says Mr. WOLF, and "with that slender hold only to work upon, Lord SALISBURY secured a guarantee of most-favoured-nation treatment for 40 years and a specially privileged treatment of British cottons for 15 years," "a much better bargain than Sir EDWARD GREY has secured in Korea." Mr. LUCIEN WOLF, in formulating this argument, fails to perceive that it tells diametrically against his own contention. Had Japan been "reluctant to give a formal and legal shape to her de-facto annexation" of the Peninsula, then indeed there would have been plenty of room to negotiate with her. But there was no such nebulousness; no such need for securing foreign acquiescence by special concessions. The annexation was open and explicit. Korea became an integral part of the Japanese Empire, and all conditions arising out of her previous independence ceased to have real existence. There was nothing for Sir EDWARD GREY to take hold of.

AN APPRECIATION OF PRESIDENT TAFT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 23.)

(COMMUNICATED.)

PERHAPS no prominent American of recent years has so truly represented the American ideal man as does President "BILL" TAFT. Democratic, genuine,—a quiet, modest gentleman,—he has been content to do things, and let other people talk about them; sometimes even to the extent of smilingly permitting a less modest and more self-advertising person to claim credit for diplomatic achievements which were palpably the product of his brain and genial diplomacy.

The world will perhaps never realize one-half of the work Mr. TAFT has done for America. When he came to the Far East the Philippines were in a ferment, and all the nations interested were looking askance at American occupation. When Mr. TAFT returned home, the Philippines were quite pacified, while America's place in the Far East was not only established, but appreciated—a bungler might have produced far different history! On his return home Mr. TAFT found four-fifths of the voters throughout the great central states clamouring for the United States to "get their money back and turn the Philippines adrift." Mr. TAFT crossed the country and made a series of speeches. He is no orator, but he drew the malcontents together into a union which has ever since supported the administration in its foreign policy. On one occasion Mr. TAFT was received in a Western city by an audience of ten thousand noisy anti-imperialists. After a very flowery introduction by a local orator, Mr. TAFT advanced to the center of the platform, beginning in a drawling tone, and without complimentary address, "Well, I suppose you want to hear what I have to say about the Philippines." The crowd actually laughed. But for two hours they stood in the hot afternoon sun and listened to the man who knew what he was talking about, and it was a quiet thoughtful crowd that returned to their homes at the conclusion of the address. This is the city where, last month, Mr. ROOSEVELT was greeted with "Three Cheers for 'Bill' TAFT."

At one time the South American republics were seething with discontent, and almost ready to join in an international boycott against the United States. Mr. TAFT spent a few weeks in South America. There was no brass band, newspaper advertising or red fire; in fact no one seems to know just how it was brought about, but the American republics were drawn together in a closer union than ever before, and the friendship then established toward the United States has since withstood many trying tests.

The key-note of Mr. TAFT's success in life is the one word "Sincerity." He is real and dependable. The friends of his college days have been the friends of his manhood, and they are the force that made him President.

As a judge Mr. TAFT was noted for his clear, cool decisions, which invariably appealed, even to the losers, as being inspired by a whole-hearted endeavour to render justice. As President he has been no more a figure-head than his noisy predecessor, and it is indeed questionable if he has not actually accomplished more in the same length of time.

Recent foreign comments on the action of the United States in Liberia, both friendly and adverse, have emphasized the statesmanship of the President in securing the approval of the three Powers most interested before opening the negotiations.

President TAFT and his administration have been most severely criticized for the Payne-Aldrich Law; at one time indignation and disgust being universally expressed by the whole army of Tariff-revisionists who helped to elect him. However, it appears that these criticisms were premature, for the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Law is proving to be much the best tariff American statesmen have yet produced—a fact now admitted even by its bitterest critics. In another column we reprint a summary of opinions from the most prominent American newspapers, on this subject. Some of these were most bitter in their denunciations at the time the act became a law. It would appear that this experiment may yet prove to be the most valuable labour of the "Sage of Beverley."

Again, regarding the fortification of the Panama canal, there is little doubt that the President will ultimately accomplish his purpose with the full approval of all nations. The London Times in its comment on the subject says: "England recognizes the right of the United States to military occupation, but feels that according to treaty she should have been consulted diplomatically." The writer of that article has lost sight of the fact that the President must first obtain authority for such negotiations. It would be considered presumption on his part, and in all probability would defeat his object, were he to enter into open negotiations with a foreign Power regarding the fortifications before they had been authorized by the American Congress.

Finally, Mr. TAFT is a fighter, when aroused, and it would not be surprising to see his quiet, dignified manliness and splendid record yet conquer the wild stormy popularity of the self-advertised "Hero of Oyster-Bay."

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, September 1.

Recent speeches of the German Emperor attracted the more attention in Russia owing to their so nearly coinciding with the visit to German territory of the Russian Imperial Family. Probably for the same reason, there is an absence of the usual outspoken comment. The Novoe Vremja, however, sums up the speeches in a characteristic cartoon which represents Germany, armed to the teeth, sitting on large up-ended volumes containing speeches, the "1,000th" of which has just been added, and reflecting with complacency on "how easy it is to play the bully if one doesn't fight," while in the background a horrified old woman labelled "Europe" is wringing her hands, helpless and afraid. Since the Emperor of Russia abolished the autocracy on paper and gave his people the opportunity of substituting a new régime, it has been the custom in Russia to regard the Emperor William as the last stronghold of absolutism in Europe, indeed, with China tending towards a modified régime, almost the last in the whole world. This view, which is superseding that put forward a twelvemonth or so ago, hinting at the rise of a twentieth century Napoleon in Europe, is significant of the more settled condition of International politics, largely owing to the close relations between England and Russia particularly since the latter has come to an agreement with Japan in the Far East. Napoleon did not ride to greatness on the back-wash of an ebbing tide. The recognition of the new role of the Emperor William as the last apostle of absolutism implies that all fear of the "new Napoleon" is on the wane.

The Emperor and Empress and Family left Peterhof on Sunday for the castle of Friedburg in Germany, close to Hamburg and the favourite health-resort of Nauheim. On the same day, a few hours earlier, the Empress Mother left on her yacht for Denmark.

The Court will, in all probability, be absent from St. Petersburg not less than two months, and it is hoped that circumstances will then permit of their Majesties once more taking up their residence in the capital itself for the Winter of 1910-11. There is no longer, of course, any question of the suitability of St. Petersburg as a residence for the Russian Court in the particular respect which kept the Emperor from visiting his capital during the years of licence and rebellion. The operating causes in the decision are nowadays those common to all humanity, questions of health. For some considerable time past the health of the Empress has been such that it was impossible for her to bear the strain of the great Court functions to which Russia is accustomed. A new question of health likewise arises in the deplorable condition of St. Petersburg from the sanitary point of view, and neither the Government nor the public are satisfied that the St. Petersburg municipality is making any real efforts to cope with this plague-spot, which threatens to develop new terrors.

We are passing through a period of exceptional interest in the usually neglected question of naval power, and Russia in particular is concerned to regain something of the position temporarily lost to her at Tsushima. The appointment of the "investigation" into the naval shipbuilding department, which it is said was made without the cognisance of the Ministry of Marine, is warrant of serious intentions on the part of the Russian Government. It is semi-officially explained, in order to allay very natural apprehensions on the part of not only minor but some of the higher officials of the department in question, that this "investigation" has nothing in common with the "revisions" in progress all over Russia, that there is no intention of seeking out victims for punishment on account of misdeeds of the past, whose authors, it is said have already passed away from the posts where their influence was prejudicial to the great cause of "restoring the Russian Fleet." It seems likely that the recent activity of Turkey, instigated thereto by Germany the "friend of the Mussulman rulers," in purchasing warships for the Black Sea, has given a fillip to Russian energies in the direction of shipbuilding. Already rumours are afloat of an intention to erect new ships on the Black Sea coast and proceed immediately with the construction of four "Dreadnoughts." The French naval programme is also welcomed here, and the Novoe Vremja devotes a long article to the "proof" that those persons who deny the need of a fleet to France in present circumstances are reckoning on false premises. "All this is based on the entente cordiale with England," says the Novoe Vremja, "but this understanding with England, by some inexplicable error, is taken to be as it were a one-sided affair. Upon England are laid all the burdens of a possible war with Germany, while France takes to herself only the profits. One need be no great politician to define even concretely the demands that England will make upon France in that case. It is no secret that the constant increase of the German fleet has compelled England to withdraw a portion of her forces from the Mediterranean. It is here then that the task of France now lies; to dam up in the Mediterranean the naval forces of Germany's allies. From this point of view, as France's ally and as sincere well-wishers to the cause of European peace, we can only welcome the French naval reform and trust that it will be carried out with all possible speed."

On Sunday at Cetinje in the presence of the King and Queen of Italy, the Crown Prince of Serbia, and others, proclamation was solemnly made of the raising of Montenegro to the status of a kingdom, the occasion being the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the reign of Prince, now King, Nicholas. Montenegro is the creation of Peter the Great, who was aided a couple of hundred years ago in his campaigns against Turkey by the Slav Prince whom he and his successors ever after supported on the throne of Montenegro, the one condition attaching thereto being that the rulers should profess the Orthodox religion. The relations between the greatest and the least of the Slav states is well expressed in the answer which a Montenegrin issued to have made to the taunts of a German or Austrian who pointed out that the pretensions of Montenegro were out of all proportion to the numbers of inhabitants or size of territory: the mountaineer answered emphatically: "Not so small either—we and the Russians are a hundred and fifty millions strong!" The good wishes of all Russia, rulers and people alike, go with Montenegro and its King to-day, and few other nations but welcome the honour done to a gallant ruler who has allied his house with some of the proudest dynasties in Europe, enlarged his territory and secured free passage to the open sea, a record, when one recalls all that has happened in the Balkans in the past half century, that is sufficiently remarkable. The Emperor of Russia has despatched to Montenegro the Grand Duke Nicholas Nikolaevich, who left St. Petersburg last evening, to bear to King Nicholas of Montenegro a Russian Field-Marshal's baton, an exceptional honour, for there is only one other Russian Field-Marshal, the nonagenarian ex-Minister of war and hero of many fights, not only in war, but in the internal struggles in peace time, the negotiations that preceded the Emancipation of the Serfs, Field-Marshal Miljutin. All the sons of King Nicholas are likewise given a step in the ranks, they hold in the Russian Army.

The annexation of Korea by Japan is now officially made known together with the text of the "Treaty" between the Emperor of Japan and the ruler of Korea. From the comments on this long-expected event in the Russian press it is obvious that there is a sense of soreness over the action of Japan. The Novoe Vremja ridicules the "Treaty" which it compares to the making of an agreement between the oyster and the man who swallows it. At the same time it is careful to point out that Russia has really no interests in Korea, whereas England and America have. To England, and particularly to the United States of America will be left the task of expressing dissatisfaction with Japanese action.

In order to prepare the public mind for this step the Japanese Government published recently in English a marvellous compilation under the title of "Annual Report of the Agency General in Korea." If printing, pictures, and interesting treatment of subject are any indication of the work which Japan is doing in Korea itself, one can only heartily welcome the appropriation by Japan of Korea or any other Oriental land, that requires being put in order. The Consular reports of no other country, our own included, can bear comparison for a moment with these Japanese publications. In a couple of hundred pages of well-spaced c ear type there are not only three large-scale maps and a dozen tabular statements, but some seventy admirably executed photogravures that bring home to the reader all the essential facts of life, especially in the matter of trade and industry, as it is lived in Korea nowadays under the rule of the Japanese.

Henceforth Korea will be merely a province of Japan, to be known under the name of the Chosen Province.

NEW LAWS OF FINLAND.

The text is published to-day of the first proposed new law upon which the opinion of the Finnish Diet is asked in connection with the reorganisation of Russo-Finnish relations. It contains seven clauses: (1) Russian subjects not-Finnish citizens to be given equal rights with Finns; (2) Persons who have qualified in Russian educational establishments to be accorded the rights in Finland that attach to the parallel institutions in Finland; (3) Russian subjects, of the Christian faith, to have equal chances of securing appointment to the posts of teachers of history in Finnish educational establishments; (4) and (5) detail the legal responsibilities of Finnish officials in case of any attempts to evade or oppose the operation of the preceding clauses; (6) Finnish regulations regarding Jews and Gypsies—which, be it noted, are much more stringent than those obtaining in Russia proper—to remain in force pending the revision of the whole question of these peoples; and (7) the present law to come in force on the 1st to 14th of January 1911.

The drafting of the Bill seems curious, clauses 2 and 3 appearing to be included in clause 1, being merely special instances of the general rule. It was perhaps thought advisable to emphasize these special grievances, however, for every alumnus of a Finnish educational establishment for over a hundred years has had throughout the Russian Empire all the rights that education in an equivalent Russian school can give, and over and above, in some much coveted privileges attaching to schools in St. Petersburg, Finnish alumni have for a century been given preference over Russians in the Russian services. As to the teachers of history it is notorious that for a generation or more past this subject has been taught in Finnish schools in a way that, if it were not revolutionary in purpose, would be merely ridiculous. Russia, of which Finland forms "an integral part," is only mentioned in Finnish school books casually or for the purpose of instituting injurious comparisons and emphasizing the "heroism" of Finnish malcontents of various ages. If you can imagine the schools on, say, the Isle of Anglesea teaching for a generation the minute details of local "history" and ignoring England, Scotland and Ireland, to say nothing of Wales, devoting three hundred pages of a text-book to Anglesea and only three to England etc., you will have some idea of the teaching that Finnish schools have been giving to Finns. Academic arguments about rights and privileges apart, this is utterly absurd in fact and no sane person can doubt the wisdom of Russia's plans to put an end to a bootless propaganda of meaningless hatred of the suzerain.

THE CHOLERA.

The progress of cholera in the capital and especially in South Russia has again brought forward the question of centralizing in Russia as is done in England the authorities responsible for the national health. A "Ministry of Health" is now becoming a favourite theme for newspaper speculation. At present every town and such rural districts as pay any attention at all to such matters, act each as it thinks fit. Those towns and centres that are particularly insanitary and patriarchal in their ways endeavour to obscure the issues which are vigorously pushed by towns and centres more enlightened; the result hardly makes for progress in any direction and is especially dangerous in the matter of sanitation in time of epidemics.

The plague at Odessa is unmistakably on the increase. Eight new cases were registered yesterday. The cases occur in various parts of the town and latterly it has been noticeable that people of the better classes have fallen victims. A crusade against rats has been organized, the town paying as much as twopence half penny for every dead rat. The bodies are labelled with place of capture, ward or district, and forwarded to the bacteriological laboratory for examination before being destroyed.

St. Petersburg, already for the third year visited by cholera, is now beginning to take alarm at the possibility of plague being imported. The city is to be divided into wards each with a doctor and assistants specially told off to take precautions against the plague, and rats will be paid for at a penny fathoming apiece; special gangs of rat catchers being appointed to each ward. In this connection a curious discovery has been made, namely, that ships approaching St. Petersburg from destinations known to be infected are not dealt with by Russian authorities, but are sent off to Sweden or Norway. These countries deal with them according to their own regulations and then the ships proceed to St. Petersburg, where they are apparently accepted without further question. The Lord Mayor of St. Petersburg, M. Glazunov, since his interview with the Premier-Minister, M. Stolipin, has not been seen at his post, and his resignation is expected. The indignation of the public at the inaction of the municipality has moved the reform party in the city council to demand the summoning of a meeting at an early date to consider the whole question of St. Petersburg sanitation, which might be compared to the celebrated "snakes in Iceland" if it were not infinitely more deadly.

TEAM OF WOLVES.

A Siberian hunter named Repechka is making his way to the capital in a cart drawn by two wolves, helped at times by an Esquimaux dog. He started from Eniseysk in April last year and was last heard of at Tobolsk, his progress being slow owing to his stopping at villages to exhibit his animals.

FLOODS ON THE SUNGARI.

The river Sungari has overflowed its banks above Harbin and done enormous damage to crops and to fishermen.

POPULATION OF RUSSIA.

The population of Russia, including Finland, is now, according to the latest statistics, 160,095,000 souls, an increase of over 26 per cent. since the last enumeration.

VALUABLE MINERAL DISCOVERIES.

It is reported from Nerchinsk that a discovery has been made there of large deposits of ore having radioactive properties. The ore from which radium is now got come almost exclusively from Spain, and the finding of such in Russia is of more value than gold in these days.

FIREARMS IN FINLAND.

The import into Finland of rifles and of every kind of pistols or revolvers, together with ammunition for these weapons, is absolutely prohibited, the Governor-General having the power to grant permission for exceptions to this universal rule, as also to deal with all weapons confiscated. The new order is to be enforced immediately and to run till such time as the Customs Regulations and Tariffs of Finland have undergone revision.

TREMENDOUS BRIDGE OVER THE AMUR.

A Khabarovsk paper reports that a bridge is to be built by Russia over the Amur River 2500 yards, nearly a mile and a half, long and about thirty feet above high water-line. It will cost twelve million roubles and take four years to build. It is to be christened the "Emperor Nicholas the Second Bridge," and will be the largest bridge in the Russian Empire.

GERMAN OFFICERS ARRESTED.

A German balloon entangled in tall trees near the village of Dlukhov in the Province of Petrokov was found to contain two German officers of the General Staff and a topographer. The assertions of the officers that they had been accidentally blown over Russian territory from Berlin were discredited on its being found that the car was equipped with admirable maps of the surrounding Russian territory, with accurate topographical details. A number of photographs taken from the balloon in Russian territory and some matter in cipher were also discovered. The three aeronauts have been arrested.

COUNT HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

(CONCLUDED FROM LAST ISSUE.)

LXXVIII.—GENERAL KURODA'S TACTICS.

Hakodate in the end fell in consequence of a surprise attack made on it on the dawn of May 11 under Kuroda Kigotake, a sharp steep cliff at the back of the town having been scaled by the Imperialist forces.

Kuroda was engaged in many successful military operations. In each case his success was due to his taking the enemy by surprise. Similar tactics were successfully employed by several generals of ancient times, notably by Yoshitune at Hiyoudorigoe and Yashima, and by Nobunaga at Okehazama. Viscount Wolseley is of the opinion that surprise attacks by night or by day may be very effective with irregular Oriental forces, but that with properly organized and disciplined armies they can very seldom be successfully employed. That may be so; but certainly in Kuroda's hands they were very efficacious.

LXXIX.—ENOMOTO'S ATTEMPTED SUICIDE.

When the Fugitive Army were driven into the Goryokaku Fort, it was found that the supplies of stores and ammunition were very low; for everybody had been so busy attending to the needs of the ships that the requirements of the troops had been overlooked.

When everything was lost, Enomoto drew his sword and was about to kill himself, when Otsuka Kakuji, who was standing by his side, seized hold of the sword and prevented him from carrying out his purpose.

Saito Ryukichi, who was later known as Nakano Goichi, always maintained that Otsuka had done wrong in staying Enomoto's hand. "For," said he, "every one should be free to carry out his own idea, whether it be desertion, suicide, or surrender."

I think he was right. Saito was a man of great judgment, and was afterwards Governor of Yamaguchi Prefecture.

LXXX.—THE LAST OF THE FUGITIVES.

The Fugitive Army shut up in Hakodate originally amounted to about 4000 men. When the Goryokaku fell, about 1000 men surrendered to the Imperialists, the rest having either deserted or died. These men were sent to confinement for about a year in various places, being placed under the custody of certain loyalist daimyo, and where then amnestied and released.

LXXXI.—I BECAME A TEACHER IN THE MEIJI GIJIKU.

On my release I went home to my father in Yokohama. This was in May of the 3rd year of Meiji (1870). At that time Mr. Santo Naoto, who was a fencing master of the Kishu clan, had opened a school at Waseda, on the site of Count Okuma's present mansion, and named the Meiji Gijiku. I made his acquaintance through my elder brother, the late Baron Dr. Matsumoto, whose hospital was also situated at Waseda. Mr. Santo invited me to join his staff as a teacher of English, and I consented.

LXXXII.—MR. SANTO AND HIS SCHEMES.

Santo was a man of many schemes. He bought cows and started a dairy, he set up a printing-press, he opened a hotel in Tsukiji. But he was a poor hand at business, and everything he put his hand to failed.

LXXXIII.—THE U.S. MINISTER, MR DE LONG.

English teaching was, I found, a very dull and uninteresting affair. I gave it up at the end of three or four months, and returned to Yokohama, where I became translator for U.S. Minister De Long, whose legation was at that time in Yokohama. De Long was a lawyer from the Territory of Utah, and had been a candidate for the representation of Utah in the Senate. It so happened that a friend of General Grant's was likewise desirous to obtain the post, so the President persuaded De Long to retire by promising to give him a remunerative and honourable post. In this way De Long came to be nominated as U.S. Minister in Japan. It was certainly a good and honourable post; but a post in a semi-civilized country like Japan, at the other end of the world, was not what De Long wanted. So he saved up all the money he could make during his term of office, and, returning to America, stood once more for the Senate. His efforts were, however, futile; he missed his election, in spite of all exertions, and died shortly afterwards, one might almost say of disappointment. When I passed through San Francisco I saw his widow and children, in great poverty. I have heard since that the children have done very well for themselves, but I have quite lost sight of them.

LXXXIV.—DE LONG TAKES A HAND.

Minister De Long was a man of great ability, active and diligent. Sir Harry Parkes was at this time by far the most influential of all the foreign representatives, and the Cabinet were beginning to be not a little wearied of his high-handed interferences with the affairs of this country, though it must be confessed that on several occasions he rendered no small service to the Empire. De Long's quick eye soon perceived how things were, and he determined, if possible, to put a spoke in the British Minister's wheel. This he tried to do by insinuating himself into the good graces of the Japanese.

I will give an illustration of his procedure. Towards the end of 1870 an Englishman, engaged at the University, was murdered at Nabe-chō in Kanda. Sir Harry Parkes at once called a meeting of the Foreign Representatives at the American Legation, and proposed that the whole body of diplomatists should join hands in demanding from the Japanese Government better guarantees for the safety of foreign residents, the punishment of the murderers, and a solatium for the bereaved family. The German Minister, von Brandt, spoke very strongly on the subject, striking the table with his fist as he spoke.

When the meeting was over and the diplomats had gone away, Mr. De Long called me to his side and said: "I have been told that that Englishman was on his way to visit his mistress when he was murdered, and that the assassination had no political significance whatever. That a professor of the University should keep a mistress is by no means creditable to him, and to make a diplomatic question of his murder is a course that does not commend itself to me in the least. It is nothing but a criminal case, and yet the great majority of my confreres have agreed to the British Minister's proposals, and the negotiations with your Government will very soon be opened. Now I want you to go to your Foreign Minister, Mr. Sawa, and just tell him from me that I hope he will pay no attention at all to the British Minister's representations, and that I'll do all I can to help him."

LXXXV.—THE ACTIVITY OF THE KISHU CLAN.

In the early days of Meiji, the great Lords were kept in their ancient fiefs as Governors with military power. One of the largest districts was the district of Kishū, the ruling family in which was one of the Gosanke, or three principal branches of the Tokugawa House. The chief officer of the clan was a certain Tsuda Izura, afterwards Minister of War, who introduced great reforms in the clan administration and enforced a system of military conscription. Military drill went on in all parts of the province, and fencing and judō became very fashionable. The real object of this military ardour was to create in Japan a military Power capable of competing with the then all-powerful clans of Satsuma and Chōshū.

Minister De Long, envious of the influence exercised by the British Minister, and of his friendship for the Satsuma and Chōshū clans, observed with pleasure the growing energy of the Kishū clansmen, and resolved to give them the benefit of his influence. He even went so far as to pay a visit to Wakayama, the capital of the Province. (I believe that Sir Harry Parkes did the same thing a little later).

In the 4th year of Meiji, Mr. Mutsu Munemitsu, as he then was, returned from Europe and went to Kishū to take notes of the clan administration. My brother, Matsumoto Jua, being well acquainted with that illustrious statesman, he took me with him when he went to Kishū. Thus my connection with the American Legation came to an end. The activity of the Kishū clan at this time was quite remarkable. Several distinguished men, Viscount Torio, Komatsu Seiji, Hoshi Toru, and others were more or less connected with its administration.

LXXXVI.—THE ABOLITION OF THE CLASS SYSTEM.

In the summer of the 4th year of Meiji, the class system was abolished, and the provincial lords summoned to Tokyo. It was a very sudden change, a veritable bolt from a blue sky; but there was no one to oppose it. The old world Bushido that had trained men for centuries to die for their feudal lords and thus to leave a good name for posterity, was wiped away by one stroke, and the work of the Restoration was complete. From henceforth there were no more territorial lords, but the Emperor alone as the object of loyalty.

We may take the Kishū clan as a specimen of what all the other clans were at the time of their abolition. The feudal lords in the old days possessed the right of legislation, of coinage, of military organization, nay, even of life and death, within their own territories. In matters outside their territorial limits they were bound to obey the Emperor and Shōgun, but in all other respects they were independent monarchs, possessed of that authority to rule which is the most coveted possession of man. It seems very strange that these princes (for such they were) should have surrendered all their privileges without a murmur of resistance.

The explanation of this phenomenon is to be found in the fact that the last three centuries of ease and indolence had so stupefied and enervated the daimyos that they were no longer capable even of understanding where their interests lay. It was this that made the work of reform so easy.

The merits of the Cabinet Ministers who carried out this project in so satisfactory a manner must not be overlooked. But there was something else as well. Heaven clearly favoured the Emperor, and thus enabled him to effect the reform and to save the people from the cruel oppressions of the old system.

LXXXVII.—I AM APPOINTED AN OFFICIAL OF THE KANAGAWA KEN.

Soon after the abolition of the clan system Mr. Mutsu was appointed First Governor of the Kanagawa Prefecture, to which I followed him as a Prefectural official.

Before the abolition, when clan feeling ran high, everybody who belonged to the Tokugawa fiefs looked upon the men of Satsuma and Chōshū as their natural enemies. But the clan feeling died out when the old system was done away with, and even the Tokugawa men were quite willing to accept positions under the new Government.

LXXXVIII.—MUTSU'S ADMINISTRATIVE REFORMS.

Mutsu's first act was to abolish the barrier gates at the entrance to Yokohama. Another reform was concerned with the law court or Shirasu as it was called. In the old days the floor of the court was covered with white sand (hence its name) with a small square paved with stone for the accused to sit upon. Mr. Mutsu substituted wooden floors for white sand and made a dock for the accused. He likewise established hospitals and schools, and instituted many administrative reforms. He was a very young man at the time, twenty-seven years by Japanese reckoning, between twenty-four and twenty-five according to foreign computation.

LXXXIX.—I RESIGN MY POSITION AS A CRIMINAL JUDGE.

When I reached Yokohama I found that one of my new duties was to preside at a criminal court. The practice of examining accused persons by torture had not yet been abolished, and the lower officials did their work with much cruelty. I could not bear to sit by and listen to the cries of tortured persons, so I resigned my post at the end of the first day and got myself transferred to something more congenial.

XC.—I JOIN AN AMBASSADOR'S STAFF.

Whilst at Kanagawa I renewed my acquaintance with Mr. Kozaki Saiji whom I had met some time before when he was serving in the War Office at Osaka. He told me that the Government was going to despatch Prince Iwakura on a mission to America and Europe, and that he was to accompany it. He also suggested that I should apply for a place on the staff. Mr. Mutsu was at the time at Tokyo, but it so happened that M. Ito (Prince Ito) was passing through Yokohama and I was told that he would take his dinner at a Restaurant called the Sanomo. He was an important personage on the Embassy suite and I had once met him at Osaka. So I plucked up heart to go and call on him. He gave me a letter to Mutsu, and the upshot was that I was enabled to join the Staff of the mission. We left Japan on the 4th of November.

XCI.—ITO, FUKUCHI AND THE NATIONAL BANKS.

In the early years of Meiji the provincial lords had the rights of taxation and military organization, and the Imperial Government was virtually without an army and without money. It was obliged to issue notes and put them into circulation, but it had no specie wherewith to redeem them. In addition to these Government notes there were notes issued by Provincial authorities, and a very large amount of spurious coin.

The adjustment of the financial entanglement was one of the most pressing importance, and it was made the more difficult by the fact that foreigners were also concerned in it.

It was about this time that the U. S. Government established "National" Banks for the purpose of dealing with very similar complications arising out of the Civil War, and an American work explaining the methods of the U. S. Government fell into the hands of Mr. Fukuchi, who translated it into Japanese. Mr. Ito read the book in translation, and thought that the plan might, with advantage, be adopted in Japan. Ito therefore called on Fukuchi, who was at the time living at Asakusa, advanced him the money to pay off all his outstanding accounts, and took him with him to America to examine the matter more thoroughly. After their return from America Fukuchi presented his report, and the result was the promulgation of the Law of National Banks, a law which was so entirely of Fukuchi's drafting that the very words which appeared on the first Japanese Government notes were in his handwriting.

The American system was briefly this: Anyone bringing to the U. S. Treasury a sum of $90,000, was entitled to receive in return Government Bonds of the face-value of $100,000, which, if he deposited them with the Government, also gave him the right to issue bank notes to the full extent of his bonds, provided that he kept a specie reserve to the amount of one third of the value of notes issued. The Japanese system was at the first very much the same. But a modification was introduced through the machinations of capitalists, whereby any person was allowed to issue bank notes to the full amount of his bonds, and to regard a reserve of Government notes as equivalent to a reserve of specie. The result was an immense decrease in the amount of gold reserve and a corresponding increase in the paper money in circulation, by which the paper notes became so much depreciated that they came to have not more than one half of their nominal value. This disastrous result was due to the ignorance of the financial authorities who had been hoodwinked by designing capitalists. The National Banks made a fine profit out of their business. They received interest on the bonds deposited with the Treasury, and could besides collect interest on the notes they issued. Their only responsibility was to keep Government notes to the amount of one-third of the value of notes issued by themselves, and that responsibility they constantly evaded. They always knew when the Bank Inspector's visit was to be expected, and before that day they would always contrive to borrow a sufficient quantity of Government notes to satisfy his demands. The notes thus inspected would be passed to the next bank on the Inspector's list, and so the ball went round. The Inspectors knew very well what was going on but did not dare to make a fuss for fear of disturbing the money market which was constantly in a most critical state.

Under the circumstances it was no wonder that a very large number of National Banks came into existence, until the Government issued a law limiting the number of banks.

XCII.—FOREIGNERS IN GOVERNMENT EMPLOY.

In the 4th year of Meiji, (1871) the Imperial Government had foreigners in its employ as follows:—

British 119, French 50, American 16, Dutch 2, German 8, Chinese 9, Indian 4, Hangarian 1, Italian 1, Philippine 1, Portuguese 1, Paraguayan 1.

The following figures represent the foreigners in the employ of the Feudal Lords:—

British 50, French 1, American 25, Dutch 15, German 9, Chinese 42, Philippine 3, Arabs 3.

The grand total was 378.

XCIII.—SALARIES PAID IN THE NEW COINS.

On one occasion only, during the 4th year of Meiji, when I was serving as an official in the Kanagawa Prefectural Government, did I receive my salary in gold one yen pieces. These coins had then been newly issued and were of the value of $\frac{4}{6}$ in English money. But it was only once: for the rest of the time, and until the 19th year of Meiji (1886), when convertible notes were first issued, my salary was paid in unconvertible Government notes.

XCIV.—THE SUITE OF THE AMBASSADOR.

The Ambassador's party was composed as follows:—

Ambassador:—Prince (Udaijin) Iwakura.
 Counsellors:—Kido Koin, Okubo Toshimitsu, Minister of Finance; Ito Hirobumi, Minister of Public Works; Yamaguchi Naoyoshi, Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs.
 First Secretaries:—Tanabe Taichi, Ka Reishi, Shioda Atsunobu, Fukuchi Genichiro.
 Second Secretaries:—Watanabe Koki, Komatsu Saiji, Hayashi Toru, Nagano Keijiro.
 Third Secretaries:—Kawaji Kando, Ando Taro.
 Clerk:—Kume Kuritake.
 Special Attaché:—Nomura Yasushi.

In addition to the above, officers from all the Government Departments were attached to the suite for the purpose of special investigation. I will not give their names: I will merely record the names of five girls: Masuda Shige (Viscountess Uryu) Yamakawa Sutematsu (Princess Gawa), Yoshida Ryō (Madame Kurizaka) Ueda da, and Tsuda Ume. These latter were sent to the Colonization Bureau. Relatives of peers sent abroad for study were also attached to the party, which thus numbered 108 persons in all. They landed at San Francisco on the 15th of January 1872.

CV.—COMICAL APPEARANCE OF THE PARTY.

The Ambassador, Counsellors, and Secretaries wore kamuri and Court Clothes. The Ambassadors and Counsellors, robes were black, those of the Secretaries red. The great Majority of the party wore the Court dress for the first time, and we were accustomed to them except the few who had in the past served in the Imperial Government. The rest were as laughable to look at as monkeys in men's clothes.

XCVI.—FAREWELL AUDIENCE.

Before starting the Embassy were admitted to a farewell audience with the Emperor. I remember the Emperor was dressed in white, and sat under a canopy on a throne supported by legs carved to imitate lion's heads. It was replaced by a new one a few years later.

XCVIII.—WE ARE ORDERED TO WEAR OFFICIAL DRESS

When the Ambassador and his suite had their audience with the President of the United States and presented the autograph letter from the Emperor they were dressed in the ceremonial robes of the ancient régime. Shortly after this interview I received orders from home to wear the new Western style Court dress which had just been officially adopted, and I was therefore sent ahead to England to order clothes for the whole party to use when we presented His Majesty's autograph letter at the British Court. Our present court dress for civil officials is a good deal different from what it was then; it is based on some clothes which I had made in England after consultation with a London tailor.

XCIX.—WE HAVE AN INTERVIEW WITH BRIGHAM YOUNG.

American Engineers had not at that time fully mastered the snow problem on the Transcontinental railway, and we were detained more than a week en route. We were snowed up at Ogden and detained for a week at Salt Lake City where the Ambassador paid a visit to Brigham Young, being in attendance on him. Brigham Young is a benevolent-looking gentleman of about 60 years of age. He had very many men in attendance on him and I was told that they were all his children.

C.—FUNNY STORIES ABOUT OUR STUDENTS.

A considerable proportion of our staff and of students accompanying us were absolutely ignorant of Western ways and were consequently very often in great difficulties. They were often puzzled by the "geography" of Western houses, they insisted on having Japanese food, and would eat nothing else, and an American bath was very hot enough for their tastes. The sons of nobles made the most fuss about these points.

CI.—TREATY REVISION FAILS.

Our embassy received most cordial welcomes in all parts of the United States, but especially at Chicago where we were taken in carriages to see all the sights of the neighbourhood.

The original purpose of the Embassy was to announce the Restoration of the Imperial House to those countries with whom we had made treaties, with the secondary object of giving some of our own officials an insight into the life and civilization of the West; and it was planned at first that when our party returned a second, similar one should be sent out under Prince Sanjo. The revision of our treaties was not included in our original programme, though it had always been a cherished hope of the Imperial Government. But our welcome in the United States was so genuine and hearty that it occurred to our Minister at Washington, Mr. (afterwards Viscount) Mori Yurei, that this might be a favourable opportunity for opening negotiations. The suggestion commending itself, our Ambassador, on arriving at Washington, at once opened the subject of Treaty Revision. Secretary Fish replied that he had observed with great pleasure the immense strides that Japan had taken, but that he observed with regret that nothing was said about Treaty Revision in the credentials that we had presented. Prince Iwakura assured the Secretary that everything would be well, that he had the implicit confidence of the Emperor, and that any agreements he might make in America would certainly be ratified by the Home authorities. Fish replied that it did not matter whether he had or had not the confidence of His Sovereign; it was a rule of diplomacy that written authorization must be shown before negotiations were entered into. It was in vain to try to move the American Secretary from this position. Ito and Okubo were obliged to return to Tokyo to obtain from their sovereign the requisite authorization. On their return to Japan notices were sent out to all the treaty powers informing them that Prince Iwakura had been authorized to enter upon negotiations for the revision of the treaties, and the Powers, in consequence, summoned their representatives in Japan to come home for consultation. Sir Harry Parkes returned to England; Herr von Brandt on his way home to Germany passed through America and had an interview with Prince Iwakura. He told the Prince that he was on his way home on matters connected with treaty revision, but that he thought the Japanese plan of making a revised treaty with every nation separately was a very great mistake. It would not be profitable for Japan. Pressed for his reasons, the German Minister said that if Japan made any concessions, e.g. to America, as a quid pro quo, all other nations would enjoy that concession under the most favoured nation clause, and that if each of the fourteen nations succeeded in getting a concession, there would not be much by way of profit for Japan to draw from treaty revision.

The German Minister's reason for this statement was simply that he did not wish the negotiations to be carried on in Germany. In Berlin, he would merely have been a person to be referred to occasionally for special knowledge, and the credit of the negotiations would have accrued to Foreign Office officials: in Japan, he would be plenipotentiary, and the kudos would be his.

This reasoning alarmed our Ambassador not a little. Mr. Mori, whom we looked up to as the best diplomatist in Japan, was dumb-founded. Kido was very much concerned. He told me one day that he had had Ito nominated as a member of the Embassy with a special view to the possibility of difficulties like this, and that he was sorry Ito had not foreseen the trouble.

In the midst of our perplexity Ito and Okubo returned from Japan, and a council was summoned. I told Ito and Okubo all that had occurred, and they were also greatly perturbed. Finally it was decided that as the negotiations would be very lengthy and as they were not likely to benefit the Empire, they had better be given up, and Ito was deputed to put things straight with the Americans.

Ito did not accept the responsibility without some grumbling. He said that it was not the first time that trouble had come from listening to outsiders, and that he did not like having always to put things straight.

However, the next day, Ito called on Secretary Fish. He told him that he had now got the necessary authorization but that, inasmuch as a series of separate negotiations would take a very long time, the Ambassador wished to treat with all the Powers at once. He considered America to be inconvenient for a place of meeting, suggested either London or Paris for the locality, and asked if the United States would send a delegate to such a Conference. The Secretary replied that America would be willing to send a delegate to a meeting in Japan, but not to Europe, to which Ito replied that in that case the negotiations must be dropped.

In Europe the Ambassadors did not speak much about Treaty revision, their main object was to try and get a reduction or cancellation of the Shimonoseki indemnity. After a good deal of negotiation America (and she alone) was induced to forego the indemnity on the condition that the money thus returned should be expended for purposes connected with the development of foreign trade. Yokohama harbour was constructed from this fund. The American who had acted as counsel for Japan in this matter sent in his bill for his services, and this matter has only quite recently been settled.

CII.—WILLIAM LLOYD AND THE TRAVELLING STUDENTS.

I have already mentioned that when we were sent to Europe as travelling students by the Shōgun's Government, we were put under the care of Rev. Mr. Lloyd, a Chaplain and Instructor of the Navy, who had been recommended to the Shōgun's Government by Sir Harry Parkes. Mr. Lloyd took us to London, and hired a large house where he made us all live together. To this plan we were all opposed: our chief desire was to learn English, and if we lived all together we could not help talking Japanese. We therefore asked Mr. Lloyd to allow us to board, each by himself in an English family, but to this he would not consent,—fearing, as we suspected, a diminution of his profits. The Government allowed us 1000 ryō each for living expenses, and thirty ryō a month for pocket money besides allowances for books, school fees, travelling, &c. A pound sterling was in those days equivalent to about five Mexican dollars, and the Mexican dollar was worth about 2 bu and 2 shu of our money, and the school expenses for our whole party did not exceed £34 per month. There were very few Japanese in London at the time, and people were not very willing to take them in except at rates somewhat higher than the average; and yet £2 would get them very good boarding in a clergyman's, schoolmaster's, or doctor's family. Mr. Lloyd had fourteen boarders, for whose expenses he did not have to pay out much, though the income he got from them amounted to close upon £6,000. He lived very luxuriously, and let his daughters take lessons in horsemanship, a point which increased the students' suspicions about him. After a good many disputes with him on the subject we contemplated making an appeal to the British Foreign Office. Mr. Lloyd, on his side, sent a long and detailed report of the case to Sir Harry Parkes, and I was afterwards told that Sir Harry had told a friend that never again would he have anything to do with Japanese students, though Mr. Aston, who was then at the Foreign Office in London, told an Ambassador how he admired the courage of the Japanese who refused to be wrongly dictated to, even by persons in authority.

Well, when the Embassy went to visit the Naval Station at Portsmouth, Mr. Lloyd called at our Hotel, asked me to introduce him to Mr. Ito, and expressed his earnest desire to obtain a position in Japan. Mr. Ito asked me many questions about him, and I told him all I knew. I did not set myself to say anything bad about him, but there was not much good that I could say. Mr. Ito decided not to engage him.

CIII.—NAPOLEON III. AND THE EMBASSY.

Just as our party was alighting from the train at Brighton we found another train just starting for London. In one of the carriages were seated the Ex-Emperor of the French, the Empress Eugénie, the Prince Imperial, and their suite. Our Ambassadors were at once brought into the Emperor's presence and had a few minutes' conversation with him before the train moved out. This happened during November, (1872) and the Ex-Emperor died at Chiselhurst on the ninth of January in the following year.

CIV.—THE DRESS QUESTION AGAIN.

I have said that I came on ahead to London to order full Court dress costumes for our party. I had some trouble in ordering the sword-handles, for the regulation demanded that they should resemble the head of a phoenix (Hō ō), and no London tradesman knew what a Japanese phoenix looked like. I at last managed to draw something. It looked more like a cock than a phoenix, but the design is still in use on our full-dress swords.

CV.—THE SHIMONOSEKI INDEMNITY.

Our efforts in London were solely directed to obtaining a remission of the indemnity remaining to be paid for the Shimonoseki incident. Our Ambassadors informed the British Foreign Secretary that the United States had consented, on certain conditions, to remit their share of the money due, but to this Lord Granville replied that the British Government had only sent in a bill for expenses actually incurred. It was possible that the U.S. had sent in a claim larger than their actual expenses, and that they were consequently not unwilling to meet the demands of Japan; but such was not the case with Great Britain. Still, if the other powers that had joined in the bombardment of Shimonoseki all agreed to remit their shares of the indemnity, Great Britain would not insist on having hers. Here the negotiations terminated.

CVI.—SIR HARRY PARKES AT HOME.

The British Minister, Sir Harry Parkes, was in those days the most influential man in Japan, and our people expected that they would find him occupying a similarly commanding position in England. We were therefore not a little surprised, at our interviews with the Foreign Secretary, to see Sir Harry Parkes sitting at the lower end of the Conference table and not speaking except when he was referred to by Lord Granville, who addressed him sometimes as Mr. Parkes and sometimes as Sir Henry, as though it could not be expected that he should know the exact style and designation of so obscure a person as the Minister to Japan. We did not stand in such awe of Sir Harry Parkes after we had thus found out what was his true position at home!

CVII.—THE UPRIGHTNESS OF SIR HARRY PARKES.

Sir Harry Parkes was a very quick tempered man, but he always did his best to develop the foreign trade of Japan and her industries, for he believed that to do so was to further the interests of Great Britain. He was extremely strict and severe, and his attitude towards Japan resembled nothing so much as that of a Japanese mother-in-law who has just received into her house the young and inexperienced bride whom her son has married and for whose domestic training she is responsible. Every Japanese was afraid of him.

But he was withal an upright man, and never made use of his high position and great influence for his own private interest, or that of his friends, which was more than some of the other ministers did. His uprightness caused him to be hated as long as he lived in Japan, but when he removed to Peking we learned to reverence him.

CIX.—WE LOSE OUR DEPOSITS.

Whilst we were in Europe an American firm, styling itself Ball Brothers, established a banking house in London where it received deposits from our travelling students, and also from the members of the Embassy party. The firm was very anxious to get a Japanese connection. They gave one of our students a very good appointment in their office.

Prince Iwakura, and several others of the party, made small deposits of private moneys, almost as soon as they arrived in London; but this did not satisfy Ball Brothers. They wanted to have everything, and with this in view sent their Japanese employee to try and persuade Tanaka Koken (late Minister of the Imperial Household Department), who acted as Treasurer for the mission, to trust them with all our public moneys as well. This Tanaka, acting on Fukuchi Genichi's advice, refused to do. A very short time after this the Bank gave a great entertainment in Switzerland to celebrate the conclusion of the celebrated Alabama Arbitration, and then closed its doors forever. All the deposits were lost. A few epigrams were composed on the unfortunate victims. I remember some of them. For instance:—

Jōyaku wa
Musubi sokonai,
Kane wa sute,
Seken ni taishi
Nan to Iwakura.

"The treaties, he has failed to make them: his money, he has lost it. What will Iwakura say to the world? [Iwakura means 'would be say.']"

KOREA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

In view of annexation the question of Christian missions and missionaries comes up for new consideration. In what way will missions be affected; wherein will changes come about; and what will the Government require of missionaries?

Little expressions may indicate great emotions, and the little attitudes and words of church gatherings will no doubt have their influence in the impression that is made upon the government. By force of habit, words like Tai-han (Great Han, Korea), Tai Whang-che, (the former Emperor, now Prince Yi), oori Tai-han saram (We Koreans) etc., have become a part of the vocabulary of the Christians, and yet every such word goes straight into the teeth of the new order of things. In prayers and exhortations, where these words are spoken involuntarily and by force of habit, they will be of course forgiven; but if these expressions be continued, it will be an offence against the State and bring the church rightly under suspicion. The word to be used now is Cho-sen, while Tai Whang-che will refer to His Imperial Majesty in Tokyo.

While Christianity is a matter quite distinct from politics, "Render unto Caesar the things that are Caesar's" is a divine command that pertains to all of Christian life and Christian effort. In this matter the missionary will be required to be faithful. He need not seek political subjects, he had better keep clear of them, but there are times when he will be faced with the question, and he will have to answer "We have no king but His Majesty in Tokyo."

There will need to be great care also in the matter of so-called sympathy. "We pity you in your time of distress," "We pray that you may again be independent," "These are days of oppression" are expressions that will need to be carefully guarded against.

To teach, indirectly, loyalty to the powers that be is surely a part of the missionary's duty. It is not his to criticize, to judge of the authorities, to enter into political questions, to sympathize adversely, or to create in any way a spirit of unrest or discontent. His text for political matters is "Render to Caesar" etc.

Such is the task before the Korean missionary, and if it be faithfully carried out, there will be no feeling of opposition toward him from the government, but good will only, with blessing for the Korean assuredly following.

That it is a time of great difficulty in the way of adjusting the attitude of the heart goes without question, but it must be adjusted and a loyal attitude assumed. An old friend of the writer's, one of the interesting Koreans of to-day, one of the most enlightened who has given his heart's assent to the new age and new regime, when asked by a Japanese how he felt with regard to annexation, replied by asking "How would you feel under similar circumstances?" "But tell me now what you think in heart." "I think that God's will should be humbly acceded to," "Then you regard annexation as God's will?" "Let us think it over," said he. "I will tell you a story, once I saw a man with a long knife driving it into the vitals of another man. I said to myself 'Behold a murderer,' but on inquiry I found he was a surgeon. The surgeon and the murderer each has his knife, each drives it into his fellow man, and yet they are altogether different. I regard God's will as the surgeon and man's will as the murderer. As to annexation, God knows. I bow to the will of God." SPECTATOR.

Tokyo, September 21.

Mr. I. Tokutomi, Chief Editor of the Kokumin Shimbun, in a telegram received by that journal to-day, says he has visited the principal American and British missionaries there, in order to elicit their views concerning the annexation. Some of them observe that the annexation was inevitable even if Prince Ito had lived, and that it is only a nominal change, and show their readiness to acquiesce in the new régime. Others assert that they cannot afford to confuse religion and politics as it will only make their evangelistic work more difficult. But some missionaries fear that the Koreans may become less confident in them if they assume an attitude solely favourable to Japan, and they prefer to be take a neutral and unbiassed attitude, in order to facilitate their evangelistic work, and are inclined to maintain their sympathy with the Koreans from a human standpoint, but do not profess that annexation is detrimental to religion. On the contrary, they declare the prospect of Christianity in Korea rather bright.

Mr. Tokutomi has also visited Mr. Yi Wan-yong, former Korean Premier, and Mr. Sun Phong-chun, founder of the now defunct Il-chi Society. Ye Wan-yong says Korea's fate depends upon the development of national resources and education. He points out the advisability of the teaching of the Japanese language in elementary schools in Korea, and recalls the fact that as the Minister of Education six years ago he included the Japanese language in the compulsory curriculum in Government schools. The linguistic rapprochement preludes kinship in every respect. In view of Korea's long history hitherto as a national unit he hopes the Japanese papers will not allude to the Koreans in a contemptuous manner, as will only injure Korean sentiments and hamper closer kinship between the brother-peoples. The spreading of Japanophobia in consequence of education is due to erroneous educational method and incompetent educators. Mr. Ye believes the Japanese authorities will not fail to make the Koreans fully utilize the rewards bonds. He thinks they will also continue to contribute to the welfare of the Koreans, who are now the Japanese Emperor's subjects and ought to be treated as such.

Mr. Sung Pyong-chun is quoted as saying the Koreans are like a terrapin, which conceals its head within its shell, if the circumstances are unfavourable, and issues its head, if the circumstances are otherwise. They are now quiet as they can do nothing at present, but it will be over-sanguine to expect perpetual quietude. He is dissatisfied at the ordinary consideration given to the Il-chi Society in spite of its indefatigable efforts in bringing about the annexation but has been endeavouring to appease his discontented followers.

Mr. Tokutomi remarks Mr. Ye Wan-yong and Mr. Song Phong-chun are the two leading figures in Seoul, but regrets they are not now on friendly terms, in view of the meritorious services both have rendered in expediting the recent annexation.

A gas explosion took place on the night of the 13 inst. in a pit of the Sorachi Colliery near Sapporo. Three miners were killed instantly and the pit collapsed for a distance of 5,000 feet.

EPHESUS.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

If one were asked to put into the hands of an intelligent enquirer a short treatise on the Christian Faith, which should give him in a brief compass a complete manual of what he ought to believe and do, I think it would be hard to find anything more suitable for the purpose than the Epistle to the Ephesians. In this Epistle, which is a calm and closely reasoned document, St. Paul, tells us really all that we require for the Christian life, a statement of the chief articles of the Christian Faith, an explanation of the nature, organization, and aims of the Christian Church, and a summary of those simple rules of life which a Christian must observe if he would walk worthy of the vocation wherewith he is called. The strength of the Epistle lies in its quiet tone which carries with it conviction, and I have read of a man, whom every one acknowledges to have been great and good, though mistaken in many of his ideas, who, being asked to address a missionary meeting in London, somewhere about the year 1830, made an impression on his audience, which lasted for many years, by simply reading to them the whole of this Epistle.

We really know a very great deal about the Church of Ephesus in the last half of the first century A.D. We have in the Acts of the Apostles the account of St. Paul's own activity at Ephesus, and of the charge which he gave to the elders of the Church of that city when he summoned them to meet him at Miletus on his way to Jerusalem. We have his Epistle to the Ephesians, and his letter to St. Timothy whom he had left at Ephesus as Priest-in-Charge or Bishop. We have in the Revelations St. John's spiritual message to the Angel of the Church in Ephesus, who was probably the same person whom St. Paul had left as Bishop. And some years later we have an Epistle written to the Ephesians by St. Ignatius the Bishop of Antioch, which is full of Pauline echoes. If we piece all this information together, it will help us, I think, to understand better the meaning of the treatise.

Ephesus was the capital of the Roman province of Asia, that is, the south-west corner of Asia Minor. It was an important place politically, intellectually, and commercially; a place in which the commerce and thought of the east met with the active life of the west, as it did also in Antioch, Alexandria, Rome, and Marseilles; a place of the utmost importance for that preaching to the Gentiles which was the chief object of St. Paul and his associates.

St. Paul had wished to preach the Gospel there at the beginning of his second missionary journey, immediately after leaving the Phrygian district of Galatia (Acts xvi. 6), but the opportunity was greater in Macedonia. He was forbidden by the spirit to preach in Asia, and the vision of the man of Macedonia guided him into Europe. His European tour, through Thessalonica, Philippi, Athens, ended at Corinth. From Corinth he set sail for Jerusalem, but on the way he touched at Ephesus (xviii. 19), where he left his two companions, Aquila and Priscilla, to do the work which he was not able to do himself. Aquila and Priscilla were presently joined by Apollus, a man of great zeal and faith, though at first poorly instructed, and the three worked together in the service of the Gospel.

Their work was not altogether fruitless. When St. Paul came to Ephesus on his third missionary journey (xix. 1-7) he found a gathering of about twelve men who called themselves disciples, but who had never heard that there was a Holy Ghost. They had received the baptism of St. John, and their faith was not explicitly in Christ, but in Him whom St. John had designated as the "Coming One."

Then began St. Paul's personal work at Ephesus. With this little band of disciples to support him, he preached fearlessly in the Synagogue about the Kingdom of God (xix. 8).

At the end of three months he removed his followers from the synagogue to the school of one Tyrannus, where he preached daily for about two years until all in Roman Asia, Jews and Greeks alike, had heard the Lord's message.

The result was the gathering out (or in) of the Ephesian Church. We know what kind of people they were, from what St. Paul tells us in the Epistle to the Ephesians. They were Gentiles in the flesh (i.e. by birth ii. 11.) Dead in trespasses and sins, they had walked in them according to the course of the mind (ii. 1). They had been without Christ, aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, strangers from the covenant of promise, without hope, and without God in the world (ii. 12).

And then had come to them the grace of Christ. They had heard the word of Truth—the Word of Christ, in whom some of them had trusted beforehand, when their faith had been only in the Unknown Coming One (προηδευκόμενοι), and even while they were yet dead in trespasses and sins they had been quickened. It was Grace that had saved them, they who had been far off had been made nigh by the blood of Christ, and the public burning of their books of magic showed how keenly some of them felt the call of their new faith. Even those who resisted the Gospel were conscious of the power and the sons of Sawa tried in vain to exorcise evil spirits by the Jesus whom Paul preached (i. 12. 13. ii. 5 13. Acts xix. 11-20).

The success of St. Paul's preaching was shown by the opposition which it stirred. The old-fashioned, narrow-minded Jews opposed it; the magicians and soothsayers opposed it; the silversmiths who made the silver shrines of Diana opposed it. The result was the great tumult in which the rabble shouted itself hoarse with cries of "Great is Diana of the Ephesians" and after that it was deemed wise and prudent for St. Paul to leave Ephesus.

He never saw Ephesus again, but he had left the Church at Ephesus an organized body, provided with elders, with Timothy as Bishop (i. Tim i. 3), and in the following year (A.D. 58), when he was again on his way to Jerusalem, he sent for the Ephesian clergy to meet him at Miletus (Acts xx. 17) and there bade them a solemn farewell. "Ye shall see my face no more." It was evidently deemed unwise for St. Paul to visit Ephesus again, and presently the Apostolic care of the Churches in the Roman province of Asia passes into the hands of St. John.

In his address to the Ephesian elders, St. Paul warns them of certain dangers which he foresees (xx. 29). Merciless wolves will get in among them, who will not spare the flock; from among their own number men will arise who will teach perversions of truth, and draw disciples after them.

His personal place among them is gone, but he can still guide them with his pen, and the Epistle to the Ephesians, which may have been intended to serve for other similarly situated Churches as well, is the Manual of necessary teaching which he sends to his spiritual children for their use in time of perplexity. It is indeed "a form of sound words."

We learn from the Epistle itself who were the grievous wolves. It speaks of them as "the circumcision." The Epistles to Timothy mention others by name, Hymenaeus and Alexander, Phygellus, Hermogenes, Demas. And St. John, who succeeds St. Paul in the Apostolic oversight of Ephesus, mentions the Nicolaitans, that sect of Gnostics whose teachings so strangely and suggestively resemble some phases of the Buddhism of Japan. When St. Paul wrote this Epistle it is possible that many if not all of these false teachers had made their appearance. Certainly there must have been in a worldly city like Ephesus that danger of a loss of first love of which St. John complains.

The danger from the "circumcision" (ii. 11) was an old one. It beset St. Paul's work everywhere. It came not only from professed Jews. A party of Christians which sheltered itself, without any real sanction, behind the great names of the original twelve, constantly opposed

St. Paul's activities. These men said that the promises of God were given to Abraham and his seed, confirmed to Moses, and David, opened out by the prophets. Christ was a Jew, the Apostles were Jews, and he that would become a Christian must become a Jew first, and keep the ecclesiastical law. Paul (they did not put the "Saint" to his name), the man who had never seen Christ in the flesh and whose Apostleship was doubtful, might form a body of believers of his own, but they would not be the body of Christ.

And to them St. Paul makes answer. He is an "Apostle by the will of God" (i. 1), and that will, declared at Damascus and Antioch, overrode all human technicalities. He that had willed him to be an Apostle had instructed him as to his message. He knew that he had never seen Jesus Christ in the flesh, but a dispensation of the grace of God had been given him, and it was by a direct revelation, which left him beyond all doubt, that the hidden purpose or mystery of God had been given to him. (iii. 2). And this mystery—"That the Gentiles should be fellow-heirs, and of the same body, and partakers of God's promises in Christ by the Gospel." It was not a special revelation to himself. It had been hidden from ages and generations in the past, but had now been revealed by the Spirit to the Holy Apostles and prophets (iii. 4). He knew therefore that he had the mind of the Church of the Spirit, of the Lord himself, when he assured his readers that they need not trouble themselves about their Church standing. "There is one body," and you belong to it; "one Spirit," and you have drunk of it; and ye know that ye have done so because there is but one hope of your calling, but one Lord, but one Faith, but one Baptism, but one Father. These belong to Gentile as well as to Jew. Only, please walk worthy of your vocation, always humble and gentle, patient and forbearing, and you will come in time to realize your essential unity."

But the others, whom St. Paul does not mention in this Epistle, the Nicolaitans, as St. John calls them in the Book of the Revelations—if we turn to the Epistles to St. Timothy we shall find them.

When I went to Macedonia "he says to St. Timothy," I left you at Ephesus for a special purpose,—that you might impress it on certain people to teach no strange doctrines, and to pay no heed to fables and endless genealogies. (i. Tim i. 4) which do not minister to godly edification, and are nothing but vain jangling. . . . "In the latter times" he says later on, "some shall depart from the faith, giving heed to seducing spirits and doctrines of devils. . . . forbidding to marry. . . . commanding to abstain from meats. . . . declaring that the Resurrection was past already (i. Tim IV. 3:) II. ii. 18), speaking much of wisdom, science, enlightenment, and yet really only babbling about the "antitheses of a spurious gnosis" (I. vi. 20).

If as against the iron exclusiveness of the Jews and Judaizing Christians the Sevenfold Unity of the Church must have acted as a comfort and a consolation, it was needed against the Nicolaitans as a testimony and witness.

The Nicolaitans (Rev. ii. 14. 15) permitted their followers to partake in heathen worship and to eat things sacrificed unto idols. Against them was the testimony of the One Body. They believed in many spirits; like many of the Buddhist sects, they did more than just dabble in magic and a false spiritualism. Against them St. Paul urged the testimony of the one spirit. The Nicolaitans like all Gnostics, like most Buddhists, had many lords, the mind of the man that studies an Gnostic book becomes as confused with the multitude of objects of worship as does the eye of the globe-trotter who enters some popular Buddhist shrine. The Christian who followed St. Paul had but one Lord, and one mediator between God and man, the man Christ Jesus (i. Tim ii. 5), God manifest in the flesh, justified in the spirit, seen of angels, preached unto the Gentiles, believed on in the world, received up into glory, (I. iii. 16). Gnosticism, like Buddhism, had many systems of doctrine. It was all things to all men, but in a sense very different from that which St. Paul gave to those words. The Christian Church, the one Body, never preached but one Faith. The Gnostics had many Baptisms, just like the Baptism administered now at the Temple of Daishisama at Kawasaki where the believer is invited to come soon and to come often, for all manner of purposes. The Christian Church had but one Baptism, and that for the remission of sins. The Gnostic had no God the Father. His Deity was the universe, a thing made up of stones of earth, air, fire, water, worked like a machine. The God whom St. Paul preached was the Father of all, variously apprehended;—above all, transcendent;—through all, imminent, and in you all, spiritually indwelling in the Christian.

"There is one Body and one Spirit, even as ye are called in one hope of your calling; One Lord, one Faith, one Baptism, one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all and in you all."

This is the seven fold unity of the Christian Church, and there is nothing else that we need insist upon.

But let us beware of thinking that the Ephesian Church was a perfect Church in which all these ideals were perfectly realized. To think that would be a great mistake. It would be to misunderstand the whole meaning of the phrase "Christ's Church militant here on earth." The perfection of Christ's Church lies in the future not in the past. And it is because we are working for a future perfection that Christ has instituted ministers in his Church. "He gave gifts unto men." "He gave some men as Apostles." We can see the Apostolic ministry, with its orders and degrees, each helping to bear some part of the Apostolic burden, at work in the Epistles to Timothy, in the second and third chapters of the Book of Revelations, and some years later in the letter of St. Ignatius. But, he gave other gifts as well—men who might be bishops, priests, or even laymen, who had in them the gifts of prophecy, of evangelization, of teaching, of feeding others with spiritual food, and he did not give those gifts to be mere ornaments or former individual glorification. He gave them to be used, and to be used in concert, "till we all come into (eis) the unity of the faith and of the knowledge of the Son of God, unto (eis) a perfect man, unto the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ" (IV. 13). There is the hope of our calling, the future realization of the Sevenfold Unity of Christ's Holy Church; of our own perfection in it.

It is a goodly feast that Christ has prepared for us, and he would bid, as he did once before, be careful to gather up every fragment that nothing be lost."

In the meantime, St. Paul beseeches us as "the prisoner of the Lord," the man that went, "bound in the spirit to Jerusalem," to walk worthy of the vocation wherewith we are called, with all lowliness and meekness, forbearing one another in love; endeavouring to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace."

And this we will do, God being our helper.

ANNEXED KOREA.

BRITAIN AND SIR EDWARD GREY'S SURRENDER.
INTERESTS AT STAKE.
BY LUCIEN WOLF.

There is no reason to take the settlement which has been arrived at in regard to British and other foreign interests in Korea tragically, for it certainly might have been very much worse. Nevertheless, it is far from satisfactory, and it represents a notable surrender of principle and advantage on the part of Sir Edward Grey.

The effect of the settlement is this: The Commercial Treaties go, and in place of the perpetual equality of opportunity guaranteed to us by Japan in the Treaty of Alliance of 1905 we have a limited equality of opportunity for ten years. This concession is confined to import and export duties and tonnage dues, which will be levied according to the existing Korean schedules on Japanese and foreign commerce alike. For the rest, foreigners and their trade will be subject to the existing Japanese treaties, which will now extend to Korea, but only "so far as practicable" and "so far as conditions permit. These reservations are disquieting. Until their exact meaning is established the whole status of foreigners and their "rights and immunities" must depend on the unfettered discretion of the Japanese. In this way their equality of opportunity with the Japanese at the ports may prove—as it has proved in Manchuria—a barren privilege. By our treaty with Korea, for example, we were guaranteed specially against all "additional taxes and excise and transit duties," and by the operation of the most-favoured-nation clause against differential treatment in other respects, such as railway rates and industrial concessions. Nothing of this now survives. The result may be—and the Manchurian precedent brings the prospect very disagreeably within the field of probabilities—that the tariff equality on the coast will be defeated by effective inequalities in the interior.

THE BRITISH BARGAIN.

But even assuming that this doubt is satisfactorily resolved, and the ten years' equality of opportunity is made an honest reality, the bargain is still far from a good one. Sir Edward Grey in his negotiations—for, of course, we must assume that these so-called "rules" are the result of negotiation with Downing Street—held a very strong position. For once a British Minister was able to look upon the annexation of a neutral market with absolute equanimity, for he was effectually protected by treaty. When Lord Salisbury had to deal with the analogous cases of Madagascar and Tunis, for example, he was quite helpless. Surely this advantage was worth more than a ten years' grace. It is, no doubt, true that within those ten years Japan will vastly improve the Korean market, but that she was bound to do in any case. Such an improvement is "unearned increment" of quite a legitimate kind, for it must have been in Lord Lansdowne's mind when he stipulated his price for Japan's freedom of action in the peninsula. The bargain is all the more disappointing when we compare it with what Lord Salisbury obtained in Tunis, where the only advantage he enjoyed was that France was reluctant to give a formal and legal shape to her "de facto" annexation of the Regency. With this slender hold only to work upon, he secured a guarantee of most-favoured-nation treatment for forty years, and a specially privileged treatment of British cottons for fifteen years. I believe that in effect this will be found a much better bargain than Sir Edward Grey has secured in Korea.

QUESTION OF THE OPEN DOOR

It is furthermore disappointing because when he was in opposition Sir Edward Grey led us to expect that he would do much better than poor Lord Salisbury in difficulties of this kind. Last week I quoted some passages from his speeches on the Madagascar annexation and the Open Door in the Far East, in which he severely criticised Lord Salisbury for what he regarded as his weakness on these questions. In the case of Madagascar, for example, he protested that annexation should not be allowed to extinguish our commercial treaty, or that France should be compelled to give us adequate compensation, while in regard to the Open Door, he pledged himself and his colleagues that "they would continue to do their best, and would stand up and ask that the influence of this country should be used in favour of the policy of the Open Door." Now he has had the opportunity of putting his statesmanship to the test. What are the results? Our Commercial Treaty with Korea has been extinguished, without compensation and even without protest. As for the Open Door, Sir Edward has done nothing to preserve it in Manchuria, while in Korea he has signed it away.

One curious feature of the Annexation Proclamation is its unilateral character so far as foreign Powers are concerned. Are we to understand that it is the only document in the case, and that it has not been preceded by formal agreements with the Powers whose treaty rights are overridden by it? It so, it is a distinct violation of the Declaration of London of 1871, by which Sir Edward Grey took his stand in the case of the annexation of Bosnia.

The new colony will be named Chosen, its ancient name.

A project for erecting a bronze statue for the late Viscount Inouye, is now on foot. A meeting of the promoters was held on Monday evening, when Messrs. Soda Heigoro, Inouye Kakugoro, Ogawa Senkichi, and several others were present. Some 43,000 yen was subscribed by those who attended the meeting.

Mr. Ko, Korean messenger of condolence, visited the residence of the late Viscount Sone on the 18th instant, and presented an offering in money sent by Prince Yi and his father. Princes Fushimi, Arisugawa, Yamanashi, Asaka, Takeda, and Nashimoto also sent their messengers with offerings, the same day, to the late Viscount's residence.

On the 18th instant an old woman passing over the railway crossing at Yatsuyama, Tokyo, was run over and killed by an electric car. This sort of accident having occurred four times at the same crossing, the people in the vicinity are so much excited that they are demanding of the Railway Company that it take proper measures for preventing such mishaps.

On Wednesday His Majesty the Emperor summoned Prince Fushimi, Jr., and Takeda to the Imperial Palace and lunched with them in the Chikusa Hall. Marquis Tokudaiji, the Grand Chamberlain, Viscount Watanabe, Minister of the Imperial Household, Admirals Togo, Ito, Inouye, and Yamamoto, and several other high officers of the Navy were also present.

Leading townspeople of Hodogaya met on the 14th instant to discuss the matter of the town being incorporated into the city of Yokohama. It was decided, upon deliberation, that the amalgamation should be postponed until 1917. Mr. Okano, the millionaire of the town, has personally had an interview with Governor Sufu to explain the wishes of the townspeople.

The remains of the late Viscount Sone, which were cremated on the beach of Katase on the 15th instant, were conveyed to Tokyo the next day by his third son, Mr. Sone Toyozo, who was met at Shimbashi Station by many of the deceased nobleman's friends. Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress were pleased on the 17th to grant the sum of 5,000 yen towards the funeral expenses of the late Viscount Sone, in recognition of his meritorious service rendered the state.

Vernacular papers report that a great rival has appeared to supersede the Keihin canal scheme which had already been sanctioned by the Government authorities. The promoters of this second undertaking held a meeting on the 16th instant, when Messrs. Yasuda, Asano, and Ohashi, and several other leading businessmen of Tokyo, were present. It is proposed to dig a canal between Haneda and Shibaura which could receive steamers up to 12,000 tons. The capital of this company to be established is put at 15,000,000 yen, and a 99 year charter will be granted by the Government, after which term the canal will be taken over by the Government.

On the 16th instant Vice-Resident-General Yamagata was received in audience by His Majesty the Emperor, when the Vice-Resident-General submitted to the Throne important reports about the administration in Chosen after the annexation. The chief object of Mr. Yamagata in returning to Tokyo, it is alleged, is to obtain suitable persons to fill the newly-created posts, and he is to consult with the Home Minister about this matter, to whom Resident-General Terauchi has referred the selection of candidates.

At 1.50 p.m. on Monday Mr. Arakawa, the new Mayor of Yokohama, arrived at Hiranuma Station, accompanied by Mrs. Arakawa, mother, and daughter. Literary committee Miss Greener, Miss Thompson, Prof. Purvis, Mr. Stevens, Rev. F. D. Smith. Musical Committee, Mrs. Landes, Miss Leymour, Miss von Fallot, Rev. J. H. Lloyd. The Treasurer postponed his report until the next meeting. After the business meeting the Misses Landis gave selections on the violin and piano, Miss Ruse sang two songs and Mr. Stevens gave numerous recitations.

The funeral of Viscount Sone took place on Monday afternoon at the Aoyama cemetery, Tokyo, with Buddhist rites. At 1 p.m. the cortège left the residence at Sakurada cho, Azabu, the coffin being escorted by a battalion of troops as a guard of honour. Mr. Sone Yasusuke, the chief mourner, and Lieut.-General Murata walked beside the bier. Then came several hundred wreaths sent from Princes, both Korean and Japanese, and other dignitaries followed by large numbers of mourners. The procession reached the cemetery at 2 p.m. and a religious service was solemnly conducted. Principal mourners who attended the service were Marquis Katsura the Premier, and other Ministers of State, Marquises Inouye and Matsukata, Vice-Resident-General Yamagata, Counts Okuma and Itagaki, and many other high officials.

CORRESPONDENCE.

AN INTERESTING EXPERIMENT.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In the Taiyo, the Chuo Koron, and in many newspapers and magazines there have appeared articles dealing with the so-called clairvoyant power of a Japanese lady from Kumamoto, now in Tokyo. Professors Fukurai and Imamura appear to have been convinced by their experiments that this lady really has an at present abnormal and scientifically inexplicable power or faculty of perception. This has aroused the interest of many well-known men in Tokyo, and on Saturday the 17th inst. an experiment was made at which several well-known professors and scientists, together with many newspaper representatives were present. In to-day's Japanese papers, there are long and detailed reports given. In the Jiji Shimpo there is almost a full page, and all of the other papers give prominence to this matter. A report will doubtless also appear in your columns; but anyhow, I will give a short account of the chief features of the experiment culled from the Japanese press, with a few comments added.

Seven of the professors were chosen to write on the same number of cards three Chinese characters on each card. The cards after being written and folded, were then mixed together, and out of these Professor Miyake chose one. This one was then placed in a tin box which was afterwards put inside another box made of wood. This was then covered with various sheets of paper, tied, and sealed with the seals of the professors present. These and other precautions having been taken, Dr. Yamakawa took the box and handed it to the lady in the adjoining room. "If she can read what is inside this box, there will be no room for any further doubt" (utagau yochi wa nai) it was said. The lady took the box in her hands, and after sitting with her eyes closed for about ten minutes, she wrote on a piece of paper the three characters 道德天. Then Professor Inoue Tetsujiro took the box with this paper and showed it to the other experimenters, who theupon carefully examined the box and satisfied themselves that it had not been opened or tampered with. The box was then opened, and inside was found one card with these three characters 道德天 written on it. The experiment was declared to be a complete success. To quote the words of Prof. Inoue Tetsujiro: "When I heard from Prof. Fukurai about this matter, I was in doubt about it, as I had not personally made any experiments; but now that the test has been carried out before my own eyes, I can no longer entertain the slightest doubt (sun go mo atagai wo idakanai)."

Prof. Tanakadate is quoted as saying that in the esoteric division of the Shingon sect there seems to have been some phenomena of this kind, and that probably it comes under the same category. The experimenters seemed to be agreed that the fact of a kind of clairvoyance (translated 透視 and also 透覺) is established, though naturally they wish to conduct further experiments of all kinds. One or two of the gentlemen present wish to make changes next time in the precautionary measures taken, and one of them even suggested that the box containing the card should be enclosed in glass hermetically sealed. Such may be tried at future experiments; but in the meantime it seems highly improbable that a lady who is not a conjurer should be able to play a trick on the leading representatives of the scientific, medical and philosophic world here; especially as they were allowed to take whatever precautions they thought fit.

The fact that among scientists here there is very little prejudice against such investigations, speaks highly for the broad-mindedness and true scientific spirit. The desire seems to be to find out facts and then form the theories; and not merely to force the former to fit the latter. On the other hand one may contrast the attitude of several well-known Western scientists towards questions of this kind. When asked to investigate a case of this kind in Europe, one well-known scientific man refused point-blank to do so because, as he said, "I have settled the question a priori!" Another one replied: "even if the things you mention are true they don't interest me,"—and so on. In fact, whether it is fear of ridicule, or fear that their scientific reputation may be endangered,—there is no doubt that Western Scientists on the whole seem to be strongly prejudiced against psychic investigation. One reason for this is no doubt the fact that there are so many charlatans and visionaries connected with these subjects and so much opportunity for delusion of self and others. For this and other reasons the field of abnormal psychological research has fallen into disrepute. In Japan, however there seems to be complete open-mindedness regarding such investigations, and this in itself is a very hopeful sign.

As Dr. Inoue said, once the existence of this faculty of clairvoyance is admitted, the next thing is to find out the explanation of it. And in connection with this I should like to call attention to the fact that in Theosophical literature this question and also the existence of other latent faculties in man are extensively dealt with. The Theosophical Society was founded in 1875, and one of the objects of the society is the investigation of the powers latent in man. This Society is now a department of a larger organization entitled the Universal Brotherhood and Theosophical Society, the headquarters of which are at Point Loma, California. The society already counts its members by the hundred thousand; and the membership increased fivefold during the last year. Among the members there are representatives of all shades of belief, Agnosties, Christians, Buddhists, and members of many different races. In Japan several well-known Japanese scholars are members, and among those who are studying the teachings here may be mentioned the president of one of the Universities, one of the professors of the Imperial University, and also a Cabinet Minister. One of the best books on the subject of Theosophy has been translated into Japanese, and is now being printed by the Hakubunkan. As in the case of Freemasonry, there is complete freedom as to religious belief and members are expected to be tolerant of the beliefs of others. One of the objects of the Society being to study ancient and modern religions, science and philosophy, this should appeal to thoughtful people everywhere, for surely nothing but benefit can come from an investigation of this kind. In case there are any of your readers who would care to communicate with me, I should be very pleased to send a copy of the "Century Path" (the principal magazine of the Society), and to furnish any information that I am able about the aims and objects of the Society.

Yours faithfully,

EDWARD S. STEPHENSON.

GERMAN VIEW OF THE TERRITORIALS.

London, September 21.

A distinguished German military author, Colonel Gadeke, has an article in the Berlin Tageblatt giving a striking appreciation of the work of the territorials in the recent manoeuvres. He criticizes the infantry a good deal. Of the three chief arms he thinks the artillery the best, and gives the highest praise to the special troops,—the pioneers, the cyclists and the motor-cyclists. He says that what they accomplished was astonishing. He sums up the territorial army as not ready to-day to successfully oppose invasion, the condition of the infantry making this impossible, but says it will soon be a highly respectable army if its growth continues.

THE HELM CASE.

The Helm case has been resumed. The Bench has decided that a prima facie case has been made out. The Court adjourned until the 28th. Bail was refused.

THE TURKO ROUMANIAN CONVENTION.

Later.

The Turko-Roumanian Convention is the theme of the newspapers, which accept it as a fact and comment cautiously in the absence of particulars. While one section deplores the wane of British influence in Turkey and attacks British diplomacy thereanent, the majority consider the Convention an excellent thing as securing the peace of the Balkans, and averting the danger of an explosion of hot heads in Sofia or Athens.

CHINESE OFFICIALS FETED IN LONDON.

London, September 22.

The Court of Arbitration connected with the Chamber of Commerce gave a luncheon to the Chinese Judges and Attorney General who are visiting England on their way to the Prisons Congress at New York.

THE OPIUM CONFERENCE

Great Britain has agreed to the American proposal for the Opium Conference at the Hague but stipulates that the existing British agreement be not included in the discussion.

Later.

With reference to the Opium Conference Great Britain has accepted the suggestion that the finding of the Shanghai Conference should be embodied in the Convention agreed upon by the Hague Conference. Great Britain is willing also to consider the traffic in Cocaine and Morphine but suggests that the Governments interested should previously investigate the manufacture and trade in these drugs, so as to enable them to deal effectively with the matter. Great Britain will lend every assistance to the investigation

UNITED STATES AMBASSADOR AND RUSSIAN PASSPORT.

Later.

Mr. Strauss, United States Ambassador at Constantinople has abandoned his visit to Russia, having been refused the privilege of a passport because he is a Jew. He received only the usual authorization issued to Jewish merchants. The Czar subsequently ordered that a special permit should be given to Mr. Strauss, but it has been declined.

KAISER AT VIENNA.

The Municipal Council, headed by the Burgomaster, received the German Emperor ceremoniously. The Kaiser said that the Austro German Alliance had passed into the belief and life of both peoples as an incalculable influence to the advantage of the world.

GEN. BOTHA'S RESIGNATION THOUGHT INEVITABLE.

Pretoria.—It is feared that Gen. Botha's resignation is inevitable. His change of attitude is due to the capture of two seats by Unionists which were expected by the Nationalists. The discouraging factors are the persistence of Hull not to remain in office, and Botha's ill health. Merriman will probably be summoned.

THE HELM CASE.

The charge of felony against Helm has been dropped but he has been remanded on a charge of misdemeanour.

PRINCE TSAI HSUN ILL IN AMERICA.

Prince Tsai Hsun travelling from San Francisco to New York has been attacked by bronchitis.

THE TURKISH LOAN.

Reuter's correspondent at Paris is informed from an authoritative official quarter, that the French Government regards the Cassel agreement as nothing less than an attempt, on the part of Turkey, to blackmail France, with British assistance.

The Cassel agreement is provisional only, to be effective Oct. 1st in the event that negotiations with France are finally abandoned, but may be regarded as already definite since the French Government will refuse to abate one jot of its conditions. The informant added that if Great Britain is willing to uphold Turkey in joining hands with the Triple Alliance and buying ships and guns from Germany, that is her affair. The French Government will do its utmost to prevent a scrap of the loan paper from coming to the French market.

GERMANY AND THE SPIES.

London, September 16.

Berlin.—Several Germans have been arrested in connection with the alleged espionage case at Bokum. It is stated that they have constantly communicated with the two Englishmen imprisoned at Leipzig.

BRAZIL'S ARMY INSTRUCTORS.

NO DESIRE TO WOUND FRENCH
SUSCEPTIBILITIES.

Considerable irritation has recently been felt in France at the decision of Brazil to employ German officers as instructors to the Army. The Brazilian Minister at Berlin explains that there is no desire to wound French feelings, but Germany permits Brazilian officers to enter her army on condition that she supplies the instructors.

INDIAN CONSPIRACY.

TURKEY AND GREECE.

London, September 17.

Athens.—Despite the determination not to provoke Turkey, disquietude prevails. Thessaly fears a sudden Turkish invasion. It is stated that the Turks have tripled their frontier forces and are accumulating war materials.

THE SITUATION IN INDIA.

London, September 19.

The Times discussing British policy in India says that the tremendous problem of guiding and guarding, and reconstruction is not unsolvable, but it is necessary to make the Indians willing partners and not to permit premature experiments, but to treat their affairs with generous consideration while maintaining that they are not yet fit for self government.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

The Japanese Osaka loan of 1907 is strong.

TURKO ROUMANIAN ALLIANCE.

Paris.—It is reported that a Turko-Roumanian Convention is highly probable, which has greatly increased French objections to loaning Turkey any more money.

GERMAN MANOEUVRES.

The Times has a special report of the German army manoeuvres. It says that the best quality of the army was the use made by all arms of the conformation of the ground in approaching the enemy.

THE CANADIAN RIFLE REGIMENT IN LONDON.

The visit of the Canadian Rifle regiment culminated in a march through welcoming crowds in the streets of London, and an entertainment at the Guild Hall by the corporation of London. The King recently summed up public feeling by declaring that the visit was a good augury of the future Imperial Army. The Minister of War addressed the regiment and said that the visit sealed the new spirit of Empire united for common defense. The Lord Mayor described the troops as pioneer of a great national movement. The colonel replied that hundreds of thousands were ready to reply to the first call.

PROHIBITION OF EGYPTIAN NATIONAL CONGRESS.

Later.

Paris.—The Government prohibition of the meeting of the Egyptian National Congress signifies the determination of France not to be made the scene of public revolutionary agitation against Great Britain, in addition to the fact that France is bound to maintain her own prestige in North Africa.

FRANCE AND THE HUNGARIAN LOAN.

London, September 20.

Vienna.—Irritation and disappointment are displayed at the French refusal of the projected loan.

THE BRITISH EXHIBITION REOPENED.

Brussels.—The King opened the new British section at the exhibition, which has been erected with extraordinary rapidity in place of the section burned in August. The King praised the beauty of the exhibits and thanked the British Authorities for their testimony of friendship. The new section is universally described as a magnificent success.

COTTON SPINNERS' LOCK-OUT THREATENED.

TREMENDOUS CONSEQUENCES INVOLVED.

The Federation of Master Cotton Spinners at Manchester resolved, unless disputes are settled, to close all mills in October. 150,000 operatives are directly affected and the interests of 350,000 others involved.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

London, September 21.

Japanese securities are dull.

AGREEMENT OF INTERNATIONAL MARITIME COMMITTEE.

Brussels.—An agreement has been reached by the International Maritime Committee, on which Japan was represented, regarding the difficult questions of salvage and collisions. The treaties will shortly be signed. This is the first attempt to unify the rules of Commercial law.

THE JAPANESE TARIFF.

The Times special correspondent at Tokyo says that in reference to the Tariff question the Japanese desire to conciliate public opinion, so a way will possibly be found to remedy cases of the greatest hardship, especially where anti-British discriminations can be proved.

THE EMPEROR OF GERMANY.

Vienna.—It is remarked that Emperor William, who has arrived to visit Emperor Francis Joseph, looks older, thinner, and less animated than the Austrian octogenarian.

FRANCE AND THE TURKISH LOAN.

London, September 22.

Paris.—It is generally believed that the Grand Vizier provisionally accepted the offer of Ernest Cassel to raise a loan if the French Government declined to sanction the quotation arranged earlier by the French Syndicate. The Government is determined not to yield to any attempts to induce it to alter its resolve, and to guard investors against a clandestine issue.

TURKEY AND THE DRUSES.

Constantinople.—The Druses have been summoned to surrender, deliver up their arms, pay taxes and submit to conscription.

(RECEIVED BY THE "KOKUMIN SHIMBUN.")

RESIDENT-GENERAL TERAUCHI.

Mr. I. Tokutomi, Editor of the Kokumin Shimbun, who recently proceeded to Seoul, says in a telegram to his journal on Monday that what attracts the attention of a visitor to Korea is, first, the signs of abundant crops, unprecedented of late years, secondly, the unexpected quietude prevailing, and thirdly, the very calm attitude maintained by Resident-General Terauchi. One who has seen him cannot find any vestige that he has executed the great task of annexation. He is solely occupied with daily business. Mr. Tokutomi, who visited Resident-General Terauchi, summarises what the latter told him as follows:—Prince Yi (former Emperor) and other members of the Imperial Korean family, are all satisfied with the liberal treatment given to them by the Japanese Emperor. The Yangban (expectant officials) class and literati believe that the annexation was inevitable, and that they could only but acquiesce in the general trend of the situation. Other people rather welcome annexation. One of the causes is believed to be the fact that they have been exempted from the arrears of the land and other taxes, which constitutes a substantial act of grace. But some people in the regions out of the way appear not to know of the change in situations. Thus it has been decided to add translations in the Korean syllabary to all instructions and notifications in Japanese. The Resident-General receives reports every twenty four hours as to the conditions in various districts in Korea. Quietude is not confined to Seoul, but other districts are also generally calm, though the literati occasionally circulate wild rumours and students privately sing anti-Japanese songs. All political societies have been dissolved without any hitch. Upon the promulgation of the organic regulations of the new Government-General, many Japanese and Korean official will be discharged, but they will be given due consideration. Foreign circles in Korea have not only raised no objections against annexation, but some members have personally visited Terauchi and presented congratulations. Representative missionaries, also visiting him the other day, said that they could hereafter engage in evangelistic work at ease, and promised not to interfere with politics. The Resident-General then emphasized the inadvisability of confusing religion and politics. His Excellency believes that the so called missionary question will no longer recur by any means. Altogether, the general programme is already settled. What has to be done now is to carry it out. That is, means of communication will be developed and productive industries encouraged, with a view to contributing to the material progress of Korea. Much patience and coöperation are still imperative, in order to inspire true brotherhood and to morally assimilate the Koreans.

The Kokumin Shimbun's correspondent infers that no matter what event occurs in the future, what General Terauchi contemplates will be generally carried out. For the sake of humanity and civilisation, the world at large may rest confident in General Terauchi's unquestionable ability and broad-mindedness.

("DEUTSCHE JAPAN-POST" SERVICE TO THE "JAPAN HERALD.")

FRANCE.

Berlin, September 15.

The flotation of a Turkish loan at Paris has been admitted.

GREECE.

The speech from the throne made on the occasion of the opening of the Greek National Assembly has been of a very neutral and conciliatory character.

HOLLAND.

The King and Queen of Belgium have arrived at Amsterdam for a visit to Queen Wilhelmina.

BULGARIA.

The Bulgarian Ministry has resigned en bloc.

RUSSIA.

The Russian Council of War has proposed to suspend the post of Chief Commander in the Amur Province.

THE DESTRUCTION OF ZEPPELIN VI.

Berlin, September 15.

The Zeppelin Passenger Airship No. VI. has been completely destroyed by fire owing to an explosion in the airship hall at Stuttgart; no loss of life has taken place.

THE RUSSIAN IMPERIAL FAMILY.

Berlin, September 16.

The family of the Tsar will remain in Germany during the month of October, perhaps even longer; in the latter case a meeting will take place between the Kaiser and the Tsar.

HOLLAND.

The King and Queen of Belgium have been received at Amsterdam in a very cordial manner. De Courant emphasises the strong rapprochement between Holland and Belgium.

RESTRICTION ON TRAVEL IN TIBET.

The St. Petersburg Telegraph Agency reports that China has made a declaration, according to which pilgrims are to travel freely in Tibet, but explorers or travellers are not to be admitted.

PORTUGAL.

The new Portuguese Chamber will perhaps be adjourned until after the investigation of the objections to the election of several members.

NEW TRIPLE ALLIANCE RUMOURS.

Berlin, September 17.

Rumour are being spread from Russia, England and France that the conclusion of a new Triple Alliance between Germany, Austria and Turkey is imminent. These rumours are officially contradicted by the German Government.

RUSSIA.

The Birschewja Wjedomosti reports that the Kaiser will pay a visit to St. Petersburg during November. This report is contradicted at Berlin.

GERMANY.

The Kaiser has gone to Mohacs in Hung-

y for a hunting trip as a guest of the archduke Franz Ferdinand. The opening of this year's session of the Reichstag will perhaps be somewhat postponed.

NEW COLONIAL UNDER SECRETARY.

Herr Boehmer, the Burgomaster of Metz, has been nominated Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies. He has made himself known by his reforms in the financial administration of the city of Metz. He adopts a political standpoint midway between the Free Conservatives and the Liberals. He has good relations with financial and industrial circles and is also well favoured by the Kaiser.

Berlin, September 18.

The silver wedding of the Grandduke and Grandduchess of Baden will be celebrated on Sept. 20th.

THE FOREIGN MINISTRY.

Rumours are being spread from Russia, which are not confirmed up to now, according to which Count Stolypin will take the position of Minister for Foreign Affairs after M. Iswolski's resignation.

PORTUGAL.

The King of Portugal has issued a rescript of amnesty for all political and press offenders.

SIBERIAN MAILES.

Siberian mails, with dates up to Sept. 3rd at Yokohama, arrived at Berlin on Sept. 18th.

RELATIONS WITH THE ARMENIANS.

The conflict with the Turkish Government has been settled by concessions on the part of the Patriarchate.

ITALY.

The selling of the Italian armoured cruiser Pisa to Greece, which was reported some time ago to have been settled, is not confirmed up to now.

DEATH OF M. NELIDOFF.

Berlin, September 19.

M. Nelidoff, the Russian Ambassador at Paris, is dead owing to an apopleptic stroke which occurred some weeks ago. It is again rumoured that M. Iswolski, the Minister for Foreign Affairs, will be his successor.

ALLEGED GERMAN SPIES ARRESTED.

Two German officers have been arrested at Moscow on suspicion of espionage. They, however, were released soon after, no proofs having been found.

GERMANY.

Prince Tokugawa, the President of the Japanese House of Peers, has arrived at Berlin.

Berlin, September 20.

The German Crown Prince and Crown Princess will leave for Ceylon from Genoa on Nov. 3rd on board a Nordde. Lloyd liner. The suite of the Crown Princess will consist of the following persons: Freifrau von Tiele-Winckler, Graefin Grote, Graf Bismarck, Kammerherr von Behr.

The Chancellor returned to Berlin from his country-seat for five days to participate in the Ministerial conferences as to the new Budget.

Herr Boehme, the Burgomaster of Metz and new Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, has been commanded to immediately enter on his new duties.

Bishop Henninghaus of Kiautschou has been honoured with the Second Class of the Prussian Order of the Crown.

Joseph Kainz, the well known actor, born on January 2nd, 1858, has died from cancer of the stomach.

The people of Baden have extended enthusiastic ovations to the Grandduke and Grandduchess on the occasion of their silver wedding.

M. Iswolski, the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, has gone to Friedberg to confer with the Tsar.

AUSTRIA.

The Austrian Press welcomes the Kaiser on the occasion of his visit to Schoenbrunn in a very enthusiastic manner.

BELGIUM.

Queen Wilhelmina will pay a return visit to the King and Queen of Belgium at Brussels during October.

GERMANY.

Berlin, September 21.

The various German Consuls in the different towns touched at by the Crown Prince and Crown Princess on their way to Ceylon will act as guides to their Highnesses; at Colombo Consul Freudenberg will act as guide. The Crown Prince intends to come into personal touch with the members of the German communities at all places visited by him.

The Kaiser, on the occasion of his visit to Schoenbrunn, has had a special conference with Count Aehrenthal, the Austrian Minister for Foreign Affairs. He deposited wreaths on the graves of the Empress Elisabeth and Crown Prince Rudolph.

Prince Heinrich of Preussen will pay a visit to the Tsar at Friedberg on Sept. 26th.

The administration of the Shantung Mining Company is considering the construction of a blast furnace and of steel plate works in Kiautschou.

THE NEW REMEDY.

The Ehrlich-Hata 606 preparation has been very favourably criticised at the Medical Congress now being held at Koenigsberg by all professors, also by Professor Neisser, the well-known specialist at the University of Breslau.

HOLLAND.

The speech from the throne, given at The Hague on the occasion of the opening of Parliament, expresses the strong hope of a continuing improvement of the economic situation owing to the development of the Colonies. It further announces a revision of Customs tariff, a universal income tax, the introduction of a workmen's insurance law and the carrying out of reforms in administration. The Budget shows a deficit of 126 million Fl. in the Netherlands Indies, which necessitates the introduction of new taxes.

RUSSIA.

The delimitation of the Niemen and Baltic Sea frontier between Prussia and Russia is imminent.

TURKEY.

The negotiations as to the conclusion of a Turkish loan at Paris have again suffered an unexpected interruption.

MOTOR-DREADNOUGHTS.

Recently telegrams have appeared announcing the building of tremendous and mysterious fighting machines by both England and Germany. These ships are declared to be capable of destroying Dreadnoughts, and also to be quite invulnerable on account of exceptionally thick armour plate. All this is possible, but what one cannot reconcile is the high speed claimed for these heavy ships—heavy they must be if the armour-plate is of the thickness described. Also in each instance the telegrams declared them to be motor-driven.

So far no known motor-type marine engine has even been credited with being able to develop high speed; in fact 14 knots is all that is claimed for the motor-driven passenger-freight ship now building in Germany. Motor-type engines are certainly economical and convenient but unless the naval departments have made discoveries not known to other Engineering plants, the speed claims must be put down as exaggerations.

It is also interesting to note that Engineering Journals, with dates as late as the first of the present month, commenting on this very subject do not indicate any such unusual developments. The following article is from a well known London Engineering Journal, and is written by an authority.

Referring to the report that it is proposed to fit internal-combustion engines to a British battleship, this writer says:—

“The difficulties are associated with the design of a satisfactory gas-producer rather than with the engine, and the spirit of aspiration prevailing must be satisfied with the conviction that not only are constructive engineers, but Admiralty officials devoting experience and complete knowledge of the conditions to the solving of the problems. It is easy to manufacture a producer which will run efficiently with anthracite coal, but, as has time and again been pointed out, this fuel is not only limited in supply, but its distribution throughout the world is restricted, and thus, although the consumption, measured by unit of weight, may be low, the cost per unit of power must be high, while the unreliability of supply is operative in the case of a fleet which is spread over the whole globe. Nor is it quite clear that there will be economy either in space occupied or in weight. It is very problematical, too, whether funnels can be dispensed with, as the exhaust from the engines has to be disposed of. There may be a saving in the complement in the stokehold staff, and other gain but consideration must be had to the net result, when advantage and disadvantage alike in economy and weight and cost are carefully balanced.

We have much greater hope of the oil engine, because here no producers are required, and it is possible to save largely in space occupied and also in weight. Moreover, the time occupied in filling the tanks must be considerably less than in coaling ship, while the space utilisable for storing oil on board ship is less valuable, from the point of view of fighting requirements, than that of coal bunkers. Courage is necessary in adopting the oil-engine in place of, or in association with, the steam-turbine, because of the high efficiency realised by, and the strategic advantages of, this widely-adopted system of propulsion.

It is true that the fuel consumption per unit of power must be considerably less with the oil engine, and that there are other advantages, but when it is remembered that at the present time the unit of power adopted in practical work in the case of oil-engines is very small, and that an advance in size introduces difficulties more pronounced than a similar increase in the case of many mechanical appliances, it will be seen that naval constructors, as well as Admiralty officials, must walk warily in view of the seriousness of failure. We are, nevertheless, certain that within a short time the oil-engine will be applied, at all events tentatively, for the propulsion of warships—a view which is the more justifiable when consideration is had to the distinct success achieved in submarine craft. Moreover, on the Continent there is every indication of a great step being immediately taken, because we learn on good authority that oil-engines with single cylinders, of a power up to 2000 horse-power, are being built experimentally for marine purposes, and that the problem of reversing has been overcome to such an extent as to justify distinct promise of success. In this work the German naval authorities are said to be interested to a considerable extent, and they have agreed to a certain measure of financial support. Various naval shipbuilding firms also are involved.

It is important, therefore, that our Admiralty should encourage in the immediate future more than in the past the valuable research work which is in progress. The potentialities of success established by the experimental work of at least one of our naval construction firms are such that there is justification for the authorities at Whitehall offering financial support in connection with the application of the system to a destroyer or even a second-class cruiser. It is scarcely fair that the financial responsibility of possible failure should rest entirely upon the company, in view of the great tactical advantages which would accrue from the application of the system. Given conditions which promise a tactical success, the Admiralty, we think, might very reasonably adopt the conditions accepted by at least one Continental power, of paying one-half of the cost of the experiment in the event of failure, while agreeing to pay the full cost in the event of success. Alternatively, if satisfied that the promise of success is based on sound engineering knowledge and experience, the work of fitting a cruiser should be carried out on the principle of "time and lime." We have no doubt that success would be achieved, if not immediately, certainly as the result of trial and error; and in the interests of naval progress and commercial supremacy we hope that the Admiralty will take such steps. For the present, however, no definite decision has been come to in connection with the application of internal combustion engines, but the Admiralty are watching the development of events with greatly intensified interest.

A YEAR OF TARIFF LAW.

"It has been kicked down-stairs by Democratic god-parents and disowned at family gatherings of its own people, yet despite cuffs, kicks, and misrepresentation its first year of life ends with a record of achievement not equaled since customs ports were first opened on America's shores." In these words the New York Tribune's Washington correspondent pays glowing tribute to the Payne-Aldrich Tariff Law, which celebrated this month its first birthday anniversary. In justification of his enthusiasm the correspondent cites the latest tariff figures issued by the Treasury Department and the Department of Commerce and Labor, from which we learn that the new law does represent revision downward, and that "as a producer of revenue it is so far ahead of all other tariff acts that an attempt to compare any of them with it is not comparison, but contrast." Chamb Clark, the minority leader in the House, has declared that "the average rate of the Payne Law is at least 2 per cent. higher than the average rate of the Dingley Law." According to the figures now published "the average ad valorem on all imports during the year were about 4.5 per cent. lower than under the Dingley Law." Moreover, the customs receipts for the first year of the Payne Law "averaged $1,000,000 for every working day," which gives a monthly average "about $6,000,000 in excess of the Dingley Law receipts." We are further informed that the imports for the past twelve months have broken all records, while the exports exceeded those of 1909. To quote further from the Washington correspondence of The Tribune (Rep.):

"It appears from the statistics that President Taft was entirely within the facts in his two principal statements respecting the Payne Law. On the day he signed the bill the President said he believed it to be the result of a sincere effort on the part of the Republican party to make a downward revision, and six weeks later, at Winona, Minn., he declared the Payne Law to be the best tariff ever proposed by the Republican party.

"Another measure of a tariff law's success is the amount of materials imported under it, for it follows that if the imports of these materials are gaining, labor is protected and employed.

The value of imported manufacturers' materials, including both crude and partly manufactured, amounted to $856,000,000 in 1910, against $673,000,000 a year ago, $410,000,000 ten years ago and $287,500,000 twenty years ago. Thus imports of manufacturers' materials in 1910 were larger than ever before, and were 109 per cent. greater than a decade ago and 198 per cent. greater than two decades ago.

"Expressing the hopes of the Democrats Champ Clark predicted that on March 3, 1910, there would be an increase in the tariff duties of 25 per cent. on account of the maximum and minimum clause of the Payne Law. He saw the United States involved in a commercial war with reprisals against this country by all the leading nations of the world. The maximum rates have not been invoked against a single nation. Instead of causing a calamity, the maximum and minimum clause vindicated the assertions of its friends that it would be a blessing. It enabled the President to gain great concessions for the products of the American farm, mine, and factory in foreign markets, embargoes against American products being removed and other harassing restrictions being eliminated."

"The Payne Tariff Law," declares the St. Louis Globe-Democrat (Rep.), "has fulfilled all, or almost all, the promises of its friends, and has refuted all the accusations of its enemies."

The New York Journal of Commerce (Com.) and the Boston Herald (Ind.), on the other hand, point out that the Payne Law had "important help" in making its showing as a revenue producer. Thus "it is admitted," says The Journal of Commerce, "that an increase of at least $12,000,000 customs receipts was due to the 'rehabilitation service' and the 'improvement of its morale.'" Another cause of the increase of revenue, we are told by this paper, "was the revival in the import trade of the country that came after the depression of 1908, which latter was not caused by the tariff, and that set in long before the passage of the Tariff Bill."

The existence of indefensible schedules in the Payne Law, remarks the New York Tribune (Rep.), "simply makes manifest the force of President Taft's contention that adequate and accurate revision was impossible with existing machinery." Looking to the future the Cleveland Leader (Rep.) says:

"The tariff board is now in the midst of a careful inquiry into the cost of production, here and abroad.

"It is the belief in Washington that the board will not be in a position to make a report at the session of Congress next winter.

"President Taft, it is understood, has approved the suggestion of Republican members of Congress that a joint rule be adopted limiting the revision to schedules to be specified, which are not now satisfactory. Agitation for this plan will be started in Congress next December.

"The disadvantages of opening the entire tariff to amendment are so apparent that it is probable Congress will adopt this rule. Neither Congress nor the business world relishes the prospect of another long period of tariff uncertainty."

THE UNITED STATES IN LIBERIA.

SIGNIFICANT EXPRESSIONS BY PRESS OF VARIOUS COUNTRIES.

Summing up all the various European comments, American papers emphasize that of the London Daily Mail:—"No enmity parts England from the great trans-Atlantic Republic. Her speech is our speech, her institutions are in essence ours," and apparently pay very little attention to the few adverse comments from other countries:—

"The Free State of Liberia is to receive the financial, administrative, and protective help of Washington. Bankrupt, disorganized, and unable to take care of itself," declare the European press, "the negro Republic is to be made into an 'American Egypt.'" This important step in American expansion is by no means looked upon unfavourably by the European Powers whose interests lie in Africa. To what extent it may be looked upon as an American expansion is best learned from the following account of the transaction as detailed in the London Times:

"The United States Government has intimated to the Liberian Government its willingness to assist Liberia in placing the Republic on a stable basis by taking entire charge of the finances, military organization, agriculture, and boundary questions of the country.

"The American Government has throughout been in communication with London, Paris, and Berlin and the scheme formulated in Washington is understood to have the general approval of those governments. The Monrovia Executive has also expressed satisfaction with the American plan, but when the various details have been worked out it will be necessary for the legislature of Liberia to meet and formally to approve the measure. Meanwhile, on the suggestion of the United States, Liberia has appointed Mr. R. P. Falkner, head of the late American Commission to Liberia, Special Financial Agent in the United States and Europe for Liberia. President Taft has asked Messrs. Kuhn, Loeb & Co., the New York bankers, to arrange for a loan, and a member of this firm is now in Europe discussing the details. The loan will probably be for £4,000,000, and will be shared by American, French, and German banks. It will be employed first of all in paying off the two existing British loans, as well as the internal loans and floating debt, and the Customs will be hypothecated for its service. It is proposed that the Financial Board at Monrovia shall include members of the various countries interested, under the presidency of an American."

This is less inconsistent than the way in which other territories have been treated by the United States, declares the Manchester Guardian, which highly approves of the arrangement, and remarks:

"It seems an excellent arrangement, and most of the West African towns will be grateful to America for taking the lead. A few American critics have disapproved this interference by the United States in Affairs, on the ground that it is inconsistent with the Monroe Doctrine. It is less inconsistent than the Protectorate over the Philippines; and the United States have always taken an honorable interest in Liberia, which, as every one knows, was founded by a party of repatriated negroes from the Southern States. . . . The international character of the financial control will, we hope, be a guaranty that greater consideration will be shown in the future by the great neighbors of Liberia for an experiment in native government which those who know the country best are reluctant to write down wholly as a failure."

The appearance of "a new Power in Africa" is "a change which will affect future history," observes The Daily Mail, "as perhaps no other event in the last twenty years, with the single exception of the Fall of Port Arthur." "In this act we may recognize Mr. Roosevelt's masterful teaching." To quote further:

"This appearance of the United States in Africa is momentous in every way. For the first time the United States appear in the Eastern hemisphere and are brought into close touch with Old-World policy and politics. The annexation of Philippines and of Hawaii, which gave the United States their first Colonial possessions at a distance from the homeland, was the natural consequence of the position in the Pacific. But now they enter another continent, and one in the most intimate relation with European rivalry. Britain, Spain, France, and Germany already have interests in West Africa. Henceforth the United States are added to the list. The event is one which we in this country shall heartily welcome. No enmity parts England from the great transatlantic Republic. Her speech is our speech; her institutions are in essence ours."

Referring to the fact that "Liberia has taken admitted rank as a failure," The Pall Mall Gazette (London) thinks that "the guardianship of the United States is the best solution of the difficulty." "The United States is not to escape her share of 'the white man's burden,'" says The Tablet (London), "and, to do her statesmen justice, they show no disposition to shirk it."

France has rights in that part of Africa which she feels sensitive about, as we learn from the Journal des Débats (Paris) in which we read of all the friendly things French colonizers have done for the Black Republic. This paper remarks that Mr. Knox has overlooked French claims, and tells us:

"We are the people who possess the longest common frontier with Liberia, because Guinea and the Ivory Coast make us neighbours for 800 kilometers, while England is conterminous for only 200, and this, combined with our friendly treatment of Liberia, gives rights which ought not to be overlooked."

Sept. 24, 1910.]

America's action in Africa. The Koelische Zeitung says the English papers, The Pall Mall Gazette and The Daily Mail, quoted above, favor the action of the United States because they think it will help in ultimately reimbursing the English holders of Liberian Government bonds. The act was mainly not one of pure benevolence or originating a desire to share the "white man's burden," as the Vossische Zeitung (Berlin), and this states its views:

"It is superfluous to say that this project for helping negroes did not originate in any sentimental view. Probably the prospect of securing a coaling station in West Africa had very much more weight with American statesmen. As soon as it can be made clear to Congress that this first step in expansion can only have one ending—the transformation of this negro Republic into territory ruled over by whites yielding rich returns to them—then all the good in the country with a pious smirk will approve a dark act of annexation."

Although the United States "will not be shaken in adherence to the Monroe Doctrine in North and South America, yet now the Government at Washington is planting its foot on the third continent of the earth," reflects the Frankfurter Zeitung, but adds assuringly:

"People are making a mountain out of a molehill in this matter. If America will help Liberia with good money and Liberia submits to be dependent of the great transatlantic Power, no one has one ground for complaint on the plea that rights already granted to other Powers are being infringed. This is by no means the case as far as we can see. There seems to be little reason why Germany should refuse to give out that she is quite agreeable to the step taken by America. Whether she later has not assumed a burden which later on she will find somewhat irksome, is her own business." Translations made for THE LITERARY DIGEST.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THREE new cases of Cholera occurred in the city of Kobe on Monday, making six in all since the outbreak of the epidemic this year.

ON Saturday a serious landslide occurred at Naniwa, Minouchi, Nagano prefecture, resulting in the destruction of several houses, and rice-fields of fairly large dimensions. Two horses were also buried alive.

EARLY on Wednesday morning a fire occurred at Asahigawa, Sapporo, resulting in the destruction of over 40 houses. The branch office of the Colonization Bank and the Yuraku-za Theatre were reduced to ashes.

ON the night of the 13th instant the N. Y. K. steamer Kokura Maru on her way from Kobe to Yokohama, collided with a Japanese sailing boat off Hinomisaki, Kii province. The crew, four in number, of the latter vessel were all saved by the steamer, but the boat, with its cargo of lumber, went to the bottom.

A REGULAR MEETING of the Japanese Trade Association was held in Tokyo on Tuesday evening, 80 members being present. Baron Oura, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, who attended the meeting, made a speech referring to the importance of coöperation and union of the Japanese tradesmen in order to keep Japan on a par with the countries in Europe and America in foreign trade.

ON the 17th instant the steamer Heian Maru (267 tons) ran on a rock, during a dense fog off the coast at Kumoyamabe, Soya gun, Hokkaido. The stranded vessel was assisted by the No. 5 Koyei Maru which towed her toward the shore, but the Heian Maru sank when still three miles from land. The mail matter was all taken on board the Koyei Maru, and the passengers and crew are all safe.

THE population of larger Berlin numbered on the 1st of January, 1910, about 3,670,000 inhabitants. The forthcoming census on the 1st of December will surely show more than 3,750,000. In 1871 the whole district had only 900,000 inhabitants. Within thirty-nine years we have an increase to three and a half times the original population. Berlin proper has now 2,120,000 inhabitants and still has a preponderance over its seven suburbs with an aggregate of about 3,000,000, the remainder falling on rural districts. But at present the increase of the Berlin population is much slower than that of the suburbs; it was only 20,000 in the last year, against from 40,000 to 50,000 in former years, when it was not yet hemmed in on all sides. One reason for the rapid growth of the suburbs is the splendid tramway traffic in all directions. For a penny one is carried from the eastern to the western boundary of this enormous area.

THE O.S.K. steamer Shokwa Maru (2,622 tons) which arrived at Moji on the 13th instant from Formosa, encountered a furious storm the preceding day near the Kisshibi Lighthouse. While proceeding at low speed, the vessel ran on a sunken rock. At daylight on Tuesday she was refloated with the assistance of the high tide, and arrived at the Bahé Fortress in the Pescadores a few hours later, where first-aid measures were immediately taken, after which she sailed for Moji.

A KYOTO telephone message reports that a man who was arrested a few days ago by the Nakadachiuri police of that city, surprised the officials by confessing that he committed a murder at Nihonyenoki, Azabu, Tokyo, in November last. He said that he perpetrated the crime only for the sake of forcibly obtaining some money from Mrs. Kudo. The offender, states he has been tormented day and night by the ghosts of the three children whom he so cruelly murdered.

THE Eiffel Tower in Paris, which for some time was regarded as a useless mass of iron, is now proving itself of great service in the extension of wireless telegraphy. The latest feat which it has accomplished is the regular nightly despatch of signals to all vessels and stations within 3000 miles of the tower. The clock room in the Paris Observatory has been connected by a special wire with the wireless apparatus at the tower. On the stroke of midnight Paris time is now flashed to every coastal and maritime station within a radius of from 2500 to 3000 miles, and to every ship on adjacent seas and oceans. It is estimated that the signal reaches the coast of West Africa, the whole extent of the Mediterranean, almost all the northern Atlantic, the English Channel, the North Sea, Great Britain, and practically the whole of Central and Western Europe. The signal enables ships at sea to take their bearings with an ease and accuracy hitherto unknown.

AN amusing incident occurred in the Lobby at Westminster last month. A well known Scottish Liberal member saw a small company of Japanese visitors in the central hall. They appeared to be very forlorn. No member looked their way, and they had no ticket. "Can I," he said, "be of any assistance to you?" He was assured that he could. They ardently desired to see their allies at work in Parliament and to see where they smoked and gossiped. The member at once took them in charge, and for a good hour the company had the best of times. Then they all returned to the central hall. Nothing remained but to say good-by. There was a shaking of hands and much fraternal expressions, for the friendly guide is a great man in the promotion of international good will. Finally one of the visitors approached him and gave expression once again to the sense of their indebtedness. He did more. As he shook hands he left a florin in the good man's palm!

THERE is a proposal in the United States to encourage young writers of promise by scholarships and prizes. Mr. Upton Sinclair is the strongest advocate of the plan. He points out that many great authors were men of means, that others received pensions and that men of genius have suffered much and even died from want. He believes that if, in future, provision were made for literary men who produced works of originality and worth the world would be greatly the gainer.

All authors are not agreed as to the merits of this plan. Many say that it is scarcely possible in these days for any work of merit not to receive recognition. Others think it would take from literary men the spirit of independence necessary for really good work, to raise them above the necessity for exertion. Most of the older men who have made their mark in the world think that no good purpose would be served by such a foundation as is provided for in the Nobel prizes in Sweden. The younger writers, on the contrary, think that when a man has once proved that he has real talent he and the world would be benefited by allowing him time for thought and study. This they think the necessity of earning a livelihood too often prevents.

Consumption
Can be Cured

Derk P. Yonkerman, Specialist, whose Discovery of a Cure for Consumption has startled the World.

Marvellous as it may seem after the centuries of failure, a cure for consumption has at last been found. After twenty years of almost ceaseless research and experiment in his laboratory, the now renowned specialist, Derk P. Yonkerman, has discovered a specific which has cured the deadly Consumption even in its far advanced stages. In many cases, though all other remedies tried had failed and changes of climate were unable to check the progress of the disease, this wonderful specific has conclusively proved its power to cure.

Whatever your position in life may be, if you are in consumption, or suffer from asthma, bronchitis, catarrh, or any throat or lung trouble, this cure is within your reach, for it is a home treatment and need not interfere in any way with your daily occupation. Learn for yourself of its healing power,

ABSOLUTELY FREE.

Simply send your name and address to the Derk P. Yonkerman Co., Ltd. (Dept. 21), 6, Bouverie Street, London, E.C., and they will post to you a free book on the treatment by this remarkable remedy.

Don't hesitate or delay if you have any of the symptoms of consumption. If you have chronic catarrh, bronchitis, asthma, pains in your chest, a cold on your lungs, or any throat or lung trouble, write to-day for the free book of instructions, and cure yourself before it is too late.

DEATHS.

WISMER.—At Wharf, near Bremen, on September 26th, 1910, EMIL WISMER (former partner in the firm of Messrs. H. Ahrens & Co., Nacht.), under an operation.—(By cable.)

TENNY.—Entered into Rest, on Tuesday evening, September 27th, at the Yokohama General Hospital, GRACE WEBB, the beloved wife of Rev. CHARLES B. TENNY, and only daughter of Mr. and Mrs. HENRY M. WEBB, of Rochester, New York,—aged 27.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A FUSAN telegram says that the members of the Educational Society there have established a library at the cost of 15,000 yen.

MR. DICKINSON, the U.S. Secretary of War, is reported to have left Peking on Monday evening for St. Petersburg, whence he will proceed to Berlin and Paris on his way home.

THE amount of Japanese exhibits sold at the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition from the opening day till August 20th is reported to have reached the total of 373,320 yen, making some 4,390 yen a day on an average. The sale at the Mexican Exhibition which was opened on the 2nd ultimo, amounted on the 15th to 65,000 yen.

THE destroyer Inazuma which was recently refloated, not being found strong enough for use even after repair, it has been decided to sell the hull, removing all the guns and fittings.

GENERAL OSHIMA, Governor-General of Kwantung, is expected to return home in the latter part of October for the purpose of witnessing the grand military Manœuvres in Okayama prefecture.

THE new O.S.K. Tacoma liner Mexico Maru, displacing 6,200 tons and costing 1,200,000 yen, leaves Moji on the 26th instant for Yokohama. She will start on her maiden voyage on November 1.

AT 7.27 p.m. on the 26th ultimo a slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama, lasting one minute and fifty-eight seconds. The oscillations were principally in a northerly and southerly direction.

THE shooting season of this year will begin on the 15th instant as usual. It should be noted that the shooting tax have been raised to 30 yen for the first-class, 15 yen second-class, and 4 yen third class.

THE bill for Nagoya Harbour Construction was at last rejected, on the 21st ultimo, at a meeting of the City Council, on the ground that the undertaking would be too much of a burden to the city at this time.

A HANKOW telegram reports that missionaries despatched from two universities in England, to establish a university in that city, have set about the purchasing of a site and are investigating plans for a building.

IT is reported as being already decided that Prince Yi of Chosen will visit Japan next spring to pay respects to His Majesty the Emperor. Preparations are said to be going on already in the Shotoku Palace.

FIVE hundred students from Chosen are at present studying in Japan at the Imperial University and other Government and private schools. It is reported that these students are conspicuously backward in mathematics.

THE Prince Imperial, who is now staying in the Niijo Detached Palace, Kyoto, will visit Maizuru on the 6th instant to attend the launching of the destroyer Umikaze. His Highness will return to Kyoto the same day.

ON the 22nd ult. a lofty camphor tree growing near the Seventh High School at Shiroyama, Kagoshima prefecture, was blown down by a sudden gale, causing great damage to the school kitchen. A cook was killed and another seriously injured.

AN Osaka despatch reports that on the 25th ult. a dry goods store owned by Mr. Ito, one of the great wholesale merchants in the East Ward of that city, was destroyed by fire, resulting in the loss of some 600,000 yen. The warehouses were saved, however.

IT has been arranged that on and after the 1st instant first or second class passengers between Japan proper and Formosa by the Osaka Shosen Kaisha steamers can buy railway and steamship combination return tickets, obtaining thereby a discount of 20 per cent. These tickets are available for 90 days from the date of issue and can be obtained at Shimbashi, Hiranuma, Nagoya, Kyoto, Osaka, Kobe, Hiroshima, Hakata, Nagasaki, Kumamoto, and Kagoshima Stations, and from agents in Tokyo, Yokohama, Nagoya, and Osaka.

IT is reported that the Department of Communications, in anticipation of an increase in passengers and freight between Japan proper and Chosen, will open a steamship service under Government supervision.

AMERICAN papers report that President Taft will visit the Philippine Islands before the expiration of his term of office. The voyage, however, will be made on board a man-of-war which is taken as a part of American territory. The vessel will call at Yokohama to coal.

THE British cruiser Newcastle is about to be despatched to the Far East to take the place of the stranded Bedford. The vessel is armed with two 6 inch and ten 4.7-inch guns and ten torpedo-tubes. The displacement is 4,800 tons, horsepower 22,000, and speed 26 knots on an average.

A KOBE despatch says that the Mitsubishi Company is now undertaking the expansion of its business towards the eastern part of that harbour, planning the exclusive control of the stevedoring business. Messrs. C. Nickel & Co. and the Kobe Pier Company are reported to have entered negotiations with the Mitsubishi Company.

THE Department of Communications gazetted on Tuesday a convention concerning postal money orders between Japan and Annam, Cambodia, Cochin-China, Laos, Tonquin, and Kwangchowwan. The maximum amount permitted in an order is 1,000 francs and the charge is 20 sen per 50 francs. The convention will be carried into effect on and after the 1st proximo.

THE Department of Communications has gazetted the revised regulations for using P. O. Boxes. The main points of the alteration are that those who use these boxes may apply to post offices to deliver postal matter in the boxes, through the hands of post officials, in order to prevent mail matter from being lost; also that the differences in the rates of charge be avoided as much as possible.

IN connection with the enforcement of a law recently passed by the U.S. Congress for the compulsory installation of wireless telegraphy on those vessels carrying over 50 passengers, coming to and going from American ports, the Japanese Department of Communications will install such apparatus at the Government expense on steamers which have not yet been equipped in this way, and detail necessary officers for the transmission of messages as on shore. The N.Y.K. Formosan liner Sanuki Maru and the O.S.K. liner Kasado Maru have applied for such facilities to be given.

THE sum-total of reigning Sovereigns is not altered by the deposition of the Emperor of Korea, since by a happy coincidence, Europe had just added one to the list of her Kings. But the number of ex monarchs, victims of the restless spirit of the age, is considerable. There is Abdul Hamid, and his brother in adversity the late Shah of Persia. Africa has several dethroned potentates in the ex-Sultan of Morocco, Dinizulu, and the ex-Queen of Madagascar; whose misfortunes are balanced on the other side of the globe by her late Majesty of Hawaii, Liliuokalani. But the most pathetic figure in this gallery is, of course, the Empress Eugenie, who lost her crown just forty years ago.

CHOSEN.

It is telegraphed from Seoul to the Mainichi Dempo that the question of text-books for use in Korean schools has received very earnest attention. It is obvious that many parts of these books require alteration in view of the changed national status of the country. On the other hand such a work demands careful thought and patient research. Time therefore is needed, and it has accordingly been ordered that the text-books hitherto employed shall continue in use as a temporary measure, but that wherever the expression "national language" (kokugo) occurs, it shall be interpreted to mean the Japanese language. Of course it is quite evident that any radical substitution of the language of Japan for that of Chosen is out of the question. Their native language cannot be banished from the homes of the Koreans. All that can be done is to institute a compulsory course of Japanese in every primary school throughout the country.

It appears that the re-organization of the Korean administration, as carried out thus far by the Resident-General, involves the dismissal of about 200 high officials and the abolition of a number of offices, the result being an annual saving of $1\frac{1}{2}$ million yen. We read in the telegrams and in an interview given by Mr. Arai to a newspaper correspondent at Shimonoseki, that the remissions and abatements of taxation in connexion with annexation cause a loss of revenue to the extent of 6,380,000 yen, and it is therefore necessary to effect drastic economies in the administration. Great success has attended the improved methods of collecting taxes. Thus sources of revenue which yielded 3 million yen in 1906, now yield the double of that amount. After the above reductions of the staff are effected, there will remain an establishment of 5,300 officials, 2,000 of whom are Japanese.

Mr. Arai adds that there are not likely to be any further great reductions of staff for the present. Questioned, on the subject of Government monopolies, he explained that it would be premature to make any definite statement on that matter to-day, but he was at liberty to say that a salt gabelle would be instituted within limits duly adapted to the convenience of private enterprise. He repeated the remark made by every one familiar with Korea, namely, that the urgent need of the moment is means of communication. Parts of the Peninsula are as thickly populated as are parts of Japan, whereas other districts are virtually tenantless, and this unequal state of affairs is attributed mainly to the want of roads and railways.

It is alleged that the insurgent leader, Yi Pong yung, who has hitherto been heard of mainly along the Russo-Korean frontier, crossed the Tumen into Korea from Chientao on the 21st ultimo. He was in company with several followers, among whom is said to have been one of the men who belonged to the party of Prince Ito's assassins and who signalized his association with them by cutting off the little finger of his left hand. This party of men, consisting, as it does, mainly of desperate characters, is causing some apprehension, and the police are watching vigilantly.

The Resident-General has had a tactful inspiration. He purposes taking steps to preserve the national treasures of Korea, especially the buildings to which historical interest attaches. There never yet has been any resolute attempt to trace the archaeological connections between the civilization of Japan and that of Korea. No Niel Gordon Munro has brought his genius to bear upon this subject. Yet it is a subject of the greatest possible interest. For in the olden times the intercourse between the two countries was very intimate, and the debt Japan owes to Korea has never been fully calculated.

The 24th ultimo being the Japanese national holiday known as Shūki-kōreisai, some interest was felt in the manner of its celebration in Chosen. Telegrams now announce that the streets of Seoul were beflagged and that there was every indication of loyalty to the new régime. Even the vernacular newspapers were unanimous in welcoming the day and in agreeing that the manner of its celebration was significant.

It is stated that the return of Mr. Yamagata to Chosen will take place in a few days, and that after his arrival in Seoul the Resident-General will set out for Japan. The latter event is expected to take place about the 10th of October.

The emigration of Koreans across the Tumen into Russian territory has reached excessive dimensions during the current year. Taking the province of Hamgyong-do alone, the number of these emigrants in 1907 was 570; in 1909 it rose to 741 and during the current year from January to June the total was 700. This of course is quite independent of annexation, since only those behind the scenes had any anticipation as early as June last that annexation was imminent. The fact is that the northern provinces of the Korean Peninsula are inhabited by a very penurious population, many units of which are unable to find a sustenance in the land of their birth.

The Nippon says that Japan's formal announcement of the annexation of Chosen has elicited official acquiescence from all the Powers with one or two exceptions. What countries constitute the exceptions our contemporary does not say, but it explicitly deprecates a sinister inference. The Interpretation it puts upon the delay is that, owing to the summer vacation and other causes, these Powers have not yet fully completed their investigations as to the effect that annexation is likely to produce upon the rights and privileges enjoyed by their nationals in the Peninsula. Doubtless when they have completed these investigations they will show themselves as complaisant as other States have been.

Our readers are aware that there is in Korea an association calling itself the Menkwa Sanbai kyokai, which devotes its energy to the growth and export of cotton. This association has now nearly 4,000 acres of land in cultivation, and last year it exported cotton to a value of 1,400,000 yen. It expects ultimately to extend its area of growth to something like 400,000 acre, and at the end of 40 years it looks to export ten million yen worth of this staple. It is evident that these figures are in some respect defective, for an area of 4,000 acres, however prolific the soil, could scarcely produce cotton to the value of a million and half yen approximately, and if it did give such a crop, 400,000 acres would yield far more than 10 million yen worth. At any rate we may conclude that the cotton-growing industry in the Peninsula is progressing steadily. Of course this is a subject of great importance from the point of view of Japanese spinners.

It appears that Chosen has fared much better than Japan in the matter of the rice crop this year. The yield in the Peninsula is said to be considerably above the average, but the exact dimensions of the excess have not yet been calculated. In the province of Kyongkwi-do the crop is said to be larger than that of last year by 188,141 koku.

The Railway Board offers to Japanese subjects an extraordinarily cheap opportunity of visiting the Korean Peninsula. A train containing not more than 200 second-class passengers will leave Shimbashi on the 5th of October, and will carry its tourists right through, to Shimonoseki where they will embark for Fusan, and thence proceed by train to Seoul and Antung. The whole trip will occupy 19 days, and the cost of a ticket, food included, will be only 33 yen. It is evidently impossible that the Railway Board should recoup its expenses out of such a pittance, but we may assume that the monetary question is a minor consideration, the main object being to arouse Japanese interest in Chosen. The enterprise illustrates one of the advantages of State Railways. A private company, or a combination of private companies, would never undertake such a task on such terms.

The method of distributing the funds in possession of the Il Ching-hoi's headquarters is said to have been definitely decided. The original proposition was to hand the money over to an agricultural company which formed a branch of the Party. But this project has now been abandoned, and it has been resolved that the money shall be divided equally among all the members of the Party. In consequence of this arrangement the officers of the Party, who had been placed under arrest, have been liberated. The total fund in question is said to be 50,000 yen.

A United States journal called the Worcester Telegram, writing on August the 29th, drew vividly upon its imagination, and described the Korean Court after annexation as having "a lot of new dukes and nobles of lesser distinction, with the Japanese well sprinkled into the list." Our contemporary was even sufficiently well informed to add that "some of the former aristocrats living at the expense of the Government are dropped from the list." This publicist's regard for accuracy and truth must be so great that he will be dangerously shocked to learn the real facts of the case, namely, that there has not yet been published any list of newly created Korean nobles whatever. But the time for its publication is now getting very near. The Kokumin Shimbun predicts that the list will appear during the first ten days of next month at latest. It will comprise 50 names, according to the same authority, and there will be five ranks of nobility precisely as there are in Japan, namely, princes, marquises, counts, viscounts and barons.

It was anticipated that when the moment came for dissolving the various political parties in Chosen, difficulties would arise about the disposition of their funds. It does not follow that any charge of dishonesty was intended against the people of Chosen in general. The idea was simply that these political parties, with perhaps one or two exceptions, were mushroom growths, organized by pure adventurers and having no basis of real earnestness. The forecast is apparently finding fulfilment. The Il Ching-hoi, as stated in our last issue, has settled its monetary affairs in a satisfactory manner, but the Il Ching-hoi was precisely one of the very few Korean associations which had a genuine raison d'être and which was under the direction of sober men. On the other hand the Party known in Japan as the Shimpo-to has arraigned its leader Min Yong-in on a charge of peculation in connexion with the funds of the Association. An interesting collateral fact is that these funds assume in the telegram the form of onkin, which would seem to signify that the money was obtained originally in the shape of a grant from the Court. It is expected that many similar complications will be brought to light in the cleansing of the Augean stable.

A curious complication has occurred with regard to taxation in Korea. Illiterate folks who cannot fully decipher written documents, whatever kind of script be employed, have conceived a mistaken notion about the scope of the recent edict absolving the defaulting tax-payers from making good their arrears, and have fallen into the error of supposing that the whole of the taxes this year are to be remitted. Accordingly, when the collectors make their appearance, they find empty-handed folks to deal with, and it is said that great difficulty is experienced in getting any money at all from these people.

Under the new administrative organization in Chosen no less than 35 judicial tribunals are to be dissolved. The exact reason of this change is not given, but we may assume that these tribunals are judged superfluous under the new system. The result will be that the following courts of law will constitute the whole of the judicial machine:—Court of Cassation, 1; Appeal courts, 5; Local courts, 8; and District courts, 68.

It is explained that the Bureau of Investigation which is to be created in the section of General Business in the Korean Administration is a specially important body, as its functions will include the collection of materials for the drafting of a civil code. This means that the Bureau will have to inquire into all the customs and usages that have prevailed in Korea for centuries back. The head of the Bureau is to be Mr. Counsellor Ishizuka. We read in Tokyo papers that the finances of the Korean dominion are to be placed on the same footing as those of Formosa and Kwantung. That is to say, they will be included in the special account and not entered in the general budget.

A telegram from Seoul to the Asahi Shim-bun says that the extra pay granted in consideration of serving in Chosen will be 40-per-cent. in the case of Sonin officials, and 60-per-cent in the case of Hannin. Whether these figures include all allowances we are doubtful, for it is generally said that the total of Japanese pay and allowances in Korea makes approximately the double of what is received in Japan proper.

Korea enjoys the general reputation of being decisively a non-progressive country. Yet we gather that in some directions Korean ideas are decidedly go-ahead. The latest instance of this is a society founded with the object of succouring persons who have passed the age of self-support. In connection with this movement the Governor General's office has been approached with a petition for granting old-age pensions, but the application has been refused on the ground that the time is inopportune for such a step.

INSURGENTS.

We hesitate greatly to pronounce any definite opinion, but it really does seem that the insurrection in Korea is practically at an end. The telegrams of this morning state that the province of Kwan-on-do, which has hitherto been the chief centre of disturbance, is now completely pacified, and the inhabitants are so much gratified that they recently proposed to send a deputation to Seoul for the purpose of expressing their gratitude. They were finally dissuaded, however, from adopting this course by the local officials, who pointed out that the restoration of peace and good order was a normal function of government and did not call for any special expression of gratitude from the people.

Another incident not without significance is that an insurgent leader, by name, No, who has a following of 80 men, recently surrendered to the Japanese police in Seoul, and confessed his errors, having been led to take that course by perusal of the annexation edict. Of course the interpretation of this may be that, with the passage of the Peninsula completely into Japanese possession, men like Mr. No recognize the futility of further disturbance. Still there is a considerable interval between merely desisting from insurrection and openly confessing the part one has hitherto been taking in it. The telegram adds that after hearing his statement and admonishing him stringently, the police signified that No might consider himself pardoned.

From Chiholla-do, also, comes news that 200 insurgents who, having surrendered some time ago, had been subsequently engaged on public works, fell within the scope of the annexation amnesty, and were consequently released from all restraint. They have therefore taken their way homewards, carrying with them the money earned by their work and they are said to have shown high elation.

On the other hand, the anti-Japanese feeling which, though existing previously, has been accentuated by the annexation, gives further evidences of activity. Thus we read that a certain Yi has been discovered to be carrying on an agitation in the neighbourhood of Seoul and the police are looking for him carefully. He is believed to be an emissary of Yi Pong-yun, the Vladivostock notoriety.

MR. YAMANE ON CHOSEN.

Mr. Yamane, a well-known member of the Japanese Diet, discusses at some length in Japanese journals the nature of the reforms most earnestly needed in Chosen. Afforestation heads the list. For centuries back the hills have been ruthlessly denuded of their timber, and the country is now practically treeless. Next in order of importance comes the removal of filth. This is left to accumulate, decade after decade, and one of the results is extensive poisoning of the wells. It is of prime importance that a supply of pure drinking water should be furnished. Then there is the question of small-pox. The separation of the sexes is so rigid in Korea that it is exceedingly difficult to arrange for the vaccination of females by male doctors, and it has been found necessary to teach the art to female nurses in hospitals. Mr. Yamane inveighs strongly against the habit of early marriages in Korea. When a boy reaches the age of thirteen, he is immediately linked to a girl one or two years older than himself, and the prevalence of this pernicious custom will be understood from the fact that 66 per-cent. of the students in the Seoul Foreign Language School have wives, and in the Normal School and the Law School there is not one un married. Another crying need is a supply of competent female physicians and midwives. The mortality among Korean women in child-birth is appalling. They cannot be induced to employ the services of male practitioners, and there are no qualified female nurses. This authority has also a good deal to say about hospitals and medical men. In short, he considers that hygiene and therapeutics are the fields calling for greatest efforts of reform in Chosen.

A CHIENTAO QUESTION.

We do not gather that things are moving altogether pleasantly in Chientao. The question of jurisdiction appears to be causing some trouble. The convention concluded between China and Japan in September 1909 provided for the opening of four places, namely, Lungchingtun, Chutschie, Toutaokou and Taitsaokou. These places were duly opened, but detailed regulations relating to jurisdiction have not yet been compiled, and in their absence the Chinese police are said to be endeavouring to assert an undue measure of authority. They have even gone to the length of placarding the Japanese Consulate with a number indicating a police station, and when the Consul caused this to be removed, it was immediately renewed. The Chinese are understood to desire an arrangement similar to that existing between the Shantung Authorities and the Germans at Tsingtao. But for some reason which is not explained the Japanese object to such a system, and we now read that Mr. Nagataki, Japanese Consul in Chientao, has just left Japan with instructions to settle this question.

DECEPTIVE REGISTRATION.

It is a familiar fact that much evasion of taxes and rates is achieved in Japan by the simple device of registering a house or a lot of land in a class below its intrinsic rating. But few people have any adequate conception of the extent of this abuse. The Niroku Shimpo has just published some startling figures on the subject. Taking the wards (ku) of the metropolis separately, it gives the following:—

Ward.	Registered as Rice-fields.	Registered as Miscellaneous.	Number of owners wrongly registered.
	Tsubo.	Tsubo.	Totals.	Tsubo.
Shiba.....	800,300	2,670,800	3,471,300	93
Azabu ...	5,84	29,763(?)	35,567	69
Yotsuya...	—	486,800	—	8
Ushigome.	12,300	10,620	22,924	63
Koishikawa	15,511	221,825	237,336	170
Hongo ...	28,202	78,471	96,673	81
Shitaya ...	74,229	67,315	141,544	64
Asakusa...	41,217	3,181	44,398	65
Honjo ...	70,143	18,337	88,480	127
Fukagawa	23,315	13,309	36,624	102
Kojimachi	—	—	—	—
Akasaka...	4,421	47,528	51,949	46

It is not suggested, of course, that all the above land is fraudulently registered for the purpose of evading taxes. What has happened is that the original registration has remained unchanged from the outset. The result, however, is fiscally the same.

THE ADMINISTRATIVE MACHINE IN CHosen.

The Kokumin Shimbun has a telegram from Seoul with reference to the new administrative system. It says that the machinery will consist of five Bureaux (Bu) and one section (Kyoku). The Bureaux are that of General Affairs (Sōmu), that of Home Affairs, that of Agriculture, that of Justice and that of the Treasury. The Section is that of Railways. The Bureau of General Affairs will include a section of Foreign Affairs. The official buildings for these various administrative bodies are to be erected on a site immediately behind the present Residency-General, the structures now standing on that site being removed for the purpose. It is expected that all these organizations will be published before the end of the current month, though the consent of the Privy Council and the sanction of the Emperor have still to be obtained. There is a rumour that the Resident-General desired to have the administration of the Peninsula made responsible to the Emperor direct, but this project did not obtain general approval, and it was ultimately decided that the offices in Chosen should be considered a part of the Cabinet in Tokyo, instructions from the Minister President of State being conveyed to Seoul through the colonization Bureau.

As to the choice of the first Governor-General of Chosen, there has been a good deal of talk between advocates of a civil official and advocates of a military. There are no intrinsic arguments that can be marshalled on either side, but in the sequel of events as hitherto ordered the probability is that the choice will fall upon a military man.

There was also some discussion as to whether the Section of Railways should be attached for purposes of control to the South Manchuria Railway Company, but the decision was finally in favour of keeping it under the jurisdiction of Seoul. Mr. Oya Gomei will be the first head of the Section.

We read in the Asahi Shimbun that the regulations for the organization of the new administration in Chosen are to come before the Privy Council on Monday, and as their approval by that body is a foregone conclusion, they will probably go into operation on the 1st of next month. The powers entrusted to the Governor-General—who, it may be marginally mentioned, is confidently expected to be Viscount Terauchi—will be the same as those vested in the Viceroy of Formosa, and therefore included in these powers will be the control of military and naval forces on exceptional occasions within the limits of the Peninsula and its waters. Immediately under the Governor-General will be the Vice-Governor-General, who will also be the General-Manager of the Administration (Gyōsei-sōkan). Under the Gyōsei-sōkan there will be five Boards, as already mentioned in these columns, namely, those of Foreign Affairs, of Home Affairs, of Agriculture and Commerce, of Finance and of Justice. The heads of these various Boards will be Mr. T. Ariyoshi (Sōmu-bu), Mr. M. Komatsu (Bureau of Foreign Affairs, which will form a part of the Sōmu-bu), Mr. J. Kiuchi (Agriculture and Commerce), Mr. Y. Kura-tomi (Justice) and Mr. K. Arai (Finance). The head of the Home Affairs Board is not yet fixed.

As for the provinces, the thirteen prefects are to be chosen as far as possible from Japanese and Koreans in equal numbers.

The Emperor himself attended the meeting of the Privy Council on Monday when the administrative organization in Chosen formed the chief subject of debate. The issue of the Council's deliberations is not yet definitely known, but it is believed that the administrative machine, as proposed by the Government, has obtained unanimous approval and will be promulgated without delay. The present expectation is that simultaneously with the promulgation of the new system, patents of nobility will be granted to the Korean officials who have taken a prominent part in the annexation arrangements, and at the same time the method of distributing the sum of 30 million yen appropriated for the Yangpan and others will be announced. The money will of course be paid in the form of pension bonds.

The Privy Council which had its meeting on the 26th ultimo, adopted practically without alteration the scheme of administrative organization submitted by the Governor-General in Chosen and approved by the Tokyo Cabinet. Speaking broadly, there is to be a Governor General's office (Sōtokufu), in which will be comprised five sections (Bu) namely, those of General Affairs (Sōmu-bu), of Home Affairs (Naimu-bu), of Finance (Takushi-bu) of Agriculture Commerce and Industry (Nōshōkō bu) and of Justice (Shihō-bu). It should be explained that the expression "section" used here may be regarded as the equivalent of "Department" in Japan proper. The Sōmu-bu is virtually the equivalent of a cabinet, and will be under a chief like all the other Sections. But there will also be a Chief of Administration (Gyōsei-sōkan), who will rank next to the Governor-General. Further, there will be three Bureaux independent of the Sections, and these will be under the direct control of the Governor-General. They are the Bureau of Investigation (Tōrishirabe-kyoku); the Railway Bureau (Tetsudō-kyoku) and the Communications Bureau (Tsūshin-kyoku). As for Foreign affairs and Finance, they will be under the management of special Bureaux in the Sōmubu, namely, the Gaiji-kyoku and the Kaiki-kyoku. Further, in the Section of Home Affairs there will be the Bureaux of Education (Gakumu-kyoku) of Local Affairs (Chihō-kyoku) and of Police (Keimu-kyoku). There are of course other arrangements of detail but they follow a natural order. It is said to have been settled that the incumbents of the various principal offices shall be as follow:—

Governor-General, General Viscount Terauchi
Head of the Administration, Mr. Yamagata Isaburo.
Head of the Section of General Affairs, Mr. Ariyoshi Tadakazu.
Head of the Section of Home Affairs, Mr. Usami Katsuyoshi.
Head of the Section of Financial Affairs, Mr. Arai Kentaro.
Head of the Section of Commercial, etc. Affairs, Mr. Kiuchi Jushiro.
Head of the Section of Judicial, etc. Affairs, Mr. Kuratani Yuzaburo.
Head of the Bureau of Police, Major General Akashi Motojiro.

Head of the Bureau of Investigation, Mr. Ishizuka Yeizo.
Head of the Bureau of Railways, Mr. Oya Gomei.
Head of the Bureau of Communications, Mr. Ikeda Kyusaburo.
Head of the Bureau of Local Affairs, Mr. —

As for local administration there are to be twelve Governors of Provinces (Dō), and presumably a Prefect of Seoul, though this is not explicitly mentioned. There will further be Urban and Rural Headmen (Fu-in) (Gunshi) to the total number of 310. The Governors and the Urban Headmen will be all Japanese, and the Rural Headmen will be entirely Koreans.

SOCIALISM IN JAPAN.

In answer to the criticisms uttered and penned by the advocates of free thought and free speech in all conceivable circumstances, the Japanese Authorities are quoted by the Mainichi Dempo as saying that the policy of laissez aller has been tried to the full and has failed. The greatest possible leniency was practiced for many years by the Government in dealing with the evil of Socialism, but the result has been merely to encourage its spread. Therefore the policy of stern suppression has been reluctantly adopted and will be pursued to the full.

There is a sensational side to everything but opinions often differ as to the elements of sensationalism. One would suppose, for example, that when, for the first time in the history of Japan,—a history stretching back at least 15 centuries—a deadly plot is concocted against the person of the Sovereign, those salient features of the case would be found sufficiently sensational. But no! to certain onlookers much greater prominence is given, and much more attention is directed, to personal liberty of the suspects and to alleged severity in dealing with them. Surely it is a somewhat perverted code of morality which insists on demanding the highest administrative consideration in behalf of men and women who show their consideration for their fellows by scheming to shatter them into fragments in order to advance a cause which would be the curse of humanity were it adopted? The Japanese police and the Japanese judiciary are employing vigorous measures to search out, seize and bring to trial the leaders of a mad and ruthless conspiracy, and instead denouncing the conspirators, certain publicists are crying out that the most objectionable features of the whole affair are the secrecy of the police and the severity of the authorities. They talk of the free atmosphere of heaven as the best agent for diluting poisonous doctrines and they would even have a bomb-thrower handled with gloves. Well, the truth seems to be that there has been too much of the free atmosphere of heaven, and that instead of choking the noxious weeds, it has encouraged their growth. The socialists in Japan have hitherto been treated with leniency amounting almost to deference, and the consequence is that they have been encouraged to make themselves conspicuous by plotting a foul crime. They will now have to breathe a little of the not so ozoniferous atmosphere of a jail, and those that sympathise with them can inveigh against the punishment of the sin rather than against the sin itself.

THE TARIFF.

The Fiji Shimpō has a very strong article on the subject of the new tariff. The gist of the argument is that Japan, from every point of view, is bound to pay the utmost deference to English wishes and interests in the matter of customs dues. She is bound alike by financial and political expediency. By political expediency because England is her ally and because the value of the Alliance is beyond all question. By financial expediency, because London is the chief money-market of the world. Just as France has closed her purse-strings to a Hungarian loan on the ground that the money would go to assist the Triple Alliance against the interests of Russia, France and England, so British capitalists may button their pockets against Japanese loans if British goods are fiscally penalized. It is quite true that the new tariff conventions must be concluded on a basis of reciprocity, and it is also quite true that England, being a free trade country, has divested herself of the wherewithal to purchase concessions from foreign Powers. But that contention has only partial force. There must be several special products of British manufacture which do not compete with anything exported from other countries and which may therefore receive special treatment in a new conventional tariff. In short, the Fiji says in effect "where there is a will there is a way;" and as the Japanese nation unquestionably has the will in this case the way ought to be discoverable. We imagine that in thus speaking the Fiji expresses the sentiment of practically the whole Japanese nation, or at any rate of such portions of it as give attention to matters of this sort. On the other hand, there is the Nippon which justly remarks that it is by no means an easy matter to reconcile conflicting interests. The Foreign office in Tokyo has an exceedingly difficult task to find a via media between its own inclinations and the most-favoured-nation claims of other Powers.

The Fiji Shimpō continues to discuss the tariff question in strong terms. It emphatically condemns what it calls the Government's want of prevision in fixing the customs' duties. Chiefly is this true in the case of Japan's ally, England. If consideration was due to the trade of any country, that country was essentially Great Britain, whose friendship is so necessary to Japan and who has always shown herself such a sincere and useful friend. It is not to be wondered at that the tariff has caused umbrage in England and has elicited condemnatory criticism even from journals which are habitually well disposed. The Fiji extends its comments to all countries. It insists that the point of view of each Occidental Power deserves just as full consideration as the point of view of Japan. For example, Germany exports over 40 million yen worth of goods to Japan and imports from Japan less than three millions, so that in Japanese eyes she seems to deserve little consideration. But if we look into the question more minutely we find that Germany's exports to Japan represent 1 per-cent. of her total export trade, and that her imports from Japan represent about the same fraction of Japan's export trade, so that the two countries are practically on the same footing. The fact is that in framing a tariff the principle of give and take must be fairly applied. One-sided arrangements defeat themselves.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

The citizens of Tokyo certainly have no reason to complain that the electric trams do not furnish food for comment. Whenever there is a lack of sensational material in the field of general news, some pen is immediately pointed at the Railway. The attack is now led by the Mainichi Dempo, which affirms that the Company has reduced by twenty the number of its cars running between Shinagawa and Ujieno. If we credit the Mainichi, the Directors of the Company must be wonderful jugglers, for they seem to keep twenty cars up their sleeve and to pull them out at a moment's notice whenever police supervision is about to take place. The absurdity of the whole story is too palpable to need pointing out. Tokyo's attitude towards its electric railway does not reflect too favourably on its citizens' sense of equity.

The Mainichi Dempo continues its campaign against the Tokyo Railway Company. The immediate point of attack is the Company's failure to complete the network of railways designated in its charter by the end of the current year. The Directors of the Company, on their side, claim that they cannot be held responsible for the delay inasmuch as the building of the lines depended from the outset on the completion of certain parts of the city-improvement scheme, which has not yet been carried to a finish.

Referring to this subject, we find a note in the Hochi Shimbun which says that a section of the members of the Municipal Assembly advocate applying to the present situation a clause of the charter which provides that in the event of any neglect of duty, the necessary work may be undertaken by the Governor of Tokyo or the Municipal Authorities at the Company's charges. The Department of Home Affairs points out that this provision cannot possibly be enforced with regard to an extension of the Company's lines. Such an interpretation would be manifestly inconsistent with the intention of the charter.

The whole trouble seems to be that many people suspect the Company of having reduced the number of cars, a suspicion which appears to be founded on the overcrowded state of the vehicles. Of course Tokyo can never hope to have a really satisfactory service of tramcars until it consents to pay a reasonable fare and thus acquires the right to limit the number of passengers carried by one vehicle.

An agitation in favour of municipalizing the Tokyo Railway is again on foot, and seems not unlikely to grow, though its final outcome is more than difficult to predict. The advocates of the measure are represented as claiming that a good opportunity offers for coercing the Company in connection with the latter's failure to implement its charter as to building suburban lines. About 100 miles of these lines remain to be constructed, but their building depends largely upon the progress of the City-Improvement Scheme, and as these long-distance trams cannot possibly pay with the present irrational system of fares, the Company has no special desire to approach the work. This is a result which was foreseen long ago. In our own columns it has been insisted time and again that the suburban districts of Tokyo could never hope to be supplied with trams unless the scale of fares was altered. The citizens are loud in their complaints about dirty cars and excessive crowding, but until they agree to pay a fair price for a fair service things must always remain unsatisfactory. Meanwhile talk is heard of the nationalization of the Railway. Even that would be better than the present condition.

THE HUNG HUI SZ

The Viceroy of Manchuria seems to have at length been roused to a sense of the duty of thoroughly cleansing from the Hunghutsz nuisance the districts under his jurisdiction. It is said that his Excellency has issued orders for combining all the forces, civil and military alike, that are available for such a purpose, and extensive preparations are being made for a simultaneous attack upon the various regions which form headquarters of these pests. We do not look for any very signal results, as the Viceroy does not possess either funds or forces sufficient for a radical remedy of this perennial evil. But it is at all events comforting to find that the old laissez aller policy is to be replaced by practical methods.

In this context we observe a statement that the Russian Government has presented to the Chinese a claim for 50,000 taels, representing compensation for losses incurred by Russian subjects at the hands of Hunghutsz. The Chinese are said to have replied that they will recognize and pay the claim provided that the Russian Government pledges itself to abstain from imposing any restrictions on the exercise of police force by China in Manchuria.

It is authoritatively stated in Tokyo that the outrages committed by the Hunghutsz in Antung-hsien have been very numerous of late. The Chinese Authorities have given arms to all the people and directed them to defend themselves. In the upper reaches of the Yalu River, also, pirates have made their appearance, and the River Police have been ordered to keep strict watch.

THE INUNDATIONS.

Baron Hirata, Minister of Home Affairs, has just returned to Tokyo from a three-weeks' tour of inspection through the inundated districts. He appears to have been profoundly shocked by what he saw. The ravages wrought by the floods are especially conspicuous in the three prefectures of Ibaraki, Gumma and Miyagi. In the two former prefectures the river Tone, and in the two latter the river Kitagami, are still wandering over the country, converting whole districts into lakes, and how to lead these rivers back to their original channels there is as yet no feasible plan. In Aomori, which was recently devastated by a ruinous conflagration, the floods inflicted a finally crippling blow, and in Fukushima 40 houses were overwhelmed by landslips so that their inmates are in a state of complete destitution. The Minister does not give any hint as to the course the Government intends to adopt, but he lets it be plainly seen that in his opinion the dimensions of the calamity call for a strong national effort. The Baron speaks of the vital importance of some means to save the people from wholly losing heart in the face of such a catastrophe.

CHINA.

The number of prominent persons in Peking who are gradually associating themselves with the reform movement shows a constant tendency to increase. Prince Tsai tao has now definitely joined that side of the political world. He has memorialized the Throne in favour of increasing the army; abolishing the queue, and having recourse to foreign money for the development of China's natural resources. There will be some difference of opinion as to whether queue-cutting deserves to be placed in the same rank with the two other measures advocated by the Prince, but there can be no difference of opinion as to the vital necessity under which China labours to provide herself with an adequate army. She has lived for many centuries in the conviction that a policy so uncivilized as recourse to arms should always be avoidable by intelligent nations. But unfortunately in that respect she is far ahead of the rest of the world. No country is afforded any consideration unless she has physical strength to enforce it, and if China adheres to her traditional faith in this matter she will certainly have a rude awakening one of these fine mornings.

Acting under instructions from the Wai-wu-pu, the Governor of Shantung has definitely forbidden Chinese newspapers to circulate reports of a nature unfriendly to Germany. Some time ago rumours were persistently published to the effect that Germany had increased, or was increasing, her troops in Shantung with the object of vigorously asserting the rights that she claimed to have obtained from the Chinese Government in the matter of building railways and working mines. These rumours are explicitly referred to in the veto edict issued by the Governor, and newspapers are warned against giving currency to such stories. This is certainly a legitimate interference with freedom of speech. The only trouble is that so soon as a Government undertakes to contradict one set of rumours, it becomes inferentially responsible for the truth of everything that it does not deny.

Washington telegraphs that when Prince Tsai-Hsun recently visited San Francisco en route for Washington and New York, quite a considerable demonstration was made at San Francisco by the members of the Chinese Young Men's Christian Association. They delivered road-side speeches urging the overthrow of the present Chinese Government and its replacement by a Republic. They also placarded the streets with documents preaching this crusade. The young men engaged in this business are said to have numbered some 2,000.

We may here mention that Prince Tsai-Hsun has recovered from the attack of inflammation of the throat which at one time threatened to interrupt the prosecution of his travels.

A telegram from Hongkong says that the younger brother of the celebrated Sun has been expelled from the Colony on a charge of fomenting anti-Dynastic disturbances.

The Hochi Shinbun has a special telegram from Shanghai to the effect that there is talk of the Yunnan-Szechuan Railway being undertaken by the Government. It is added that funds have been offered by England at 6 per cent., by France at 5 per cent., and by the United States without interest, but these figures impart an air of improbability to the whole story.

We agree with the Asahi Shinbun that there is not the least probability of the U.S. Government seriously taking up the project of an alliance with China. Our contemporary believes that this matter is being engineered by a group of capitalists who are desirous of making a financial coup in China. The Chinese themselves may be sincere enough, and among American citizens there may be a coterie who have imbibed imperialistic ideas to the exclusion of the Monroe doctrine. But the great bulk of the American nation entertain no ambition whatever for empire-building beyond the seas, and there is no American cabinet which will flout the will of the nation in this respect.

Japanese newspapers publish a strange item of news from Changchun. It is to the effect that as Colonel Morita and another gentleman were about to set out by carriage from the Colonel's residence, they were stopped by some Chinese constables and required to furnish information as to whether the Colonel had registered his carriage. Colonel Morita explained that he was going on urgent business and that police scrutiny into such a matter might very well be deferred, but the police, who had not even taken the trouble to salute the Colonel, although he was in full uniform, would not listen to any remonstrance. They compelled the driver of the carriage to take it to the police compound, and whether they ultimately released it or not the telegram does not say. Colonel Morita lodged a very strenuous complaint at the Japanese Consulate, and in relating the occurrence Tokyo newspapers complain that the behaviour of the Chinese, police in the districts north of Mukden is becoming intolerable.

In the Asahi Shinbun we find a statement of the various claims submitted by the Powers in consequence of the Changsha riots. The only Powers whose claims were settled immediately without abatement were Japan and Norway, the former receiving 100,000 taels and the latter, 46,000. No claim has been put in by U.S. citizens although they had a Church burned. The French demanded 65,000 taels but were content with 42,000. Heaviest of all was the British bill. It totalled 800,000 taels, and the Chinese have offered 480,000. There are also claims from private individuals which have been separately presented, and which total 70,000 taels. Altogether the emente will cost Hunan a tolerably large sum. We have omitted to state Germany's case. One Germany firm demands 15,000 taels, which the Chinese regard as just, but minor claims put in by small German firms and aggregating 30,000 are said to be disputed in toto.

An important step appears to have been taken in connexion with the organization of the Chinese army. The six Divisions in the metropolitan circuit have all been placed under the direct control of the Board of War, and General Yin Chang, formerly Minister to Germany, has been appointed to the supreme command of this force. Six Divisions of troops represent a formidable army. Japan had only seven Divisions including the Guards when she went to war with China sixteen years ago, and if General Yin proves as earnest a reformer as rumour credits him with being, the Chinese capital should soon be comparatively safe against the onset of any foreign enemy. Of course it will be understood that these Divisions have existed on paper for some time, but under their former commander, General Feng Shan, they made no substantial approach to efficiency, whereas it is believed that General Yin will discharge his task with all the thoroughness and scientific knowledge acquired by him in Germany. We shall probably soon hear of the engagement of a considerable body of German instructors. That would be only natural.

The Ta-Tsing Bank, in other words the Central Bank of China, seems to have incurred some loss of credit in connexion with the recent monetary crisis in Shanghai, and as it had large transactions with the Teh-Hwa Bank, that is to say the German Chinese Bank, the Representative of Germany is said to have addressed to the Chinese Government a formal enquiry as to the trustworthiness of the Bank of China's notes, requesting also to be informed whether the Central Government guaranteed these notes. To these queries a reply was received in the sense that the Imperial Treasury had entire faith in the stability of the Bank, but did not guarantee its notes. The German Minister is then said to have enquired whether any official limit was imposed on the volume of notes issued, and whether any rigidly enforced regulations existed with regard to a reserve for redeeming the notes. It is stated that these latter queries have not yet elicited a reply, and some Chinese journals are quoted as doubting whether explicit replies are possible.

The telegraph says that the local authorities of Manchuria have purchased from an Austrian firm 18 field pieces and a number of rifles for use by the troops in Kilin. These weapons are to cost 400,000 yen, and the Austrian firm is said to have given six months' grace. It is added that the money will be eventually paid out of a sum of 1,200,000 taels borrowed by the Chinese Government from Germany, on condition that repayment is made in equal installments spread over six years, the rate of interest to be 5 per-cent. for the first year and to increase by 1-per-cent. in each succeeding year.

Tokyo newspapers report the details of the salaries and allowances to be granted to members of the Chinese senate (Tzu Cheng-yuan). We read that the President, Prince Pu-lung, will receive 10,000 taels; the Vice-President, 5,000 and each member 600. The travelling allowances will be calculated within limits of 100 and 800 taels. The total expenditure involved is not accurately stated, but it will evidently make a formidable sum.

The newspaper organ of the new Senate is quoted as saying that the budget for the next fiscal year has been presented to the Assembly, and that its figures are:—

Expenditures	340,820,000
Income	295,540,000
Excess of outlays	45,280,000

Nothing is said as to what provision the treasury contemplates for the purpose of meeting this formidable deficit. It is to be feared, if this budget be taken as typical, that the high credit hitherto enjoyed by China in foreign financial circles will be impaired.

Mr. Tang Shaō-yi appears to be at length on his way to Peking to take up the duties of his new office as President of the Board of Communications. He has arrived at Shanghai, and is putting up at a foreign hotel there. The telegram speaks of him as being in rude health, so far as appearances go at all events.

It may not be remembered by many of our readers that a Russo Chinese commission has been engaged for some time delimiting the frontier between Mongolia and Russia. Prominence is now given to the fact by a rumour that the Chinese commission have submitted a very plainly spoken complaint to their Government. They accuse their Russian colleagues of making no earnest attempt to push the work of delimitation and also of employing troops to impede it. They also allege that on the strength of the Portsmouth Treaty the Russians are gradually increasing their forces at the various stations along the railway. This latter charge is avowedly based upon conjecture, but the commissioners add that there are plenty of grounds for suspicion. One would like to hear the Russian side of this question before attempting to form a conclusion.

The group of capitalists and their agents interested in bringing about the construction of the Aigun-Chingchow Railway, are evidently determined that the subject shall not drift out of public ken. New York now telegraphs that the Americans have obtained permission to construct the line, and that all the materials, the rolling stock and the expert labour are to be supplied from the United States. We do not attach any credence to this story. In all probability it is merely intended to prelude a fresh access of agitation.

The Chinese Representative in St. Petersburg is said to have memorialized the Peking Government in the sense that three Acting Commissioners in Mongolia have been accepting bribes from the Russian Government, and have been behaving dishonestly in Russian interests. This strange and very vague information suggests no idea of the procedure censured, and we should think that Mr. Sa can scarcely have intended that publicity should be given to his impeachment, at all events if he contemplated continuing to represent his country at St. Petersburg. It is indeed one of the most curious features of Chinese administrative methods that anything like official secrecy seems to be unobtainable, and we are often driven to conclude that nine out of every ten items of news emanating from Peking are pure inventions.

A STRANGE INCIDENT.

A singular event is telegraphed to the Kokumin Shimbun from Dairen. It is to effect that thirteen Japanese subjects have been apprehended and thrown into prison by order of the Chihsien of Tael. The telegram says that these thirteen Japanese received an instruction from the Chihsien to remove within the Leased Territory, as their residence outside its limits was contrary to law. The Japanese repaired to the Chihsien's Yamen for the purpose of remonstrating. What happened there the Kokumin's correspondent does not state, but in the end the 13 appellents were seized by the police and thrown into prison.

Tael is in the jurisdiction of Hailungchen, and it is believed that the above arrest was ordered by the authorities of the latter place. The Mainichi Dempo also has a telegram on the subject. It recalls the fact that, some time ago, the Viceroy of Manchuria issued orders to all local officials to take steps for putting an end to trespasses beyond treaty limits. Against these instructions a strong protest was entered by the Japanese Consul General, and the instructions were modified accordingly. It is thought possible that in this particular case the local officials acted in obedience to the Viceroy's original instructions, not having become as yet conversant with the modification. But it is of course conceivable that the Japanese behaved with some violence. Incidentally note is taken of the fact that an incident of this kind illustrates the inconvenience of having no Bureau of Foreign Affairs in the Mukden Government. Such a Bureau used to exist, but it was recently abolished as a matter of economy, and the consequence is that the Tael affair will have to be adjudicated in Tiehling.

Telegrams from Mukden indicate that in deference to protests lodged by the Japanese Consul at Tiehling the seventeen Japanese who were recently arrested at Tael, when they repaired to the Chi-hsien's Yamen to remonstrate against the order for their withdrawal within treaty limits, have been released. But nothing whatever is said as to the reason of their original arrest. Their release took place on the 25th instant, and as the arrest was made on the 19th, these unfortunate people must have enjoyed the horrors of a Chinese provincial prison for nearly a full week. It is quite possible that their method of remonstrating against the order of removal may have taken a lawless form, and that they were therefore justly placed under restraint, but to keep them in confinement for six or seven days without any conclusive inquiry seems a distinct abuse of power.

It appears that the Japanese subjects arrested by order of the Chihsien at Tael numbered thirteen, not seventeen as the revised story had it, and that they were held in confinement by the Chinese police for six days. Mr. Morita the Japanese Consul at Tiehling has returned from Tael whither he proceeded to make investigations, and has gone to Mukden for the purpose of asking the Consul-General to prefer a very strong protest. We still remain without the slightest inkling as to the offence laid at the door of these thirteen Japanese subjects.

THE AMERICAN TOURISTS IN CHINA.

The American tourists now in China have left Shanghai for Nanking. Their visit is described thus far as a brilliant success. It seems almost a pity that these shrewd men of business should be compelled to devote so much of their time to being dined and wined. If they were left more leisure to utilize the opportunities furnished by their tour, they would certainly carry home with them a valuable budget of intelligence. As it is, however, the chief impression they gather is one of Chinese hospitality.

The Vicereine of Liangkang invited all the ladies of the American tourist party to afternoon tea on the 25th instant in the reception hall of the Nanking Exhibition. Subsequently the Viceroy entertained the whole party at dinner in his yamen. On the latter occasion very cordial speeches were made and there was an enthusiastic interchange of toasts. If the experiences of this party may be taken as a guide, the visit has had the effect of distinctly tightening the bonds between the United States and the Middle Kingdom.

THE VICEROY OF MANCHURIA.

Viceroy Shih Liang is said to have left Peking for Mukden on the 12th ultimo. He did not accomplish any one of his three main purposes in visiting the capital. Those purposes were, according to rumour, that he should be allowed to issue bonds to the extent of 5 million taels for the purpose of industrial development in Manchuria. This proposal was only partially rejected, inasmuch as Peking agreed that 2 millions might be issued. The next project was that steps should be taken to insist on the construction of the Chinchow-Aigun Railway. Viceroy Shih has always been understood to have associated himself intimately with this project from the outset, but in view of the great difficulties lying in the path of the undertaking he was supposed to have abandoned it, temporarily at all events. The reply given by the Peking Government on this point is said to have been that, in view of Russian and Japanese opposition, the building of the Railway could not be prosecuted at present. We query the accuracy of this report, for the Chinese Government cannot possibly labour under the misapprehension that Japan opposes the construction of the line. The Viceroy's third request had reference to the salt tax in Manchuria, but as the plan proposed by him would have interfered with the Central Government's monopoly his suggestion could not be carried out. The telegram adds with regard to his resignation that the Prince Regent had a special meeting with him and personally urged his retention of the Viceroyalty. The Prince point out that Manchuria is the birth-place of the Reigning Dynasty, and that every effort should be made to avert the aggression now menacing it. H.I.H. added that in the event of necessity the Viceroy should not hesitate to address the Throne. Altogether the Regent seems to have made a very earnest endeavour to reassure the old Viceroy.

THE WEATHER.

It will be always difficult to persuade the people of Japan that some connexion does not exist between Halley's comet and the peculiarly inclement weather by which the country has been visited this season. Very rarely indeed are there no climatic compensations in Japan. If the sky is unfavourable at one season, it usually atones at another for its misconduct. But this year there has as yet been nothing to correct the average. Of course we may have a genial period in October and even November, but even then it will not be possible to designate such a period by the usual epithet, "the remaining heat." The immediate cause of the rain and clouds that have prevailed for the past few days was a twin typhoon which raged simultaneously in the south-west and south-east of Formosa and thence took a northerly route.

News comes from China showing that the continual rain has produced serious inundations owing to the rapid rise of the Han river. It is said that in the district of Chienkiang-hsien no less than 1,000 lives have been lost, and that the district of Wuyang-chow has been completely devastated, the crops destroyed and the people obliged to desert their homesteads.

THE GAS COMPANIES.

The Chiyoda Gas Company has definitely opened proceedings against the Gas Fittings Guild in connection with the celebrated advertisement. Prof. Uzawa has been engaged for the prosecution. Use has been also made of the opportunity to give a fillip to the reputation of the Chiyoda Gas company. Its Managing Director Mr. Oka, invited the representatives of various newspapers to the Imperial Hotel on the 21st instant and explained to them many facts proving the genuine character of the Company's enterprise. He stated among other things that a site measuring 13,000 tsubo had been obtained for the tanks at a place entirely safe against floods, and that a contract for machinery had been placed with a German firm for 470,000 yen.

Mr. Nakano Buyei, President of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, is attempting to mediate between the Chiyoda Gas Company and the Gas Fittings Guild. He is quoted as saying that the Tokyo Gas Company's attempt to exonerate itself from any connexion with the obnoxious advertisement cannot be called entirely successful. It is quite incredible that a petty concern like the Gas Fittings Guild should have expended a sum of from 3,000 to 4,000 yen upon such advertisements, unless it received assistance from an outside source. The Tokyo Gas Company is therefore obviously to blame, and Mr. Nakano will endeavour to find some satisfactory exit. Baron Shibusawa, President of the Tokyo Gas Company, is also quoted. He lays a good deal of blame on the shoulders of the Tokyo Municipal Authorities. In 1885, when he, Baron Shibusawa, undertook to organize the Tokyo Gas Company, he received all possible encouragement from the Municipal Authorities, who considered that the enterprise would contribute materially to the welfare of the citizens. Thereafter through all these years the Company and the Municipality had been on the best of terms, and nothing seemed less probable than that the city would grant a charter to a rival enterprise without saying a word to the original Company, and moreover, that it would extend to the latter incontinently the terms offered, but not yet carried out, by the former. Baron Shibusawa, who is nothing if not moderate in his language, evidently resents seriously the discourteous and tactless treatment extended to the Tokyo Gas Company by the Municipal Authorities. Nevertheless, he does not hold the Company blameless in this matter of advertisement. He admits there was some fault on the side of the Directors, but he ridicules the notion of carrying such a question into the law-courts.

The general opinion seems to be that an apology will satisfy the parties concerned and that the threatened law suit will be dispensed with.

Events are demonstrating the accuracy of a cartoon published recently by the Jiji Shimpō. The picture represented two bearers of gas torches acting as guides for the people of Tokyo, who were expressing great satisfaction at this result of the competition between the Chiyoda and Tokyo Companies. We read now in Japanese journals that the citizens of the Aoyama district have been the first to take practical advantage of the improved terms offered by the Chiyoda folks. There is a very considerable difference between the charges of the two companies. Clients of the Tokyo Gas Company have hitherto had to pay 2.40 yen per 1,000 cubic feet of gas, whereas the Chiyoda Directors offer the same quantity for 1.80 yen. Moreover all persons sending in applications for Chiyoda Gas before next August are promised a further rebate of 5 per-cent., and all persons who form a combination to purchase the gas will get a further reduction of 5 per-cent. so that the up-shot of the matter is that what now costs 2.40 yen will be obtainable for 1.62 yen. To this has to be added the fact that the charge for the metre is not imposed by the Chiyoda Company. The Aoyama folks calculate that they can effect a total saving of 50,000 yen in 5 years, and they talk of devoting the money to form a fund for some public purpose. The citizens of Iigura and Akasaka are following suit, and thus the effects of the threatened competition seem likely to be very formidable. The great question is, are the projectors of the Chiyoda enterprise in earnest. Do they seriously intend to supply gas at the above drastic reductions, or are they merely scheming to be bought out by the Tokyo Company? It is a puzzling situation for the Tokyo Gas Company, since if it now reduces its rates, it can hardly hope to raise them again even though the Chiyoda Company's enterprise prove a bogie. One would think that before granting a charter to the Chiyoda Company the Municipal Authorities would have made thorough investigations into the financial stability of the projectors.

All hopes of compromising the dispute between the Tokyo and Chiyoda Gas Companies have proved abortive. Mr. Nakano Buyei, President of the Tokyo Chamber of Commerce, and Baron Shibusawa, President of the Tokyo Gas Company, have made every effort to foster mediation, but at a meeting held on the 27th ultimo by the shareholders of the Tokyo Company, it was decided that things must be left to take their course. Subsequently a meeting of the Chiyoda promoters took place, and a decision was adopted in the sense that the advertisement published by the Gas Fittings Company was calculated to injure the credit and impair the business of the Chiyoda Company, and that consequently a suit at law must be instituted. The difficulty, as we have already stated, is that the Tokyo Gas Company has not yet persuaded itself to regard the Chiyoda competition as sincere.

No light has yet dawned upon the horizon of the Tokyo Gas Companies. Evidently several of the leaders on both sides have the good sense to perceive that the unwise course they could possibly adopt would be to go to law. Others, however, notably the barrister element, are vehemently urging that no means should be omitted for re-establishing the reputation of the Chiyoda Company. What the upshot will be it is difficult to foresee at present, but we are inclined to think that the Japanese love of compromise will assert itself finally. Indeed we should not at all be surprised if this fracas ended in the amalgamation of the two companies.

A NAGANO telegram says that owing to the recent heavy rain a landslide has occurred near Saijo Station on the Central line, and traffic is temporarily suspended.

FINANCIAL.

Baron Takahashi Korekiyo, President of the Specie Bank, speaking through the columns of the Asahi Shimbun, says that there has been talk of dissolving the syndicate of banks formed some months ago to assist the operation of four-per-cent. conversion. The Baron, however, has ascertained direct from Marquis Katsura that the Government does not desire any such step to be taken. At the close of this year, a block of the National Debt aggregating some 270 million yen will fall due for redemption or conversion, and the assistance of the banks will be required. The Treasury has determined to confine its redemptions to the fixed amount of the Fund for the Reduction of the National debt, but it will of course extend its transaction in the matter of conversion to meet the demand. Passing on to the statement frequently heard at present that some steps will be taken to correct the economic depression, Baron Takahashi emphatically denies anything of the kind. He says that it is a palpable mistake to attribute the so-called economic depression to artificial interference. The propounders of that doctrine maintain that the home market has been flooded with foreign money, whereas in truth only 20 million yen reached Japan from abroad in connexion with the loan transactions. Besides there is evidence that the economic condition is steadily mending. In the year 1907, the capital of various projected enterprises totalled 500 million yen. Out of that sum 50 millions were paid up in 1908; 70 millions in 1909, and 80,000 during the current year up to the present time, while, moreover, 200 millions in addition have been pledged. The banks need only wait. They would be committing a great mistake if they hastened to fix their capital at present rates. Baron Takahashi thinks that the real cause of the depression is to be sought among the farmers, who constitute 65 per cent. of the population. These, owing to the low price of rice last year, have had their purchasing power largely diminished.

It may here be mentioned that, according to some authorities, the inundations during this year will prove a blessing in disguise. They will of course represent a loss to the nation at large, but, on the other hand, they will bring the farmers into the field as sellers of the staple which they have held back since last year and as buyers of the commodities from which they have long abstained.

THE TOYO S.S. COMPANY.

The Toyo S.S. Company held its half yearly general meeting on the 28th ultimo. Everything passed over quietly. The anticipation had been that a great deal of commotion would arise in connection with Mr. Asano's pledge to make up, out of his own private fortune, any deficiency that the accounts might show between the net profits of the Company and its outstanding debts. This question was actually put to Mr. Asano, but he was not pressed apparently for an explicit answer. He explained that an item of 200,000 yen which appeared in the accounts of the past half year under the heading of "Chartered Vessels," would not figure in the account for the next half and that further the prospects of freight and passengers were sufficiently bright to warrant an expectation of nearly half a million of net profits during the next term. As to the negotiations with the Hoken Company on account of the cost-price of tank steamers, the arbitration was proceeding steadily and no good could be done by attempting to precipitate it.

Mr. Nezu inquired what was the nature of the economies said to be practiced. He noted that the Company was paying interest at the rate of 2.5 sen daily on a debt of 5 millions, and at the rate of 1.9 sen daily on a debt of 1 million. Why was not some effort made to convert these debts on a cheaper footing? To this the Directors replied, and adduced figures in support of their answer, that drastic economies had been effected in the matter of coal, provisions, establishment and wages, but as to these costly debts, the state of the Company's credit did not at present permit their satisfactory conversion. Some months would probably have to pass before any step of that nature is possible. In the meanwhile it was not improbable that a further call of 5 yen would have to be made on the new shares.

THE U. S. SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR IN CHINA.

It is quite natural that in view of the growing disposition of a party in the Chinese Empire, to effect an entente with America, the visit of Mr. Secretary Dickinson to Peking should give rise to various rumours. The latest of these is that Mr. Dickinson has been the bearer of an autograph letter from President Taft to the Prince Regent, and that the letter contains an allusion to a Chinese national loan by American financiers. But surely it is in the last degree incredible that the President of the United States should constitute himself the mouth-piece of any group of capitalists? The canard-mongers must exercise their faculty of invention in a more rational manner if they hope to find any credence. The only thing to be said about the Secretary of War's visit to China is that the time might have been more prudently chosen. Yet even that criticism might be silenced if we possessed fuller knowledge of Mr. Dickinson's opportunities.

The U. S. Secretary of War left Peking on the 26th ultimo and is to travel westward via Manchuria. His Excellency had the most enthusiastic send off, and the day previous to his departure was rendered memorable by an unprecedented act of courtesy on the part of the Chinese Court, namely a reception given in honour of Mr. Dickinson within the precincts of the Emperor's Palace. Naturally the Sino American party are jubilant, and profess to believe that an Alliance between the great Republic and the big Empire is imminent. As a matter of fact nothing in the whole range of political contingencies is less probable. An entente of some sort is not quite out of the question, but an alliance may be dismissed from thought.

A similar impression is vividly produced by the treatment extended to the American commercial tourists in the Yangtze Valley. They have left Nanking for Hankow, and their progress from place to place has elicited greetings and welcomes which are entirely unprecedented in China for warmth and sentiment. It is freely stated that the bulk of the Chinese nation look to the people of the United States as the sole potential barrier against Japanese and Russian aggression.

CHRISTIANITY AND BUDDHISM IN CHOSŌN.

Mr. Nakayasu, a member of the House of Representatives, appears to be exerting himself strenuously for the revival of Buddhism in Chosen. He has just paid a visit to the Peninsula, and is quoted as saying on his return that Christianity received encouragement for political reasons from the ex-Emperor during past years and was also treated with much consideration by Prince Ito, who thought it wise to conciliate the missionaries. Thus countenanced, the foreign faith obtained a large following and is now of formidable dimensions. Meanwhile the ex-Emperor did not altogether sacrifice his religious views upon the altar of political expediency. If, on the one hand, he showed a friendly demeanour toward Christianity, on the other, he contributed a sum of 5,000 yen to the Hongwan Temple in Seoul, where the mortuary tablet of the Tai-won-kun is preserved. He also wrote an autograph gaku for the temple. Now that annexation has taken place in spite of Christianity, the time seems to have come for re-awakening the people's faith in Buddhism, and Mr. Nakayasu has approached the Lord Abbot of Higashi-Honganji in Kyoto, urging that a resolute movement of propagandism should be undertaken. It is expected that a meeting of the Honganji priests to consider this important subject will be held about the 27th or 28th instant.

MR. MIZUMACHI.

At a dinner given by the Bankers' Club to Mr. Mizumachi on the 26th ultimo, that gentleman took for the subject of his speech the economic situation in Japan. He set out by observing that foreign financiers did not endorse the criticisms common in Japan, namely, that undue attention is paid by the Government to the adjustment of the national debt. On the contrary, foreign financiers regard this as an almost absolutely essential post bellum feature. Passing to the fact that an industrial revival is exceptionally tardy in coming, Mr. Mizumachi opined that the chief cause is disturbed confidence in the trustworthiness of Japanese companies. He cited the conspicuous failures made by Mr. Loonen; the partial failure of the Anglo-Japanese Hydro-Electric scheme and the closing of the Anglo Japanese Syndicate. These incidents had contributed to shake public faith, and a still more mischievous effect had been produced by the want of integrity disclosed in the management of several important business concerns. Mr. Mizumachi referred to a letter from the Tokyo correspondent of The Times, published by that journal on the 18th of August. He also dwelt upon the fact that Japan is not sufficiently supplied with funds for giving accommodation on the security of fixed property. Until this need is supplied there cannot be any substantial fall in the rate of interest.

THE UNSIGHTLY INTRIGUE.

It would appear that Mr. W. Straight, the New York Herald and the Peking Daily News are conducting a vigorous campaign to bring about an alliance, or at all events a very practical entente, between the United States and China for anti-Japanese purposes.

They are uttering and echoing all sorts of stories. Thus they falsely attribute to the Japanese representative in Peking a remonstrance addressed to the Peking Government in the sense that the writings of the vernacular press should be controlled as being inimical to the friendly relations of Japan and China. To them also is attributed the canard that Yuan Shih-kai's recall to power was frustrated by Japanese influence. The New York Herald and its humble follower the Peking Daily News occupy the forefront of the picture as vehement preachers of salvation for China by an alliance with America, and in the background stands Mr. Straight with a panacea in the shape of a substantial American loan for China. The presence of the United States Secretary for War in Peking is deemed a specially favourable opportunity for ventilating these doctrines, and Tang Shao-Yi's arrival in Peking is expected to be the signal for vigorous action.

FOREIGN TRADE AT DAIREN.

A telegram to the Asahi from Dairen says that there has been a marked development of the port's foreign trade during the current year. Figures are given in proof of this statement, but there is obviously some mistake, for the total trade up to the end of August is put at only a little more than a quarter of a million yen. However, the fact may be taken as assured that the commerce of Dairen is increasing rapidly and with it the prosperity of Manchuria is correspondingly developing.

In this context it is to be noted that the Daidō Maru, which left Dairen on the 25th ultimo, carried 9,861 bags of beans, which are to be reshipped at Kobe for the United States. This is said to be the first consignment of beans sent to the United States.

It is stated that South-Manchuria Railway authorities are arranging to provide, for vessels entering and clearing at Dairen, the services of competent pilots free of charge to the ship-owners.

A telegram from Dairen says that beans of the new crop reached that place on the 25th ultimo, being a day later than the corresponding arrival last year. The new beans are quoted at 4.25 yen per koku, being 10 sen dearer than the beans of the old crop, and 1 yen dearer than last year's quotation. There have not yet been any transactions.

VISCOUNT HONDA.

Considerable excitement is caused in Tokyo by the arrest of Viscount S. Honda on a charge of fraud. The papers of the capital give what professes to be a detailed account of various lapses from grace on the part of this nobleman. But we refrain from reproducing the story as the case is now pending. We may say, however, that the Viscount is depicted by our contemporaries in a most unenviable light.

In this context we may mention another case of apparently crooked dealing on the part of Viscount T. Kuki—not the well known Viscount R. Kuki, but a nobleman of the Kuge class. The question at issue in this case is a paltry sum of 8½ yen for services rendered by a dentist to the Viscount and his mistress. The patients gave a false name, and subsequently refused to pay the money.

JAPANESE EMIGRATION TO BRAZIL.

Not much has been heard for some time about Japanese emigrants to Brazil but this subject is reopened by Mr. Uchida, Japanese Representative in that country, who is now on a visit to Japan. He says that after the establishment of the Republic in 1889, and after the issue of an excessive volume of inconvertible notes, the finance of the country fell into such disorder that the Government had to abandon the payment of the subsidy hitherto granted by it for the encouragement of immigration. This of course gave a great set back to the tide of Japanese colonization, but ultimately a company called to Kōkoku-Kaisha concluded an agreement to furnish within three years 1,000 families of Japanese immigrants, each family to consist of not less than three persons. This was the signal for all the other immigration companies to claim most-favoured-nation treatment, and the situation became for a time somewhat embarrassed. Finally the problem was solved by offering to admit any company which agreed to pay its share of the expenses hitherto incurred. The programme was then proceeded with, but difficulties intervened. In the first place the requisite number of immigrants could not be obtained. Instead of 1,000 which should have been brought over during the first year, 600 only could be procured, and these included various classes of people quite unfitted to serve as farm hands. Moreover, the family-ties alleged to exist between the members of several groups were in many cases fictitious, and trouble at once rose. However, the Brazilians gave the party a hearty welcome, and as there happened to be a few genuine farm hands among the immigrants the superiority of their labour and their general good conduct attracted the attention of shrewd observers. This led to another agreement between the Kōkoku-kaisha and a group of planters, the new conditions being that only genuine agricultural labourers should be sent, and that their number should be limited to 1,200 at first. These immigrants are now on their way over, and it remains to be seen how they will succeed. They will encounter some opposition at the hands of Italian immigrants who are very numerous and who possess newspaper organs which will not fail to stir up public opinion against the Japanese. Speaking from his own observation, Mr. Uchida thinks that there is an excellent opening in Brazil for Japanese manufactures. Not for articles made in Japan and sent to Brazil in a finished state. Such things would encounter a protection duty of from 200 to 300 per cent. The paying plan would be to send Japanese artisans to Brazil and to let them establish themselves there as manufacturers. Mr. Uchida refers in enthusiastic terms to Mr. Large, a wealthy resident of San Pablo, who is thoroughly pro-Japanese. He has already formed an apprentice school in which the pupils consist of eight Japanese youths procured from the Okayama and Tokyo Orphanages. This school is carried on entirely at Mr. Large's expense.

TEMPLE-DRUM AND CATHEDRAL-CHIMES.

Some correspondents of a local English contemporary have been inveighing against the nuisance of a temple-drum which is beaten vigorously in their vicinity from rosy more to dewy eve. This recalls the curious fact that a Japanese never complains of noise. The beating of a big drum in his immediate neighbourhood does not seem to disturb him at all. Neither does the peculiarly shrill whistle of an itinerant confectioner. Neither do the appalling cries of crowds harnessed to a festival car. We have never heard a remonstrance uttered against these incidents of daily life. Custom has softened them into insignificance. But when questioned about their tacit endurance of such plagues, Japanese have been known to express surprise that foreigners should be so callous at home and so sensitive in Japan. "For have you not in Europe," they ask, "your church-bells, which clang out most unmusical reverberant notes for thirty minutes at a time, twice every Sunday and on many week-days; and have you not your river-steamers with their strident syrens; and have you not your locomotives and your factories which with their raucous or piercingly shrill whistles excruciate all lovers of quiet; and have you not your cathedrals which, for all eternity, ring out the quarters, the halves and the wholes with "damnable iteration" of cracked chimes? surely you should have been well seasoned before you come to Japan?" What is the answer to this criticism? It will scarcely do to plead that European noises are more refined than Japanese.

THE ORIENTAL DEVELOPMENT COMPANY.

We take the following from the Seoul Press :—

The Oriental Development Company has issued a Rule for its agricultural settlers in the Korean peninsula. Both Japanese and Koreans are eligible as settlers, and they can remove individually or in groups of not less than ten families, in accordance with their contract with the Company. These settlers, according to the Rule, are classified into two kinds, viz., peasant proprietors and tenants. Settlers belonging to the first class can lease wet and dry fields to the total area of two cho (five acres) per family, the ownership of which will be assigned to them after the lapse of 25 years or less. During the interval they will have to pay a contract amount to the Company in the shape of annual installments for the price of the fields. The price as a rule will be fixed at the current value of the field plus 6 per cent. interest on the value, and the approval of the Resident-General will be required for the appraised current value. They will also enjoy the advantage of lease of land for afforestation purposes in addition to the fields above mentioned. But they must pay the land tax and all other public dues on their leasehold. The tenant settlers get the right to cultivate the Company's fields by paying a stated rent. When, however, they prove themselves worthy and convince the Company of the efficiency of their labour, they will be given the chance to become land-owners. Such people as well as worthy proprietor-settlers can apply to the Company to purchase on their behalf any land to an extent not exceeding 4 cho (some 12½ acres) including the original lease, and will find the land their own after the payment of annual installments for 25 years or less.

The principal qualifications for the Company's settlers are attainment of twentieth year and freedom from military service. It is also required that they shall bring their families to their settlements. The company will advance part of initial expenses for settlement in the case of settlers in groups. This advancement, however, will not exceed 200 yen per house, and not be spent for other purposes than acquisition of objects of direct necessity for the conduct of pursuits, such as building of dwelling and barns and purchase of manure, seeds and agricultural tools and implements. When deemed necessary, the sum may be increased only in favour of those who are to work on unreclaimed land. The advancement must be repaid in a period of 25 years or less in annual installments, and interest is to be paid on them at seven per cent. per annum. Should any settlers violate the contract and prohibitive regulations of the Company they will be dispossessed of their leases and liable to pay advances plus interest on them at 10 per cent. per annum. With regard to the proprietor-settlers they are in addition, to pay rent on their fields until they become their own and the rent will be ten per cent. of the value of the land.

Further the Company, on application, will advance part of the initial expenses to agricultural settlers under the control of other companies and individuals who undertake the development of the peninsula. Conditions for such advancement will be similar to those for the Company's own settlers, save that the companies or individuals who undertake the work will be held responsible for failure on the part of their settlers. Besides people who intend to become proprietor settlers of the Oriental Company in groups of ten houses or more may each select the fields themselves and apply for purchase of them on their behalf. The Company will comply with such request as far as possible and grant all advantages mentioned to those settlers.

From the provisions in the Rule it appears that the Company's principle in the introduction of Japanese settlers is qualitative but not quantitative and that it aims at improvement of Korean agricultural methods by the example of respectable Japanese farmers.

UNCLAIMED MONEY.

It seems scarcely credible, but it is nevertheless a fact, that no less a sum than £5,305,115 is lying unclaimed in the various Government offices in London. Mr. S. W. Preston, who writes periodically on this subject, has the following letter in The Times :—

Sir,—During the Parliamentary Session just ended the important subject of unclaimed funds has again been referred to in the House of Commons and the Press. It may therefore be an opportune moment to mention that a Parliamentary return, recently issued, dealing with the Finance Accounts for the past year, throws considerable light on the matter. It appears that the liabilities of the Consolidated Fund in respect of unclaimed moneys in various Government Departments were as follows on March 31 last :—

Funds in Chancery (England).—There is a sum of £1,932,134 belonging to suitors standing to their credit in the books of the Pay Office of the Supreme Court. It is stated that "prior to 1869 such money was invested in Government securities and the interest was charged with the payment of the salaries, &c., and expenses of certain officers of the Court. In 1869 these charges were made payable out of the annual votes of Parliament, and the Government securities representing the cash-book debt to suitors were transferred to the National Debt Commissioners and cancelled in 1870, the Consolidated Fund being thenceforward made liable for any claims arising in respect of the said debt to suitors."

Funds in Chancery (Ireland).—A sum of £251,244 has been appropriated towards the cost of the Law Courts and Law Library in Dublin; £180,000 has also been appropriated for the purposes of the Housing of the Working Classes (Ireland) Acts; and there is a further liability of £7,905, the loss arising from a deficiency in the accounts of a former Master of the Court of Chancery in Ireland.

Bankrupts' Estates.—The Bankruptcy Offices in London have been erected out of part of the funds held by the Treasury in respect of unclaimed dividends and the cost of providing accommodation for officers performing duties under the Bankruptcy Act, 1883. The total liability in respect of Bankrupts' Estates in England and Ireland is £1,157,117.

Government Stocks and Dividends.—£1,964,620 now stands in the names of the National Debt Commissioners on account of unclaimed funds from these sources. But very large sums in past years have been appropriated, notably £1,000,000 under the Finance Act of 1904. A remarkable fact in connexion with the reduction of these liabilities is a credit item of £163,489 to the State, accrued from sums realized by the fractions of pence saved in the payment of dividends.

Other liabilities of the Consolidated Fund are mentioned, but I think that the foregoing facts are sufficient to justify the publication of an annual Parliamentary return giving full particulars of all unclaimed funds in the hands of the State of the value of £50 and upwards. If such a return were published and advertised no doubt many persons would be enabled to substantiate their claims.

I am, Sir, your obedient servant,

SIDNEY H. PRESTON.

MESSRS. YAMANAKA'S SCREENS.

The great Japanese dealers in work of art, Messrs. Yamanaka, of Osaka, Kyoto, London and New York, recently succeeded in getting together no less than 53 screens painted by the most celebrated artists of former times. The following account of the collection appears in the columns of The Times:—

Messrs. Yamanaka, of New Bond-street, are now showing in the Galleries of the Royal Society of British Artists a number of fine screens painted by Japanese old masters. Mr. Arthur Morrison, who writes an interesting introduction to the catalogue, says that he cannot guarantee the attributions contained in it, but many of the screens are masterpieces, whoever painted them. What we call decorative painting is a natural means of expression to Oriental artists. They do not set to work to decorate a screen any more than to decorate a picture. Their paintings are good decoration anywhere, because imitation in them is always subordinate to design. In some of these screens there is as much representation, as much character and movement, as in any Japanese pictures. Take for instance the two poppy screens attributed to Sotatsu (22 and 23). Here there is only a representation of poppies against a gold ground, because the artist wished to represent only poppies. But never were flowers more lifelike, never was a lucid design extracted more easily from the beauty of reality. The design is merely the essence of that beauty with everything irrelevant removed. There is more apparent virtuosity in the monochrome screen of wild geese and rushes attributed to Motonobu, a great master of the Kano school (42). Here one is inclined to contrast the Japanese cleverness with Chinese classic simplicity, but the design is beautiful and the execution sparkling. In the two deer browsing, attributed to Sokuyo, also a Kano artist (34), one is reminded of Sosen's intimate sympathy with animals. Here again the artist decorates only because he gives just the essence of what he represents. The beautiful screen of wild vines, attributed to Shoyei, a son of Motonobu (45), is more obviously decorative, because the leaves are golden, but it shows all the character and showering beauty of the plant.

There are two wave screens attributed to Korin, of which the smaller (28) is the more beautiful. Here the waves beat to and fro on the top of which is a pine tree. They are thoroughly conventionalized, but only so that their force and rhythm may be better emphasized. In a screen attributed to Mitsusuke, of the Tosa school (21), the cherry trees of the hill of Yoshino are the motive. The mass of white blossom seems to glimmer and tremble against the gold ground. It is a piece of impressionism in which form rather than light conveys the impression. More dramatic is the scene attributed to Sotatsu (29), in which the God of Thunder in a cloud frightens some courtiers who are running for shelter. Here a figure who draws his sword in impotent resistance is wonderfully expressive, and yet he is perfectly subordinated to the whole design. There are 53 screens in all, and they are all worthy of careful study.

JAPAN AND THE PANAMA CANAL.

Certain American publicists have been summoning from their own imagination phantoms of Japanese interference in the fortification of the Panama Canal. The Fiji Shimpō contains two items on this subject, one from the pen of its cartoonist, the other from that of an editor. The former depicts a narrow strip of water straddled by a colossal Uncle Sam, who is planting an immense sword-blade into the waterway. This is headed, "Will he really do it?" The editorial is based upon the statement attributed to a high official of the Foreign Department. This person is represented as ridiculing the idea that Japan can have either desire or ground for interfering with America's plans as to the fortification of the canal. Certain United States newspapers have busily circulated rumours in the sense that such interference is contemplated, and apparently they base the chimera on the fact that the Japanese Government recently ordered Baron Uchida, on the occasion of his visit to Mexico, to make some inquiries into the question of the canal. But the Japanese diplomat points out that the investigation of all serious questions is an ordinary duty of every Government, whatever attitude it may ultimately assume. As a matter of fact, Japan has no reason or interest whatever in interfering with America's designs with regard to the canal. Great Britain is the only Power which has any conventional rights of such a nature.

THE SOUTH POLE EXPEDITION.

The Niroku Shimpō seems to be performing a public duty when it calls severe attention to the doings of Lieutenant Shirase. It is unnecessary to remind our readers that this is the gentleman who recently planned with so much publicity a visit to the South Pole, and whose scheme received so much approval from Count Okuma and other more or less distinguished men. It was explicitly announced that if 40,000 yen were subscribed the Lieutenant and his party would set out on the 1st of August in a 200-ton sailing-ship. The money was put up without delay, but although we are now at the end of September, the sailing-ship has not yet materialized, nor has the expected departure of the explorers become a day nearer. The Niroku calls on Lieutenant Shirase to offer some public explanation of his failure to fulfil his engagement, and it is disposed also to find fault with Count Okuma and the other men of note, who lent their cachet to the design. Our own opinion is that the opposition, tacit and expressed, of the Naval authorities checked this expedition and thereby prevented a worse fiasco than that which has actually taken place. Lt. Shirase is an army officer, and is not known to possess any nautical qualifications whatever.

"NIHON-SIKI ROMAJI."

We observe with satisfaction that the Japan Herald shares the view again and again urged in these columns, namely, that if the Japanese are ever to be induced to substitute Roman letters for ideographs in writing their language, that desirable result would be impeded not promoted by giving to the Romaji sounds which the letters do not possess and can not be supposed to suggest. What can be more irrational than to deliberately multiply the difficulties of solving an important problem by distorting the factors of solution? If any reason could be advanced in support of such a course, one would listen attentively, but so far the advocates of the Nihon-siki have figured simply as the disciples of a caprice. They want to have Romaji of their own, their very, very own, never mind whether its usefulness is destroyed in the process of appropriation. However, we take pleasure in noting that the last issue of the Romaji Zasshi is not disfigured by the usual Nihon-siki supplement. Perhaps wiser counsels have prevailed in the editorial sanctum.

THE KEROSENE COMPETITION.

The competition of the Rising Sun and the Standard Oil Companies has already begun to develop an accute character, and the Japanese oil companies are placed in a most embarrassing situation. They cannot afford to reduce their prices, and yet if they maintain present rates, they will lose their market.

The rivalry between the Standard and the Rising Sun Oil Companies is spoken of in excited terms by Japanese newspapers. The former has reduced its market rate by 10 sen and the latter by 7, in addition to which abatements large discounts are said to be given. Moreover the Japanese representatives of the two Companies had been giving feasts to their clients in Sendai and elsewhere. It is further said that the bearers of the Standard Oil Company's banner are endeavouring to form a league of persons pledged to abstain from using any of the Rising Sun oil. The greatest sufferers are the Japanese companies, the Hoden and the Nippon. These supply only 40-per-cent. of the oil consumed in the country, and they find themselves in a tight place between the blades of their big foreign competitors.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, September 23.

The barometer having risen, so have the prices of shares and stocks, except in cases where special factors of depression are operative.

Monday, September 26.

The general tone yesterday was totally strong.

Tuesday, September 27.

What with the inclement weather and the imminence of settling day, prices entered a downward grade on the 27th.

Wednesday, September 28.

Again the inclement weather has produced a depressing effect on the Stock Market. All purchases ceased yesterday. There was only one session as is usual on the penultimate day of the month. We append the quotations for November delivery:—

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

There is a newspaper discussion about the products of the Sakai Celluloid Company's enterprise. That Company appears to have employed an American expert in connection with its works, and the Asahi Shimbun claims that the result is not successful financially, because celluloid manufactured according to the American process is too good for the Japanese market, being very hard and difficult to manipulate, though of course correspondingly durable. The German celluloid, on the other hand, is soft and easily chiselled, besides being much cheaper. Our contemporary affirms that the Sakai Company has committed an error of judgment in using American machinery and American processes. This criticism on the part of our Tokyo contemporary is avowedly based on some remarks made in his own defence by the American expert in the service of the Sakai Company.

Japanese newspapers say that when the news of the arrest of Mr. Matsumura reached London, Mr. H. E. Metcalf, who is in England on leave, immediately decided to return to Japan without delay via Siberia. The curious thing is that while, on the one hand, Mr. Matsumura is charged with perpetrating frauds which brought large sums into his pocket, he has been living all the while in a most economical, if not an actually penurious manner. His salary from Messrs. Babcock & Wilcox is said to be 70 yen a month, and he has been resident for years in a house rented at 7½ yen per month and in a manner quite consistent with a petty income. His wife is said to be absolutely astounded by the accusation.

There have been so many conflicting rumours about the Soy Company that nobody knows what to believe, but now at last it really does seem that liquidation is to be effected without recourse to a law court. The basis of agreement is said to be that the President, Mr. Tajima, puts up 600,000 yen; the other Directors, 400,000; the shareholders, 120,000; and the Insurance Company 330,000. The other assets of the Company, amounting to 680,000 yen, are to be given as security, and the remainder of the debt, namely 500,000 yen, is to be defrayed pro rata.

It is stated that a difficulty has arisen with regard to the Toyo S.S. Company's ports of call on its Mexican service. The Mexican Government is paying a subsidy of 10,000 dollars per voyage on condition that steamers call at two additional ports which are not included in the list prescribed by the Communications Department in Tokyo, and besides the Japanese law for the encouragement of navigation does not permit a company which receives a subsidy from this country to be similarly subventionized by a foreign State. The Toyo S.S. Company will therefore have to give up this Mexican grant.

The Times heads the following paragraph "the wrong way to step off a tramcar":—

In the Lambeth Coroner's Court yesterday, Mr. John Troutbeck held an inquest on the body of Emily Robinson, 43, late of Flaxman-road, Loughborough-junction. It was stated that on Saturday evening Mrs. Robinson got off a tramcar which was going at about eight miles an hour, in the opposite direction to that in which it was travelling, and fell heavily on to the back of her head. She died on Tuesday from the effects of an injury to the brain. The jury returned a verdict of "Accidental death."

Now what is the right way to step off a tramcar? All are agreed that in alighting one should face the direction of motion, but ought one to jump in that direction or ought one to step backwards? All Occidentals will approve the former method, but if any one will take the trouble to watch the Japanese, he will discover that they invariably step in the direction opposite to that of motion. And thoroughly comfortable they seem in doing so. Which mode then is "right?"

There are loud complaints against the Government's Over-Head and Yamate Electric Railways which were put into operation at the close of last year. The rocking of the cars is said to be most alarming, and the accommodation is not nearly sufficient for public needs. The fact is that the people of Tokyo are more critical than their generosity warrants.

The big destroyer, Umikaze (1,050 tons) is to be launched at Maizuru on the 10th of October. It is expected that the Prince Imperial will be present.

At 7.30 p.m. on the 23rd ult., His Excellency Baron Saito, Minister of State for the Navy, gave a banquet in honour of Vice-Admiral Sir A. L. Winsloe and the officers of H.B.M.'s S. Minatour and Monmouth. The British Ambassador, Rear Admiral Dundas of Dundas, and several members of the British Embassy were also present. On the Japanese side were Count Togo, Baron Inoue and Baron Uryu.

The obsequies of the late Viscount Inouye, who died in London on the 2nd of August last, took place on the 25th ultimo. At 10 o'clock in the forenoon an Imperial chamberlain arrived at the residence of the deceased in Enokizaka, carrying a present of white silk. Such an honour has very seldom been paid to an official not actually in office. In accordance with the strict injunctions of the deceased, the ceremony was conducted in the quietest possible manner. Nevertheless many high personages were present, and half a battalion of troops formed a guard of honour. The cortège left Enokizaka at 30 minutes past noon and reached at 3 p.m. the temple Tokaiji, where the service was performed by the celebrated priest Shaku Soyen, Lord Abbot of Kenchoji.

The U.S. secretary of the Navy has just made a speech at Boston the gist of which is telegraphed to the Asahi Shimbun. His Excellency is reported as having warmly advocated Admiral Evans' theory that the only way to secure America's position in the East and to guarantee peace is to have two powerful squadrons of battleships, each independent of the other; one stationed in the Pacific and the other in the Atlantic. It is evident that the theory of di-armament cannot hope to obtain much support from the United States Government whether under the Presidency of a Taft or a Roosevelt. Happily for herself America has plenty of money to spend unproductively if she likes. But all the countries of the Old World are not similarly fortunate.

It is said that the Patents Bureau in the Department of Agriculture and Commerce are engaged in drafting a law for the prevention of dishonest competition in the manufacturing business (Fusei kyōsō torishumari-hō). The prime purpose of this measure is to restrain manufacturers from using false names of places of production, and generally deceiving the public as to the provenance or quality of goods offered for sale. It is expected that this law will effectually put an end to the deceptions hitherto practised only too freely in Japan, and often severely commented on by foreign critics. The bill will be presented to the Diet next session.

That is the name given by the Asahi Shimbun to the Austrian Baron who recently distinguished himself by his polished manners when travelling in Japan. The Baron has arrived at San Francisco by the Chiyo Maru and is said to have conveyed to the newspapers of that city an elaborate account of the uncivilized condition of everything in Japan. He declares that when he returns to Paris, he will publish a book in the French language, and will call it "Annals of Travel" (Manyūki). The object of the publication will be to deter Europeans and Americans from visiting a country when such semi-barbarous conditions prevail. The worthy Baron may inadvertently recompense Japan for the trouble he gave during his sojourn here. His extravagances may easily become sufficiently notorious to serve as an advertisement for this country.

The ceremony of unveiling the statue of Count Oki took place in the compound of the Court of Cassation on the 26th ultimo at 3.30 p.m. Count Oki, as many of our readers must be aware, is generally regarded as the father of Japan's modern legislation. He held the portfolio of Justice in the early years of the Meiji era and it was under his auspices that the compilation of the criminal code was undertaken by M. Boissonade de Fontarabie. He also, in his subsequent position of Minister of Education, had much to do with the organization of the present system of education in Japan. He was one of the celebrated three politicians of Hizen, who were spoken of collectively as the Sampei; namely, Oki Mimpei, Eto Shimpei and Koga Ippei.

It will be learned with regret that Mr. and Mrs. Sanguinetti are to return permanently to London before the close of the year. During their residence in Tokyo they have made many warm friends, and while they themselves are to be congratulated, that will not suffice to console those they leave behind.

Captain Boyle and his two daughters are leaving Japan in a few days. Captain Boyle has been for some five years the Agent and technical adviser of Messrs. Armstrong and Vickers in the East, and we look forward to welcoming him back to Tokyo soon.

The British Far-Eastern Squadron, now lying in Yokohama, is to leave on the 30th ult. for Hakodate. Thence it will proceed in the direction of Vladivostok, and, coasting along Korea, will steer for Shanghai.

It appears that the Japanese market is over-stocked with brown sugar. There are no less than 450,000 bags awaiting consumption, and the consequence is that the price, which used to stand at 11½ or 12 yen, has fallen to 9 yen. A meeting of the six principal sugar companies was held on the 25th instant, when it was decided that those present should pledge themselves to abstain altogether from importing Formosan sugar until next February. In ordinary circumstances Formosa would send to Japan 500,000 bags in February, so that if this resolution be adhered to, a satisfactory state of affairs will be arrived at by that time. It is stated that the six companies entering into this compact have bound themselves to pay a sum of 10,000 yen by way of fine for any violation of the agreement.

We find in the Niehi Nichi Shimbun an article affirming that the great capitalists are at last stretching out their hands in the direction of the share market. The fall of the sugar company, and the apparently insecure condition of several important enterprises, completely deterred investors, and nobody was tempted to enter the share market unless he saw a certainty of getting at least 5 or 6 per-cent. Owing to the plenitude of money, however, and to the gradual restoration of confidence, that state of affairs now promises to terminate.

The Railway Authorities are said to have decided that it is time to follow the example of the more advanced European countries by equipping each train with a box containing appurtenances and medicaments for first aid. This precaution was long ago taken in the Occident, but has hitherto been neglected in Japan.

New comes from Hongkong that a Japanese has been killed and another wounded in that colony by a United States naval engineer whose name is given as J. W. Hayes. The victim who was killed is described in one telegram as a Japanese girl, and in another as a female baby. Both accounts agree, however, that the person wounded was a Japanese man. The alleged murderer has been apprehended.

A number of the members of the Tokyo Club gave a farewell dinner to Captain Boyle on the evening of the 29th ult. H.E. Sir Claude MacDonald presided and Captain Boyle's health was proposed by Admiral Baron Yamanouchi. Captain Boyle returned thanks in a few well-chosen words, and in all respects the entertainment was most successful.

On Thursday afternoon the United States Ambassador and Mrs. O'Brien gave a reception at the Embassy in honour of the Chicago Baseball team now visiting Tokyo. The members of the Keio team were among the guests.

Admiral Winsloe gave a lunch on board the Flag-ship Minotaur in Yokohama on the 29th ult. His Excellency the Japanese Minister of State for the Navy and several Japanese naval officers were present.

THE BOOKSHELF.

A Modern Paul in Japan: An account of the Life and Work of the Rev. PAUL SAWAYAMA, by JINZO NARUSE. Tokyo, Keisei sha, pp. 1—117, price 60 sen.

DR. NARUSE has done a labour of love in writing an account of his friend Paul Sawayama. And Sawayama really deserved to have his biography written. Born in Chōshū in 1850, ten years before Naruse, who was a native of the same village, he was in his 17th year when the Civil War began which ended in the Restoration of Meiji. It was the age of the rōnins, of the impetuous, independence-loving, idealistic youths, who succeeded, as their leaders came into the sphere of larger and wider ideas, in renovating the face, and to some extent also the heart, of their native land. Sawayama was one of these, he thirsted for the new knowledge of the West that held so much promise for young Japan, and his thirst brought him first to Kobe, to the house of the Rev. D. C. Greere, and then to America. The vision that drew him was the hope of employment under the renovated Government. But, first in Dr. Greene's study, and then more distinctly in America, the vision changed. He understood the meaning of Christianity, he saw that it was incumbent on himself to preach Christianity to his countrymen, and he came straight back to Japan, where he gave proof of the reality of his call by refusing tempting offers of positions under Government, and consenting to become the pastor of "a little band of eleven despised Christians" at Osaka, with a salary of seven yen a month. How the Naniwa Church grew under his care, how Sawayama himself, troubled in many ways yet knowing that "it is better to be happy than to be well," gradually came to be felt, in Christian and non-Christian circles alike, as an influence that made constantly for good, is well told in the letters from friends of which Dr. Naruse gives the reader a considerable selection.

Sawayama's great merit lies in the fact that he recognized from the very first that if Christianity is to be a power in Japan, it must be of the sturdy sort that stands on its own legs and asks for no pecuniary support from foreign lands, and that he gave a consistent expression to that conviction by acting upon that principle not only in the early days of Meiji, when it was very difficult for a Japanese to be a Christian at all, let alone organizing a Church, but also in those later years of the same period when the ready though often mistaken generosity of Christians in America must have often tempted him to forsake the thorny path of financial independence. Dr. Naruse gives us a speech delivered by him at a Missionary Conference at Osaka in 1881, which is well worth reading by those who are interested in the subject.

Practical Elocution (No. 1.), Best Stories of East and West, by EDWARD S. STEPHENSON. Kelly and Walsh, price 40 sen.

MR. STEPHENSON, who is Instructor of English at the Naval Engineering College at Yokosuka, has already given us one good book on English Customs, Etiquette, &c. He has now a very good collection of stories told in simple everyday language, as exercises in ordinary elocution.

"The earliest and indeed the basic form of elocution," he says in the introductory chapter, "is the simple narrative form." He might have gone on and said that clear narration, the simple telling of facts as they occurred, is the most potent form of oratory in the world. "Before attempting ineffectually to deliver speeches or to recite poems, students should learn how to narrate a short story clearly and well. . . . The main object of the speaker should be to make his hearers clearly understand what he says with the minimum of effort on their part. . . . It requires self-control to speak slowly and deliberately in public. . . . A gentleman,—a man of refinement and culture,—is shown unerringly by the speaking voice." The man who knows these things understands his business as a linguistic teacher. There are about 120 stories appended. They are good stories, free from cant and free from vulgarity. This is a book to be commended.

Japan, by O NACHOD, in 'fluck-Hartung's Weltgeschichte. Berlin, Ullstein & Co.

DR NACHOD is one of the most industrious of modern writers on Japan, and his annual summaries of things Japanese are really marvels of condensed information. He has now published, in about 100 closely printed large quarto pages, a condensed history and description of this country. It stands to reason that no book with such a compass can be exhaustive, but Dr. Nachod's gifts of condensation are very remarkable. It is a pity that his book is not in English, it is also a pity that it is not in a more portable form; it might be so very useful as a Student's Manual of Japanese History and Culture. The book is sumptuously illustrated, and the reproductions being well chosen and fitting admirably to the text.

CHINA NEWS AND NOTES.

THE AMERICAN BUSINESS MEN.

The prevailing news in China for the week has been the Party of American Business Men. The N. C. Daily News devotes four and a half columns in a single issue to them. And so it is everywhere.—Headings and Sub-Headings: who they are; where they came from; the weather which greeted them; who entertained them; what they ate, said, thought, saw! Poor Old China!—It must be a relief to her newspaper men to have something else to write about once in a while, besides murders, riots, pirates, kidnapping and opium. The American Business men have filled a long-felt want—Good old Jonathan, come often and stay longer!

Those American Business men certainly "had the time of their lives" as one of them characteristically expressed it. It appears to have been a succession of triumphal processions, brass bands, and lantern festivals. Even the school children made speeches. The following gives an idea of a rather quiet day, perhaps a fair average:—

YESTERDAY'S VISITS.

The American Commercial Commissioners were up early yesterday morning and at nine o'clock a start was made for the Commercial Press buildings. The premises were decorated for the occasion and there were tables set with refreshments. The Commissioners were invited to be seated and H. E. Wu Ting-fang presided. The Chairman made a practical statement with regard to what the place was and mentioned that one thousand men were employed and a million dollars were invested in the business, Mr Charles K. Field (San Francisco) replied. He said that the Chinese hosts had made them feel at home everywhere they had been, but at this building he was personally made very much more at home than anywhere else in the fragrance of printers' ink and the noise of printing machinery. The Commissioners recognized that printing was one of the oldest arts of China, but they had not been prepared for such an establishment turning out such beautiful work. The party adjourned to the garden, where about one hundred boys of the kindergarten school attached to the works, dressed in blue uniforms, were lined up. These boys sang a specially-written song, the words of which were supplied to the Commissioners together with the musical notation. The young lads gave an exhibition of drill and this was followed by twenty little girls singing descriptive songs. Before the party left a photograph was taken.

At the Bankers' Guild a reception was held later in the morning, but there were no speeches. The Ta Ching Government Bank proved very interesting to the banking members of the Commission and they were very much impressed with what they saw. A visit to the "Sin Wan Pao" newspaper office concluded the morning's programme.

After visiting the Li Hung-chang Memorial Temple, yet yesterday afternoon, another reception awaited the Commissioners, in the ground of the Imperial Polytechnic College (Nanyang College). The compound was gay with lanterns and flags, while on the flag-staff flew the Stars and Stripes together with the Dragon Flag. A handsome programme had been prepared and was handed as a souvenir to the guests.

The College band was in attendance, and after an introductory March, while the guests were taking their seats on the lawn, H. E. Tang Wen-chi, Director General of the College, delivered a speech of welcome. Further selections by the Band followed and the students then held athletic sports.

Tea was served in the Assembly Hall and the visitors were subsequently conducted over the College building.

Last night a special performance was given by the Chen Shih Company to the American Commissioners in the Sin Wu Tai Theatre on the Chinese Bund. All the dress circle boxes were reserved for the guests and no admission tickets were sold, the entire audience consisting of Chinese and foreign guests. The theatre was gaily decorated with flags, silks and electric lights and the visitors thoroughly enjoyed the play.

In the meantime, what has become of the Canton boycott?

ON Wednesday the Sanitary Bureau gave instructions to the various prefectural governments to the effect that all vessels coming from Kobe or Osaka should undergo medical inspection to prevent the spreading of cholera.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERIES.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 26.)
(COMMUNICATED.)

THE United States and Great Britain have now closed another great war. For over a century wrangling has been going on, all along the great northern Atlantic fishing coasts, over a loosely-written treaty. At last the matter was brought to a crisis and war was declared. But, instead of assembling their armies and collecting Dreadnought fleets, bombarding coastal cities and sinking merchant vessels; instead of setting Anglo-saxons to killing each other, to the edification of the enemies of both States, the matter was submitted to the Hague Tribunal and settled amicably. The result is that thousands of us are alive to-day who would have been killed while trying to kill other men as good as ourselves, alive to go ahead and do our little part in working out God's great plan. It is a splendid victory and should be celebrated wherever English is spoken, with hymns of praise to the God who inspires men to rise above the battling passions of brutes.

Of course there are little sore spots unhealed by the arbitration decision. American newspapers express the feeling that the United States did not get full justice, some of them even venturing to assert that this was in a measure caused by general European discrimination against the United States. English papers, on the other hand, make the same claim of lack of full justice and speak of the Americans trying to grasp all they can find any excuse to claim. Some of them even insinuate that the United States was only trying to make this an excuse to get a foothold in Canada. These discussions are only to be expected. The great point is that the century-old dispute is settled and the decision frankly accepted by both Governments. All petty wranglings will be over and forgotten long before the war could have been properly started. We are richer by millions upon millions of pounds, and by hundreds of thousands of lives of the best of both nations. Let Englishmen and Americans unite, the world over, in thankfulness to God, and pride of race for the enlightenment which has enabled their Governments to set this splendid example to the nations of the world.

"May God who made thee mighty Make thee mightier yet!"

THE PANAMA CANAL.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 27.)
(COMMUNICATED.)

THE recent newspaper agitation on the subject of the fortification of the Panama Canal, has called attention to the fact that if Mr. ROOSEVELT is elected to the Presidency in 1912, he will be responsible not only for the opening of work on this great undertaking, but also for its successful conclusion. This would be no more than his due, for it is undoubtedly a fact that without his active personality the Canal would not have been undertaken by the United States, at least for many years to come. Ex-President ROOSEVELT deserves credit for the creation of the Panama canal.

A noteworthy feature in connection with the Canal construction is that in America, where, at least from the standpoint of the outsider, corruption and bribery in public life are greater than almost anywhere else in the world, no other great undertaking of this kind has been executed without repeated accusations and trials for official corruption. This desirable condition is also due, in large measure, to Mr. ROOSEVELT's personality, for it is he who had the suggestion and final acceptance of the officials placed in charge of this stupendous work.

A recent writer in the London Daily Telegraph calls especial attention to this feature, also to the splendid system which prevails, in the following words:—

As an engineering feat, the Panama Canal must and will stand first in the world's history. I have seen the Great Pennsylvania and New York tunnels which cross the Hudson and East rivers of New York, and watched the harnessing of the waters of Niagara Falls, and the building of the Sault Ste. Marie and Welland locks; I have passed through the impressive monotony of the Suez Canal, and inspected the great works of the London firm, S. Pearson & Sons (of which Sir Weetman Pearson, just raised to the peerage, is the head), viz., the port works at Dover, Colombo, Vera Cruz, Coatzacoalcas, and Salina Cruz, and the vast drainage works of Mexico. All these triumphs of engineering were colossal tasks, but in none of these great instances is the mind so impressed as it is in the case of the Panama Canal, with the "immensity of the undertaking," and thoroughness and completeness of the organisation necessitated in its consummation from the smallest detail to the largest.

The same writer accurately pictures Panama at the time the engineers took charge of the Canal Zone, when he speaks of the Canal railroad as "two streaks of rust running through a swamp."

All this was changed long ago, and to day a city flourishes, with its miles of warehouses, shops, offices and good solid roads in place of the former swamp "overgrown," as one writer expressed it, "with tropical vegetation." The click of the typewriter and the "siss" of wireless telegraph instruments have taken the place of the drone of the mosquito, and 39,000 active, healthful, well-fed employees are regularly in the service of the Canal Commission, in place of the half-starved, fever-stricken negroes through whose labour the former attempt was made.

The matter of the fortification of the Canal becomes, as the London Daily News expresses it, one of "whether the fortifications infringe the neutrality of the Canal, or are, as Mr. ROOSEVELT would have it, a necessary step which enables its neutralization to be guaranteed by the United States."

There is some reason for this latter claim, for it is fact, as noted by all papers, that the United States are pledged to maintain the neutrality of the Canal, and it has been frequently proved in this world that promises without power to execute them are valueless. Apart from expressions of doubt as to the absolute technical right to fortify, the general feeling expressed by the European press is that of the London Times—

There is no political question directly involved in the canal which is not covered by the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 and the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1904, except perhaps one. Mr. Roosevelt raised it with characteristic directness at Omaha, when he declared the United States "in honour bound" to fortify the canal themselves. This view of the matter is substantially shared, as our Washington Correspondent has informed us, by the Administration, which holds that the Hay-Pauncefote Treaty gave the United States the right to fortify. The right is not conceded in so many words; but, according to the view of the Administration, it is implied, since the Treaty, while modelling itself by name upon the Suez Canal Convention of 1888, omitted the clause which prohibits the fortification of the Suez Canal. The United States, moreover, definitely asserted the right to erect fortifications in the Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, against which Great Britain entered no protest.

And of the Daily News, when it adds, after presenting the technical arguments of both sides:—

There is no good, however, in being over-pedantic or in failing to recognise that when a great Power like the United States spends a vast sum in constructing such a canal it may expect to get some advantage from it beyond what is reaped by other nations. Particularly will that be so when the canal, as here, is the key to a continent of which the Power in question is the virtual head and the self-constituted protectress.

In other words, a sort of "I don't really object, but I could make you quit if I wanted to, attitude."

The recent articles have brought out many interesting expressions regarding the advantages to be reaped from the completed Canal. It brings Hongkong only 350 miles closer to New York, but it reduces the distance between New York and Yokohama so much that this city will be 1,500 miles nearer New York than it is to Liverpool.

The Canal is expected to contribute most largely to the commercial advantage of the big American and Canadian manufacturing cities on the Atlantic Coast. This should be particularly true with reference to trade in Australia, New Zealand and Japan. Another feature which must appeal forcibly to the American manufacturer, is that his merchandise will be carried to the Far East through waters dominated by the United States, instead of immediately leaving American Waters as is now the case in Suez shipments.

The advantages are not to be all in favour of the United States, however, for the markets of Great Britain and all European manufacturing States will be brought into direct water connection with San Francisco and the Pacific coast of the United States and Canada, thus eliminating the almost prohibitive overland freights. Ships which carry merchandise to California will carry back cargoes of fruit and produce, the exchange being to the mutual advantage of both markets.

JAPANESE CHARACTERISTICS.

Great difficulty attends the study of character. Among authors there are very few who excel in psychological analysis, who can delineate the disfigurements as well as the ornaments which go to make up the personalities of any individual. There is much in the character of individuals that puzzles the clever analyst. We all feel that some people are very unknowable. Manners and even speech as often serve the purpose of concealing thought as of expressing it. One often hears the remark:—"Well, I have constantly met that man for a number of years, but I don't feel as if I knew him." Knowledge of men or women depends entirely on the extent to which the subjects of analysis reveal their real selves by speech, actions and facial expression. There are crowds of people with artificial manners, with society smiles, and polite speeches that mean nothing at all to knowing hearers. Truth compels us to assert that in a very large number of cases the three methods of self-revelation, speech, action and facial expression act as a veil instead of a vehicle of thought. There are people who are described as "difficult to get to know thoroughly." May not the same be said of the Japanese as a nation? Does long residence in this country and a knowledge of the Japanese language qualify anybody to write a thoroughly impartial and exhaustive analysis of Japanese character? Surely not. Are there any writers on Japanese characteristics whose views are quite unbiassed and who show unsparingly the weaknesses and defects as well as the strength and the merits of that complex subject of analysis the Japanese mind. The article which appears in the Times Exhibition Supplement entitled Japanese Characteristics seems to me to be no more than an answer to certain attacks which have been made on Japanese character and a summing up of what can be said in its favour. One wants to hear the other side. The writer tells us he has been 43 years in this country, but he wisely adds that he can not claim finality on that account. He no doubt realizes that years of intercourse with the Japanese can only result in the acquirement of such knowledge of their character as is furnished by the three methods of self-revelation referred to above. Now, in the majority of cases, I give the result of about 37 years of intercourse with them, the Japanese neither show what they really think by looks, speech or actions. In an article published in the Jiji Shimpō at a critical time (April 3rd, 1901) reproduced in full, in Book II. of my "Specimens of Translation" the intentional concealment of feeling is given as one of the most fundamental of all Japanese traits. "Though in our hearts we were angry," says the editor of the Jiji, "we did not wear our hearts on our sleeves, we exercised great forbearance and allowed neither change of voice nor colour to reveal what we thought."

If there are those who, seeing how taciturn and undemonstrative the Japanese people are, think that they are very easy to deal with (that they can easily be got over), they are greatly mistaken. While we say that our not openly revealing our feelings towards foreign nations is the result of our limited experience of international intercourse, this only partly explains our attitude. We act as we do because it is our nature to behave thus. Here then we are confronted with a very serious obstacle to the acquirement of accurate knowledge of Japanese character. We are told by a leading Japanese journalist, what numerous other writers had told us before, that the Japanese people pride themselves on the adroitness with which they conceal their feelings. I suspect that this is the main reason why foreigners like myself, who have never studied nor wish to study the art of concealing either feelings or opinions, fail to probe the depths of Japanese character.

The Japanese are undoubtedly a very interesting set of people and a large number of the readers of this journal would no doubt like to obtain a more intimate knowledge of the working of the Japanese mind. Who are the best guides on this subject? Take the character of individuals. Does any man or any woman know himself or herself as well as he or she is known by others? The answer must depend on the sort of knowledge referred to. Where the public habitually goes astray in forming opinions on character is in the attribution of certain motives as the incentive to certain actions, when in reality they were prompted by entirely different motives. That the springs of action which lie in the depths of a man's mind should ever come under the minute observation of another mind is inconceivable. No more than a glimpse of them is ever obtainable. So we are feeling about in the dark when trying to obtain reliable information respecting the most important of the traits which go to make up the individuality of any single person. Actions, words, looks are open to many interpretations and can only reveal character when correctly interpreted. Do people actually know themselves so well that they could if they wished give to a second person an accurate representation of their personalities? Do the insincere know that they are insincere? Do habitual trimmers know that they are trimming? Do the timid folks who are always afraid of what society will think or say if they don't do or say certain things, know that this timidity of theirs is a curse and renders social intercourse as unreal as a pantomime—an all-mimic affair. When Socrates said know thyself, he gave the world a precept which he was shrewd enough to perceive could only be partially observed.

If there is so much difficulty in the acquirement of self-knowledge by individuals, can we expect nations to know themselves sufficiently well to be able to give an account of the traits which differentiate them from other nations and the characteristics which they possess in common with alien peoples? Do the French, the Germans, the Americans and the English each know wherein their peculiarities consist? In the main, in a general way they do. But the generalisations reached on this subject are in every case so broad and they leave out of account so many qualities that deserve notice that one rises from the perusal of books on national traits with the feeling that the innermost recesses of character have not been exposed to view, that there is more hidden than has been revealed. The fact is, as John Stuart Mill pointed out when writing on ethnology, this science has made very slow progress, owing to the difficulties to which I have called attention above. If according to the general opinion Western nations after centuries of study have not advanced beyond a superficial knowledge of each other, is it to be expected that any Westerner however well he may know the Japanese language should be qualified to pose as an authority on the perplexing subject of Japanese characteristics? What I think is highly to be deprecated is the habit of writing up one side of the Japanese character only, which is adopted by certain Europeans and Americans and by certain Japanese. This looks very like an attempt to make the Japanese appear more perfect than they are and is one of the principal causes of the publication of what are known as anti-Japanese articles and books. Exaggeration does nothing but harm in this as in so many other things. When people say that the Japanese are more patriotic than any other people, the proofs they adduce for this astounding assertion are of the most flimsy kind. When they assert that as a people the Japanese are more cleanly than any other nation because many of them take a bath every day, they overlook the fact that the water used for the bath is as far as the majority of bathers are concerned anything but clean, since thirty or forty persons will enter the same water in succession, and they fail to take note of the fact that, while the skin is washed, in the winter time underlinen is not changed from week to week even among the middle classes—a thing that in the West would hardly be considered a mark of cleanliness. Conclusions that ignore important facts are of little value.

Numerous are the doubts which certain observations on Japanese character arouse in thoughtful Occidentals. Great praise has been bestowed on Japanese imperturbability and on the Buddha-like expressionlessness which they often assume. But there are Occidentals who see objectionable features in this studied demeanour. They ask, what does it do but hinder the rapid transaction of business and prevent the parties concerned from understanding each other? I have read articles, written by Japanese, which denounce this very trait so lauded by certain foreign writers as savouring of hypocrisy and as calculated to render social intercourse formal and insipid and to keep people at an undesirable distance from each other. Now, in order to get at the truth in this matter, it is necessary that all the unfavourable aspects of Japanese character should be set over against the favourable ones, and that in all cases we should try to get beneath the surface, or as the Japanese put it, to see what is at the back.

When we come to ask ourselves what is good and what bad in national character, we find that a satisfactory answer to this question would involve a consideration of the various moral standards that have prevailed in the world and still prevail, which are in sundry particulars antagonistic to each other. It is true that to a few canons of conduct all nations subscribe; that kindness, sincerity, politeness, truthfulness and unselfishness are held in high esteem throughout the civilized world. But when we leave these generalities and consider all the numerous traits which go to make up personality, we find that there is no fixed standard by which to gauge the moral value of each trait. It may appear at first to be bad, but in its environment it may work very well; or it may seem to be good, but nevertheless may be very mischievous.

The object of this article is not to controvert anybody's view on Japanese characteristics nor to discuss the subject in anything like a thorough manner, but to indicate the lines on which a thorough discussion must inevitably go. I have in past years written a great deal on Japanese character and have translated hundreds of articles penned by Japanese on the subject, but I make no pretence to be any kind of an authority on this puzzling subject. I feel to-day as I felt over thirty years ago, that I am only one of the explorers of the "great unknown." So felt Lafcadio Hearn shortly before his death, who, despite all the rubbish that has been penned about the superiority of his knowledge of Japanese character—a knowledge supposed to have been acquired without acquaintance with the Japanese language—told his friends that the Japanese mind was an enigma to him. In exploring unknown regions it is well to have a guide if he is to be had. I have read many Japanese treatises on this subject, but for conciseness and clearness I have come across nothing that surpasses Dr. Y. Haga's 國民性十論, Kokuminsei-jūron. It goes without saying that a book which discusses only ten national characteristics fails to treat the subject exhaustively. The defects and weaknesses of the national character are passed over in silence by Dr. Haga, and it seems to me that certain of the characteristics he discusses are shared by other nations and hence are not to be regarded as marks of national individuality or as differentiating the Japanese from all other nations. Moreover, Dr. Haga quotes from old books uncritically, accepting much that reliable critics have rejected. But he is undoubtedly a great authority on this topic and his book has been well received by Japanese scholars as a fair presentment of the subject treated, regarded from the native standpoint, hence it may perhaps be regarded as a representation of the type le plus net of the Japanese.

The following observations are taken from the Preface to Dr. Haga's work. National character affects the civilisation of a country very perceptibly. Its form of government, its laws, its language, its literature, its habits and customs are all to a large extent determined by that special bent of mind called national character. Intercourse with other countries is also an important factor in moulding a nation into one shape or another. How far our purely Japanese civilisation has been affected by Indian, Chinese and European thought it is not easy to settle.

Some treatises on national characteristics distinguish between original and derived traits, but Dr. Haga does not adopt this course. It is perhaps correct to say that the ten characteristics on which he dwells are all original traits; they have certainly been conspicuous in Japanese character ever since the Japanese began to be known to the Chinese as an independent and civilised people. Without further preface I will now proceed to give under each separate heading the views set forth by Dr. Haga.

I. Loyalty to superiors and patriotism.—Dr. Haga maintains that in the way they have treated their Sovereigns the Japanese have differed from other nations. This is not the opinion of foreign students of Japanese history. Japanese annals furnish abundant evidence to show that the treatment emperors and princes received at times was anything but respectful. Abundant evidence of this is given in Mr. Murdoch's recently published book reviewed at some length in these columns. Dr. Haga quotes from history and mythology certain passages which show respect for the Imperial House, and he has much to say regarding the fealty to superiors shown by the warrior class in feudal days. Magokoro, or single-heartedness, he says, consists of subjection to parents by children and to masters by servants, and this magokoro is no other than the essence of yamato-damashii. In Japan more than elsewhere Dr. Haga tells us "the Emperor is the State," so that loyalty to the throne and patriotism are one and the same. There are Japanese writers who entirely disagree with Dr. Haga as to the actual existence of national patriotism in former times. They say that most people cared little for the country as a whole and only displayed devotion to their own lords. The loyalty and patriotism dwelt on by Dr. Haga can hardly be regarded as differentiating the Japanese from other races.

II. Ancestor-worship and respect for the family. Dr. Haga traces these characteristics to the respect felt for the Imperial House. The Emperors, he tells us, are all descended from gods and so ancestor-worship is really a worship of these gods. But he is particular to tell us that he does not use the word god in a religious sense. The Shintō shrines to be seen all over the country, from the Ise Daijingu down to the smallest sacred buildings to be observed in rural districts exist primarily for the perpetuation of ancestor-worship. The respect felt for the heads of houses, the care taken to avoid the extinction of families by resorting to adoption and other devices are closely connected with ancestor worship, Dr. Haga tells us. The Ujigami or tutelary gods, of ancient times were all deified human beings, so that the worship of these gods was one form of ancestor-worship. Dr. Haga hints that this characteristic will certainly be undermined by the Codes of Law now in use, which in the main have individualism and not patriarchy as a basis.

III. Worldliness and Practicability.—Before the Russian troops as they went into battle the cross of Christ was borne as an incentive to bravery. The Japanese troops were content to remember that they were fighting for the Emperor and the State. No thoughts of a future life, no fear of hell or hope of heaven ever entered their minds. Beyond the bourne of this present life we Japanese do not look. About what happens after death we do not concern ourselves. Our Divine Oracles (Shinwa) have nothing to say about a future life (Waga kuni no Shinwa ni wa mirai no yo ni tsuite wa nanigoto mo itte oranai). The ancients thought that at death they went to the land of darkness (夜見の國, Yomi no kuni), which was the grave. In those times dislike of death was shown, but there was no fear of death. In our mythology life is represented as triumphing over death; when a goddess swears that she will kill a thousand persons per day, a male god swears he will beget 1,500 persons per day. All our myths show a fondness for life, the life that is passed in this present world, and refer to no other life. Though a future life is much dwelt on by the Buddhists, a close study of the history of the propagation of the faith here shows that our people have always valued it chiefly on account of the benefits they expect to get from it in this world. Prayers for recovery from illness, for escape from dangers, for good crops, for power to beget children, and the like, are the only petitions that really interested the minds of those who offered them (Bukkyō wo gensei no iyeki no tame ni tsukatta no de aru). The Shintō priests, and priests belonging to other sects as well, explain the terms hell and heaven as referring to happiness or misery experienced in this life and say that the doctrines concerning a future life, formerly preached by Buddhists were nothing but pious frauds—devices for inducing people to observe moral laws. The offerings made to temples are given with the object of receiving something substantial in return. It was our antipathy to other-worldliness and our love of what is practical and applicable to everyday life that rendered the propagation of Confucianism here such a great success and this consideration it is that accounts for its popularity to-day. It is our love of the practical that has induced us to introduce so many appliances and conveniences from Western lands.

IV. Love of nature, a taste for plants and flowers.—We live, says Dr. Haga, in a lovely country, where nature seems always smiling on us (the floods, storms, earthquakes and fires are momentarily forgotten by the author). That a nation which finds its all-in-all in this present world should respond to nature's smiles and pass its days and nights merrily is only what might be expected. In singing birds, blooming flowers, bright sunshine and the numerous beauties of woodland, lake and river, to say nothing of glorious sunsets, the Japanese mind delights. This characteristic is certainly very old, as is shown by the names which are in most general use, the majority of which have been taken from natural objects. The use made of flowers all the year round, the beautiful gardens to be seen everywhere, and Japanese poetry all testify to the extent to which nature is loved in this country.

V. Optimism and Light-heartedness.—According to Dr. Haga, with the Japanese the love of flowers and the love of sake go together. The cherry-blossom is the most highly esteemed of all flowers and Dr. Haga holds that sakura and sake both come from the root sak. He traces the words 幸, saki (saiwai), 榮, sakae and 盛, sakari, happiness, glory and prosperity, to the same root and sees in this etymology proof that cheerfulness and gaiety, glory and prosperity are all closely associated with each other in the Japanese mind. Cheerfully the Japanese lives and cheerfully he dies. His view of life may be summed up in the words: "What can't be cured must be cheerfully endured." From ancient times our people, says Dr. Haga, have taken life lightly. In Western lands when deep thinkers find that life does not come up to their ideals, they either grow satirical, angry or melancholy. The art of taking life as it is, living in the present, enjoying what is enjoyable and bearing with philosophic calmness what is disagreeable, this is an essential part of Japanese human nature.

VI. Simplicity, unsophisticatedness.—This shows itself in dress, food and architecture. Dr. Haga thinks that the assertion that Japanese flowers have no smell and Japanese birds no song is true, and he says that this accords with the dislike of display and obtrusiveness which characterises the Japanese people. The Japanese are satisfied with plain things. They dislike gaudiness of all kinds. In art they worship chasteness. Their meals are simple, their daily habits are simple, and Dr. Haga contends that the phonetic sounds of their language are infinitely simpler than those of numerous other countries.

VII. Attachment to things diminutive, delicate and natty.—Visitors to Japan are always struck by the number of small things that meet their eyes. Small houses, small teapots, small rooms, small ornaments, small teacups, small trees, small gardens, small rivers and small lakes. The Japanese are fond of small things, Dr. Haga tells us, (Kono chisai to iu koto ga Nihonjin no ki ni iru koto de aru). In some countries size is worshipped. Things must be big in order to receive the highest praise. It is not so here, as even our choicest literature shows, where the finest ideas are put in few words—words that suggest more than they say. Brevity is indeed the soul of our wit. Because we have always admired what is delicate our artisans have acquired great skill in carving and in many handicrafts that need adeptness in the use of the fingers.

VIII. A love of Cleanliness and purity.—Dr. Haga says that there is perhaps no nation so given to bathing as the Japanese. In Tōkyō there are over 800 bath-houses and the middle and upper classes have baths in their own houses. Dr. Baelz is quoted as saying that to this the Japanese owe their comparative freedom from rheumatism. Bathing was practised by the early ancestors of the Japanese, as appears in their ancient records. The numerous purifying rites practised by the Shintō priests show how anxious the Japanese were to get rid of the forms of defilement contracted in certain places or by contact with certain things or incident to certain states of the body. The list of defilements given by Dr. Haga is long. Deformities of every kind, pregnancy, death, even fire were regarded as contaminating and certain purifying rites connected with each pollution were deemed necessary in former times.

IX. Politeness and Ceremoniousness.—Salutations of all kinds are certainly more elaborate in this country than in the West. In the presence of Royalty foreigners often behave in a way that we should deem disrespectful. But all Western manners appear to us to be lacking in punctiliousness or propriety. Dr. Haga points out that the great ceremoniousness which was in vogue at the beginning of the Meiji era originated with the various Shōguns in power; principally in the Tokugawa era. Dr. Katō is quoted as saying that the terms of respect used towards Bakufu officials at the close of the Tokugawa era were far more numerous and elaborate than those employed in the Emperor's palace. Dr. Haga goes into the use and the origin of honorifics and draws attention to the enormous number of these words that occur in old books. The Japanese as a people are fond of ceremonies that appear most tedious to Europeans and Americans. Formality and red-tapeism are deemed necessary on all occasions in this country.

X. Gentleness, Cordiality and Generosity.—The Japanese are by nature a peaceable and a peace loving people, despite the fact that the recent wars they have waged have shown that they are able to fight when forced to do so. They may be described as defensive, but not offensive. From ancient times the Japanese have always treated aliens with kindness. The art known in ancient times as Yawara and now as Jūjutsu or Jūdō, rendered so popular even in foreign countries by the efforts of Mr. Kano Jigoro's seven thousand disciples, aptly illustrates one of the leading characteristics of the Japanese mind. The essence of this art consists in teaching the man attacked how to defend himself against his assailant. Victory is won by yielding instead of by putting forth strength. This principle of allowing a foe to defeat himself by mere headstrongness and reliance on brute force alone was well understood in ancient Japan. It is true to day that we are a yielding people unless when grossly insulted. Gentleness of manners was not only required of but actually displayed by our finest warriors in ancient times. Our warriors were all more or less educated, and their studies did much to soften their manners. While faithful to their lords, in hundreds of crises recorded by history they showed great generosity to foes. (Bushi wa Shukun ni tai shite magokoro to doji ni, teki ni ai shite no nasake wo motaneba naranu).

In the concluding chapter of his interesting book Dr. Haga points out that Japanese characteristics are rapidly changing under the influence of individualism, socialism and cosmopolitanism. Ancestor-worship is declining in many families, and Dr. Haga gravely tells us that there are husbands who have been heard to address their wives as "Otusa San," or "Ohina San," that children have been wicked enough to go to law against their parents and that wrangling over property has grown painfully common among near relatives. Which among all the traits that distinguish the Japanese from all other nations to-day, will survive the disintegration that has set in it is hard to say. Dr. Haga looks forward to the future somewhat anxiously. The age, he observes, has enormous capabilities, but it is fraught with danger. "Ah! this transition age. What will it bring, a Divinity or a Demon? Who can say? If we can only retain our old virtues, while supplying our deficiencies, all will be well. If we can't do this, we are no worthy sons of the founders and sustainers of our empire." W.D.

THE FLOOD DISASTERS IN MIYAGI PROVINCE.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

This is not to show up the province, but simply what I learned from a one day's visit to Iwadeyama town.

Twenty-seven miles north of Sendai is Kogota, where one sees the effects of the flood on a large scale. The wreckage of the houses is still very apparent, although repairs have rapidly improved the scene. On both sides of the railroad as far as the eye can reach, the rice fields were under a vast lake, and the entire village was threatened with destruction from the river that rose within a foot of the top of the embankment. The wide fields are slimy with mud, and the crop is ruined.

But the river bank broke on the side opposite the town, and the floods carried absolute devastation over 1500 acres of fine fields of rice. The force of this rush of waters can be estimated from the fact that for about two miles the railroad was torn up as though it was a line of sand. Rails and ties were lifted and wrenched and broken, and then buried in the rice fields. I learned that it cost sixty yen a rail in some places to dig out and replace the track.

The village of Tango is a specimen of the loss from inundation. This village with its combined hamlets numbers about 1000 houses, and all the crops are ruined. The officially estimated damage is placed at 420,000 yen, which makes a frightful average for those 1000 houses.

I spent the night in the well-known home of Mr. Kamada, the manufacturer of the best shōyu I know of. There were at the time of the flood about 60 workmen in his house and factory, and the floods came about midnight. The elder Kamada is eighty-six years old, and he remembers one flood of the Tempo Era, when the waters came to the very edge of the house. It has ever since been the saying in that house that no flood would ever surpass that. So the entire household went to bed, worrying somewhat over the threatening loss to the crops, but never dreaming that they themselves were in danger. Then came the rising water right into the houses up over the floors three feet deep. In the rush to save things and the darkness, men slipped, or stepped into holes, and two were swept off and were discovered the next morning hanging to branches of trees not far from the house. With such a wealthy and ancient family as this, the loss is very heavy. It took "3000 hands" just to deliver the houses of their slime and put the grounds in order. This way of estimating workmen does not mean that 3,000 persons were at work, but that 150 labourers had to work 20 days.

I learned here what I do not remember to have heard in former floods, that the railroad is the cause of far wider devastation than would otherwise take place. For the railroad is a very solid embankment running at right angles to the trend of rivers. And to save money in constructing expensive iron bridges, the opposite banks of the river are brought as near together as is deemed safe, thus narrowing the space for floods and causing the rivers to rise. The break at Kogota was just above the bridge, and but for the long and strong railroad bank, the waters would have swept towards the ocean in a comparatively restricted flow; but the unyielding railroad drove the flood for miles along its dike, and forced the waters back towards the foot-hills to a height unknown in the memory of man.

From the hospitable Kamada home I went to Iwadeyama, twelve miles up the almost level valley towards the Nakayama hot springs, where over 200 persons were buried in a land slide. For miles on this road, that was several feet under water during the floods, the fields on either side are wide mud flats, or ruined mulberry fields, with here and there piles of wreckage from uprooted trees and fallen houses. Where the rice was not ruined it is badly damaged, so that it will not average one-third the usual crop.

The chief officer of the town kindly sent one of his secretaries to show me the damaged portions. One roof was pointed out under which eight persons perished in the collapse. A new stream now runs across the main street where only houses stood before the flood. Of a group of nine houses just outside the town only one remains. At the upper end of the village where the force of the torrent was strongest the houses are piled up against each other in frightful confusion. And the strong new bridge that was opened only a month before the flood, and which it was predicted that no possible flood could dislodge, is now three miles below the town. Out of 890 houses 85 are ruined and 42 persons drowned. Over half the people fled from their homes during that night of terror.

The Chief of the county kindly gave me these facts. Tamatsukuri county has met with a most discouraging disaster. Of the two chief sources of income, the five or six celebrated hot springs, which bring annually about 30,000 visitors, have been largely ruined by landslides. The fine roads made for these visitors are all torn up, quite wiped off the map. It will take years before the public will regain confidence in the safety of these springs. Among the 200 buried at Nakayama are a physician who came here each year accompanied by his three sons. This year they came as usual, the boys bringing along a schoolmate. The doctor and his three sons were killed under the land slide, while the companion, who was reading in the same room, threw himself by the side of a strong hibachi and was eventually gotten out alive.

But the greatest immediate loss is from the wide devastation of the fields. Many who have lost simply the crop will have to eat in bitterness only this one year, but it will take many years to repair the loss of those whose fields have been ruined.

Amid these most disheartening scenes, I heard one very sweet story about Mayama village, which was the only one of nine villages that was completely saved from disaster, by a protruding foot hill that kept the torrent away. Five years ago during the famine this village suffered heavily and has not yet recovered. But now seeing the suffering of all the other villages, the people, out of gratitude for the kindnesses formerly received, collecting whatever they could give, bedding, rice, pickles, wood, and cash, took them to the county office for distribution. That this poverty-stricken village of 271 houses should unsolicited give in cash alone 91 yen, and that the school children should catch the same spirit of generosity to the extent of contributing 6.75 yen, are facts that appeal strongly to our sympathetic admiration.

The exact official estimates of the entire losses of this province are not yet in, but enough is known now to say that they cannot amount to less than 12,000,000 yen. (Your Mail statement of September 24th giving Miyagi's loss as 1,110,000 yen must have lost off a cypher somewhere.) In actual money loss Saitama and Ibaraki provinces will doubtless exceed that of this province. But when the comparative wealth of these provinces is considered, it doubtless is quite safe to say that none have suffered so much as Miyagi. Indeed this entire northern region has had an alarming amount of disasters in fifteen years. First came the tidal wave that swept off 30,000 people in a few moments. Then the famine of five years ago that left 600,000 people without food. And now this wide-spread calamity that has made farming impossible for thousands of people for many years to come.

There is, however, one very comforting thought. No people anywhere know better than the Japanese how to attack successfully these discouraging misfortunes. I think it safe to say that never was there a famine problem faced with more scientific skill, and handled with such a minimum of suffering as was the one of these three provinces five years ago. There were no deaths from starvation, beggars did not increase; nor did crime or disorders occur; food was abundant everywhere and cheaper than in ordinary seasons; work was provided for every able bodied man and woman, and for children above twelve years; where there were aged and helpless people or children, heads of houses could receive sufficient rice for their support. If China, with her endless famines, here and there, could have a few officials such as the gentlemen who handled matters relating to the recent famine, these men would surely boycott even Chinese famines.

There will be suffering all through this northern part of Japan this winter and afterward. It will be a steady heavy endless suffering for hundreds and thousands of poor people. The officials will do everything possible. The people will be able to exist, but it will be at the expense of a finer type of character. The struggle for existence when it becomes fierce, tends to push man back towards the brute. Their Majesties, the Emperor and Empress, have put new courage and joy into multitudes by their sympathy expressed in generous gifts of money, and especially, by sending one of his majesty's chamberlains to assure the stricken people of warm sympathy from the Throne.

Our American missionary community, through any member of their standing committee (A. K. Feust, Chairman; A. W. Cyoce, Treas.; D. B. Schneider; H. W. Schwartz; E. C. Robinson; Miss A. A. Acock; and J. H. De Forest) will gladly receive gifts, and will use them as donors may direct, for the relief of the sufferers in this and neighbouring provinces.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, September 8.

It is characteristic of present day Russia, and chiefly thanks to M. Stolipin's grandiose scheme of changing the conditions of land-ownership from the communal to the individual, that more and more attention is being paid day by day to the needs of Russia's staple industry—that of agriculture. Russia was once, not so very long ago, the granary of Europe. The great famine year, nearly twenty years ago now, temporarily lost her the confidence of her chief foreign markets and since that date enormous strides have been made in Canada and the Argentine in the business of supplying, in particular, England with her bread-stuffs. Last year's bumper harvest, combined with unfavourable conditions in other parts of the world, once more brought Russia into the front rank, her old place, and the harvest of this year will suffice to enable her to keep that place. In every direction the interest in Russia's staple industry is being displayed, and the outcome is the proposal to found a Chamber of Agriculture with branches all over the Empire. The proposal has already taken shape, its regulations are drawn up and have been submitted to the Government, which, as usual in the case of novelties, has forwarded the proposals to the provincial authorities interested for their opinions before finally passing the regulations. The Chamber of Agriculture will serve to centralise all those public bodies and individual land-owners who are personally concerned in one or other of the forms of agriculture practised in Russia. Among other points it is intended to maintain agents in foreign countries properly qualified to give information about the resources and practices of Russia. It is unnecessary to enter into a lengthy account of the hundred and one matters that will be brought under the cognisance of this Chamber of Agriculture, inasmuch as its main value will lie in the fact that never again will the Russian Government be in a position to ignore the interests of the staple industry of the country in favour of industries which, however important, must yet be always of minor consequence to an agricultural country like Russia. Thus the policy pursued for many years under Count (then M.) Witte's auspices of bolstering up every kind of industry known while ignoring the cry of the men dependent upon the land will hardly be repeated. It has served its turn in enriching in the most rapid manner the coffers of the State, which has now turned to the slower but surer means dictated by true statesmanship of bringing up to a proper level the once neglected industry of agriculture. Under the steady guidance of M. Stolipin there is no fear of agriculture being placed second to anything, and for the rest the establishment of a Chamber of Agriculture, centering all the interests of the land throughout this vast Empire, will put in the hands of landowners a sufficiently powerful instrument to prevent any future government straying into the paths of error for the sake of gains readily realised and quickly collected. That the line of true statesmanship for Russia lies in this direction has never been doubted; for, with the improvement of agriculture will disappear many of the vexed questions of social life, and every other industry must prosper in proportion to the prosperity of the staple industry. Up to the present day there has not existed in Russia any organ that in any way served the purpose of a central representative of the agricultural interests of a country almost entirely agricultural. Every other form of industrial interest has long had its Chamber or Congress meeting at regular periods, or other central body of counsel and control. Truly Russia is, in the literal sense of the word, a preposterous land! But the changes now in progress are so wide and deep that probably one ought to say "was" a preposterous land, with a sigh of regret at the thought that in another generation Russia will be on the way to becoming as uninteresting, smooth and flat, as any other highly civilised country of the west.

M. Stolipin has been visiting farms on the individual ownership plan in the neighbourhood of Moscow and has now gone to Nearer-Siberia for the same purpose.

KING NICHOLAS OF MONTENEGRO.

The Grand Duke Nicholas Nikolaevich has arrived at Cetinje as the special envoy of the Emperor of Russia to present to King Nicholas of Montenegro the baton of a Russian Field Marshal. The Grand Duke was conveyed from Fiume to Antivari on board the "Czarevich" which with two other Russian warships, forming the training squadron of the year, are assisting to do honour to the newly created Kingdom.

ITALY AND THE BALANCE OF POWER.

The prominent part taken by the King of Italy at the celebrations in Cetinje prompts the Novoe Vremja to indulge in further prophecies about the probability of the splitting up of the Triple Alliance in which Italy is believed to be already a lukewarm partner. By an arithmetical calculation of forces, says the Novoe Vremja, the Powers of the Triple Entente are slightly stronger on land and sea than the powers of the Triple Alliance. (It is significant, in this reckoning, that the British Army is put down as a cipher, England being reckoned in only as a naval Power). If Italy seceded from the Triple Alliance and went over to the entente the balance would be overwhelmingly in favour of the latter arithmetically. Things are probably very much better as they are. Overwhelming power is a temptation and well balanced forces, with an adequate allowance of suspicions and uncertainties to keep the mind occupied day by day, are the aim and end of all good diplomacy and the best guarantee against any breach of international peace.

NAVAL ACCIDENT TO A SUBMARINE.

The Minister of Marine, entering the narrow gate into Kronstadt port the other day at full speed on his steam yacht, ran foul of a submarine that was crossing the harbour. The submarine was going awash and five men were on its deck, of whom one was killed by drowning, the others rescued after they had been some time in the water.

THE PLAGUE.

It is officially denied that the plague has been brought to Kiev from Odessa, the deaths that occurred there, suspected to be from plague, having been found, on bacteriological examination, to be not from plague. Nevertheless the alarm in Kiev is very great, owing to the large number of refugees from Odessa flocking into the town. According to the official figures, since the plague broke out in Odessa there have been 76 cases with 18 deaths, 21 recoveries and 37 left in hospital. The municipality has voted fifty thousand pounds sterling to cope with the dread disease, which has certainly spread to Nikolaev and, it is reported, to other towns. A number of Bulgarian doctors have arrived in Odessa to study the plague.

The most alarming intelligence, however, comes from the Province of Semirechinsk where 17 deaths have taken place from a form of plague infinitely more appalling than the Bubonic plague. The latter is curable and is conveyed only by contact. The form of plague which attacks the lungs is conveyed by the air, which the patient poisons in breathing, and may thus be carried beyond the limits of all possible precautions: it is believed to be, moreover, absolutely incurable. It is the lung form of plague which has now a good hold in the Semirechinsk province at Aksay. St. Petersburg proposes to raise twenty thousand pounds to secure the capital from infection.

The Government sanitary commission appointed to protect the capital against the possible introduction of plague has recommended among other measures that every person leaving Odessa shall be provided with a railway or steamship ticket only on condition of producing his passport, on which the issuing clerk shall stamp the date of his departure from the infected town, and he shall be under medical supervision for five days after leaving.

The district in the Semirechinsk Province which has developed the most deadly form of plague, that which attacks the lungs and is spread by the air one breathes, has now been entirely isolated, and no further news will be heard of what is happening within the cordon until the pest has spent itself and normal communications are renewed.

SCHOOL TO STUDY JAPANESE.

The Japanese Consul-General has organised at a school here a course in the Japanese language at popular prices. In four months' study a satisfactory acquaintance with Japanese is to be acquired.

POLITICIAN DENIED FUNERAL SERVICES.

In the Province of Samara a politician who took an active part in the elections to the First Duma recently died, and was refused burial according to the rites of the Orthodox Church by the local priesthood on the ground that for ten years past he had ignored the Church and its observances. It was pointed out that death came very suddenly, but the priests were firm, and, with the help of the police the body of the unfortunate politician was laid to rest in consecrated ground but without any service whatsoever being said over the body. Legal proceedings are to be taken.

MURDER SUSPECTS RELEASED.

The landlord and others at an inn at Vilna who were recently arrested in connection with the curious disposal of a murdered man's body in a sofa which was removed from the inn and found sunk in a neighbouring pond, have been released from custody. Suspicion has turned in another direction, the police having discovered a clue which points to the body having been brought from Moscow. It is suspected that the murdered man is a well-known wealthy Moscow merchant who disappeared mysteriously some time ago and has never been traced.

RUMOURED RESIGNATION OF M. IZVOLSKY.

Rumours are again current prophesying the speedy resignation of the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs of M. Izvolsky. As usual, on the oft-repeated occasions when these rumours have been started before, they are traceable to quarters where the wish has already so often done duty as father to the thought. M. Izvolsky is the first Foreign Minister of Russia who has successfully based a world-wide policy on foundations that are quite distinct from the forces of "Germanism" which to so great an extent dominated the foreign policy of Russia for centuries. According to the prolific source of these rumours, M. Izvolsky has resigned or been dismissed about twice a year for three years past, always with circumstantial details concerning his next post and the reasons for giving up his present one. Some day, no doubt, the rumours will come true, for Ministerial posts are not held in perpetuity nor are even Ministers immortal. Meantime M. Izvolsky remains Russian Minister of Foreign Affairs, and no breach in the wall of friendship uniting England and Russia has yet been effected.

ST. PETERSBURG SANITATION.

The indignation of the people of St. Petersburg at the unsanitary condition of the capital culminated last night in a noisy meeting of the city council, an "extraordinary" meeting to consider the question of going on with the construction of what are called "pre-filters." The party of reform attacked the municipal executive with charges of "criminal negligence" in matters of sanitation and indifference to the pockets of the ratepayers. The "pre-filters" were begun a year ago and abandoned, the town having to pay a large sum for this wasteful use of time and energy. It was proved by statistics that it made little difference whether the Neva water was filtered or not before entering the service pipes, inasmuch as all the water, filtered and absolutely unfiltered, was run into a collecting basin together before distribution. Now the percentage of cholera vibrations in the various forms of water differed considerably, but in none were so many vibrios found as in the common basin, which has not been cleaned, it is alleged, since 1894. The Lord Mayor and executive were loudly called upon to resign, but made no reply to the most telling of the attacks upon their doings. As usual no conclusion was arrived at, and matters will go on as before for another month or thereabouts.

LIVE WIRE ACCIDENT.

A horse was killed and its driver seriously burned this morning by the falling of a tramway electric wire. The live wire broke under the pressure of a number of telephone or other wires which fell upon it. A fire-call being turned in, the firemen, in galoshes and rubber gloves, cut the wire and prevented further mischief.

AVIATION IN RUSSIA.

Near the race-course on the outskirts of St. Petersburg work is proceeding for the construction of an enormous aerodrome, said to be the largest yet known. It was intended to hold a "National Aviation Week" (nearly a fortnight in-reality) about the middle of this month, but a hitch has occurred, and it is now asserted that the weather will prove quite unsuitable to flying. The meeting was to be under the auspices of the Russian Imperial Aero-Club.

RUSSIAN TRADE IN MANCHURIA.

The Russian consul at Mukden reports that while Russian manufactured goods and glassware find a ready sale in Manchuria, there are only two Russian firms in this important centre. The bulk of the Russian business is done by Chinese shopkeepers who are Russia's best customers and actively push her goods.

THE TWO LINES OF DEFENCE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, September 29.)

SINCE the dawn of sea power at Salamis, and its asseveration on a score of memorable occasions from Actium to Tsushima, it has been recognized that the world-empire cannot rest on military strength alone. Were it possible to conceive of a congeries of States situated in the heart of a continent, unblest with a mile of coast-line and self-supporting in every respect, the all-sufficiency of military power might with propriety be advanced for such a case. But, so far as our memory serves, no such condition of things exists on this planet, nor, we believe, has ever existed. The nearest approach to the land-bound Empire in this present age is that of Austria-Hungary; but, fortunately—or unfortunately, as the case may be—even Austria must necessarily, by virtue of her Adriatic sea-board, take rank as a maritime Power. Indeed it must be admitted, in this day of Dreadnoughts and super-Dreadnoughts (so convincing have been the demonstrations of the efficacy of sea-power in recent and present-day history), that the claims of military power per se are apt to suffer by comparison, and even to be regarded as of something less than secondary importance. Perhaps there dwells in sea-power a quality which appeals in a special manner to the imagination; something, also, of the spectacular, let us say, in the launch of a Dreadnought, which touches a chord in the popular mind as no display of military force can hope to do. Or it may be that the Insular Power, pinning its faith to a fleet, will not pause to consider the claims of an army. Doubtless it is in some such considerations as these that we must look for the explanation of the apparently predominating influence of sea-power on the minds of the nations. For what else can this feature of world politics be called, when Turkey buys old battleships, and the leading military nation of the world sends its newest Dreadnought on a prolonged cruise round South America to advertise the efficacy of naval power, as evolved in Teutonic dockyards? But, it may be argued, the proposition is capable of being reversed. One may conceive, for example, of a nation entirely insular, independent, self-contained—possessing no interests beyond its own shores. Could not such a nation rest in absolute security behind the bulwarks of a fleet, and safely cast all considerations of land forces to the winds? This case, we fancy, remains as rare as that of the land-bound Empire; but were there such a State, with no other frontiers than the sea, it could not enjoy complete security, except in the event of its fleet being superior to that of each of its possible foes—or, indeed, to any probable combination of those foes. In such a context, of course, the cases of Australia and New Zealand suggest themselves. Does any student of affairs suppose that, had these island-States been left, during the past half century, to their own devices in the matter of defence from external aggression, they would be found to day in their present untrammelled freedom, flying the same great Flag? Either they would long since have been compelled to make the most enormous sacrifices of men and treasure—sacrifices, indeed, in this instance quite impossible of accomplishment—or they would have been compelled to bend in submission to some alien Power, whose arms of steel were long enough and strong enough to reach and strike even across the wide Pacific. But Australia and New Zealand to-day are safe, or comparatively safe, by reason of the protecting ægis of the greatest Maritime Power the world has yet seen, and by reason of this alone. Nevertheless, these two insular nations, the perspective of their vision sharpened by distance, have grasped the possibility that a combination of untoward circumstances might conceivably deprive them of that naval protection which, in the past, has proved so great a boon. In other words, they foresee a not wildly improbable situation—the climax of some great international struggle—in which the whole of England's naval forces would of sheer necessity be required in her own home-waters, and Australasia be left defenceless and alone. For which reason, the inhabitants of these island-States have taken steps to provide themselves with a second line of defence. The principle of universal military training has been accepted, with all the sacrifices that acceptance involves, and a Citizen Army whose strength in a few years will reach 200,000 men has been established. In this way, therefore, as well as by wise coöperation with the Mother Country in the matter of naval defence—the Commonwealth contributes half a million annually towards the upkeep of an Australasian “fleet-unit,” of which the flag-ship will be a Dreadnought-cruiser presented to the Empire by New Zealand—the citizens of these remote Dominions will enjoy a measure of security which few States on this fevered Earth at present know. Such prudent and comprehensive provision against the evil day points a moral for each of the self-governing portions of the Empire, and, more than ail, for the Mother Country herself. That moral is, that the policy of “muddling through” must be done with for ever, and that so vital a question as that of national security must be not left to Chance.

TOKYO NOTES.

The Tokyo School for foreign children has opened with a new principal under whose direction it is expected to prove a more successful institution than it has been in the past. Already there is a fair attendance, and other pupils are anticipated. As part of the staff is British and part American, those will possibly be satisfied who formerly complained that instruction and textbooks were too much on the lines of one country or the other. It is to be regretted that in so small an English speaking community the financing of an institution on which depends the education of children should be left almost wholly to private enterprise. Notwithstanding the circumstance that many of the foreigners in Tokyo are without children, some of these have most generously supported the funds of the school. Yet the amount thus secured, even together with the fees, does not total a sum sufficient to meet all the expenses of the school. Might not the Government of Great Britain and the United States be induced to take an interest in the education of the children of their exiles overseas in Japan? If this be supposed too much to expect, we can only reply that the German Government does not think so. We understand that the German Government, through its Consul at Kobe, contributes a generous sum toward the expenses of the German school in that town, and this in conjunction with a liberal response from the German community, has placed that school on a firm footing. Teachers on liberal salaries have been specially brought out from the Fatherland for the instruction of the youth; and as the institution is now one of the best, even British and American parents are taking advantage of it. The interest thus taken by the Emperor of Germany in his subjects far removed from the advantages of home education, is surely one worthy of all emulation; certainly it should not be an example beneath the notice of other governments. If the British and American Governments took an equal interest in schools for the children of their respective nationals in Kobe, Yokohama and Tokyo, efficient schools could well be maintained in these cities. As it is, parents have to go to more expense than they can afford, and even then the results are for from what could be had at home. Some of our Tokyo citizens are sufficiently well off to be able to engage governesses and tutors who live in the family and teach the children, but very few can afford so great a luxury. May we not hope that in time the governments representing the Anglo-Saxon peoples will take an equal interest with the German Government in seeing that children have a chance for education even in so remote a country as Japan?

It is noticeable that the summer's constant rains have affected to a considerable extent property in various parts of the city, especially in the elevated portions where there has been a disposition to landslides. In many places stone walls, even those that have weathered many a long year, have to be reset or rebuilt. The beautiful slope of green around the southern moat of the Imperial Palace grounds has also in places begun to give way, large portions here and there having already fallen into the water, and workmen have been for some weeks engaged in rebuilding and resodding the activity. The process of widening and modernizing Tokyo streets still goes on apace. The programme of street improvement contemplated by the city fathers of the Capital is a very elaborate one, embracing widening and extension of all the larger thoroughfares of the city, and when this is completed, as it will be eventually in the next few years, Tokyo will be one of the finest cities in the world. If the very ambitious plans for harbour improvement are also carried out, the commercial interests of the Capital will be still further enhanced.

In a recent reference to the unusual number of new buildings being erected in Tokyo the edifice of the Meiji University was inadvertently overlooked. This is an imposing structure in wood, architecturally plain, but in good taste, surmounting the hill beside the street railways on Surugadai. When all the buildings connected with the University are completed, the institution will be able to boast the finest school accommodation in the city. The class rooms are large and airy, well lighted and comfortably furnished, the general appointment being in every way up to date. Further new buildings now approaching completion are those comprising the naval arsenal at Tsukiji. The new arsenal is chiefly of corrugated iron, and covers an extensive area with much more elaborate accommodation than that in Mita from which it removes. On the grounds adjoining the Naval Medical College is being erected a fine naval hospital which promises to be one of the best models of its kind in the Empire.

From one recently returned from London we learn that the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition was not such a failure as some of the Tokyo vernacular journals would make it out. With the section under the direction of the Japanese Government no fault whatever could be found; but the side-shows and other forms of entertainment wholly under the manager of Mr. Kiralfy, which are reported undignified to say the least, excited a certain amount of criticism among friends of Japan. There is some suspicion that the authorities may have to some extent been misled by this shrewd Exposition Manager, to whose judgement they had so much to trust. Of course his main object was to make money, and he naturally furthered the amusement section, as a large percentage of the takings enriched his pocket. But the Government exhibits, especially in the sections of Education and Fine Arts, were exceedingly fine, and such as could not be seen even in Japan by the public, as most of the art specimens are the property of private gentlemen. On the whole then it is the conviction of an intelligent and unprejudiced witness that the Government's part in the Exhibition did credit to Japan, while the less representative sections under the auspices of private enterprise were doubtless taken for what they were worth. The people patronizing these were those who went to the Exhibition merely for purposes of pleasure to pass away an idle hour, and therefore were of a class not likely to take much interest in the event as a Japanese enterprise. Consequently the opinion of those concerned with the affair for reasons of pleasure rather than as representative of Japan, need not be taken as affecting one way or the other the relations between the two countries. If therefore the side-shows were not what the Japanese could approve of, they will at least have the consolation of knowing that those that did approve of them are not of much account in Japan's relations with the British public. The people really interested in the Exhibition as illustrative of Japanese civilization and achievement are the class whose opinion is worth having, for they are the controllers of British public views; and these, we are glad to know, took a keen interest in the more serious and representative sections of the Exhibition, and expressed themselves as greatly delighted with what they saw.

COUNT HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPU.")

CXI.—FIRST SECRETARY SHIODA ATSUNOBU.

Tsume ni hi wo
Tomoshite tameta
Nisen ryō
Sasuga Shioda wa
Karoime ni au.

"With the utmost frugality Shioda has saved 2000 ryō. Now that he has met with great misfortune and has lost them, they have become a salt field (Shioda)."

Shioda Atsunobu was afterwards Minister in Peking. He had great talents and abilities, and an excellent knowledge of International Law and Physiology, but his usefulness was much impaired by his extremely miserly habits.

CXII.—OKAMATSU RENYO.

Two Hongwanji priests, Shimachi Mokurai and Okamatsu Renjo, were in London at the time. The latter frequently came to see me and we would sometimes spend a whole night together in talk. It was through him that I first came to be interested in Buddhism. He was a man for whom I had the highest respect. I had very few opportunities of seeing him after our return to Japan, for we lived a long way apart, and I was constantly changing my dwelling place. Besides our professions were very different.

CXIII.—ENGAGING PROFESSORS FOR THE UNIVERSITY.

In 1872 the Ambassador and his suite crossed over to Paris, Mr. Thiers being President at the time. I did not understand French, and there was nothing for me to do in Paris, so I remained behind in London for the purpose of engaging professors for the contemplated Engineering College at Tora no mon, Tokyo. Early in 1873 I crossed to Calais. The ex-Emperor of the French had just died and I met many Frenchmen of rank who were crossing over to England for the funeral, among them, Marshal MacMahon. Indeed the number of Frenchmen coming over was so great that I was obliged to delay my journey one day in consequence. I was not a little impressed by the respect which was still evinced in France for the deceased Monarch.

CXIV.—EMPEROR OR QUEEN.

I have said before that Sir Harry Parkes was much disliked by the Japanese as long as he was in Japan. Many stories are told of his arrogance, rudeness, and unseemly behaviour: amongst others, that he once threw a tumbler at Count Sawa, Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The facts, however, of this story, as I heard them, are these, Sir Harry Parkes could read Chinese characters. One day he complained to Count Sawa that the Japanese were disposed to make light of the Queen of England, and demanded that in future she should always be officially spoken of as kōtei ("Emperor"), pointing out that the Japanese were disposed to consider jō ō ("Queen") as something inferior in rank to kōtei or jōtei. Count Sawa replied that there were in Japanese phrases such as Kinnō "loyalty," Oseifukuko, "restoration of the royal Government," which showed that ō was frequently used as the exact equivalent of Kōtei. To this Sir Harry retorted that the Foreign Minister's view might be correct from a literary point of view, but that the distinction was popularly made, as, for instance, in the words shinno, "Prince of the blood," and Shō-ō, "a dependent King." He demanded therefore that, if the Japanese could not bring themselves to speak of the Queen of England as Kōtei, they should use her English title and speak of her as "Queen." "That can easily be done," replied Count Sawa, "but in that case you must not be surprised if the word "Queen," written with Kana, becomes in popular parlance Kinnu ("edible dog")." Count Sawa was merely joking, but the British Minister was very much offended. Seizing a tumbler off the table he dashed it on to the ground. "A single word from a responsible Minister," he said, "may often involve two nations in war. If England were to attack Japan with her fleet, Japan would be smashed to pieces like this tumbler." Count Sawa was much confused by this turn of the conversation, but he learned for the future the need and the wisdom of picking his words. From that time it became customary for us to speak of the Sovereigns of all countries, irrespective of their titles or importance, as Kōtei. There was something humorous in the phrase the "Kōtei of Hawaii."

CXV.—SIR HARRY PARKES VISITS NAGOYA CASTLE.

The British Minister once went to visit the Castle of Nagoya. The Governor of the Province, Mr. Iseki, had prepared a banquet, and awaited the arrival of the Minister, when he proposed that they should dine first and visit the Castle afterwards. The British Minister, however, replied that he had come to see the Castle and wanted to see that first. He could take his dinner at anytime.

"The Governor afterwards complained to me of Sir Harry's rudeness. I don't think Sir Harry meant to be rude on this occasion. The local officials had been prejudiced against Englishmen whom they expected to be rude and overbearing and consequently misinterpreted Sir Harry's words from the very start. It often fell to my lot to interpret for Sir Harry in his negotiations with officials of our Government. I never knew him to use harsh or impolite words, but he cross-questioned very sharply if he got vague and evasive answers. It was this that made him so unpopular with our people.

CXVII.—THE ART OF TRANSLATION.

Translators from one language into another must know both well if they would avoid falling into all manner of ridiculous mistakes. When I was engaged at the American Legation as interpreter, it happened that the Aomori garrison captured a vessel called the Taikomaru, and hauled down the American flag, which they found her flying. As matter of fact the vessel had been sold to an American merchant at Hakodate, so that she had every right to the stars and stripes. The Aomori authorities, however, did not know this, and suspected that the flag was flown merely as a ruse.

A diplomatic correspondence followed and the Minister for Foreign Affairs sent a letter of apology to the American Legation. In the body of this letter occurred the words Kikkoku no kokki ni taishi shikkei, which I translated quite literally, giving shikkei the meaning of "loss of respect," as though it meant that the Americans had lost all respect for the American flag. When I showed the Minister my translation, he looked surprised and asked me if I had not made a mistake. I was quite sure that I had not: I had given a straight literal translation of the words. So the Minister referred the matter to Dr. Hepburn, who explained to him that while the primary meaning of shikkei was just as I had given it, its ordinary meaning was to "show disrespect," and that the Japanese Foreign Office, far from saying that it had lost all respect for the American flag, was apologizing for the disrespect which had been unintentionally shown it!

CXVIII.—OUR AMBASSADOR AND THE AMERICAN OFFICER'S WIFE.

Whilst we were at Salt Lake City the Commanding officer of the Division stationed there invited us all to tea. It was a very snowy day, and very few ladies were able to put in an appearance. The Commandant's wife, who did not look more than thirty herself, apologized to the Prince. "I am sorry," she said, "that I have no young ladies to show your Excellency." "Don't mention it," was the polite answer, "I like them old."

CXIX.—KIDO AND THE MAYOR'S DAUGHTER.

One evening, when our party was staying at Manchester, the Mayor invited us all to the theatre. An immense number of people had been invited to meet us, and we were divided into two parties, the Mayoress and her daughter receiving the guests at one entrance, and the Mayor with his secretary at another.

During the course of the evening, the Secretary saw Kido sitting next to the Mayor's daughter, and by way of saying something remarked that Kido ought to consider himself highly complimented to have been given such a distinguished person. "Yes," said Kido, wishing to say the right thing, "I am quite ashamed to be seen sitting beside her." I did my best to smooth it over by trying to explain that the word haz kashii meant "modest" rather than "ashamed." But I could not make all things smooth, and conversation between Kido and the young lady seemed to languish after that.

CXX.—GENERAL GRANT AND PRINCE IWAKURA.

When President Grant paid his visit to Japan, Prince Iwakura went to meet him at Shimbashi. The Prince had made the General's acquaintance in America. "Ah," he said, as he shook hands with the visitor, "I never expected (nozomimasenu) to see you in Japan." His interpreter was more ready than accurate. "The Prince hoped," he said, "never to see you in this country." General Grant gave his wife a strange little look; but Ito was fortunately at hand to put things straight. Interpretation is a most difficult art: that is why interpreters get such good salaries at the Embassies.

in Constantinople I have often in London heard people from Japan being strangely misinterpreted by incompetent translators.

CXXI.—ENGAGING PROFESSORS.

The old College of Engineering, later merged into the Imperial University, was under the Department of Public Works. Ito was Minister of the Department, prior to the despatch of Iwakura's Mission. Mr. (afterwards Viscount) Yamao Yozo was the Director of the Yokosuka Dockyard. Yamao sent in a memorial urging that a school for the blind should be established; but to this project Ito was strongly opposed, being of the opinion that, in the then state of Japan, the wants of the men with eyes were more urgent than those of the men with none. When the Embassy left Japan, Yamao succeeded Ito as Minister for Public Works, and it was he who devised the project of the College of Engineering. Shortly after his appointment, he wrote a letter to Ito in England, requesting him to purchase all the necessary machinery and outfit and to engage suitable professors. This latter task Ito entrusted to Mr. Hugh Matheson, whom he had known during his student days in London; and I was detached from the Embassy whilst in Paris, to return to London, to assist Mr. Matheson, to go back to Japan with the newly appointed Professors, and to take part in the organization of the new College. Mr. Hugh Matheson was connected with the well-known Eastern firm of that name, and was a rich merchant. He reckoned Sir William Thomson (Lord Kelvin), Dr. Rankin, Dr. Williams, and others among his intimate friends, and was a man excellently fitted for the selection of the professors we wanted. We obtained the service of an excellent staff of teachers, and some of our then Professors are now Fellows of the Royal Society.

CXXII.—THE JEALOUSY OF THE EDUCATION DEPARTMENT.

The methods adopted at the College were calculated to discourage "cramming" and to lay special importance on practical experiments. At the same time there was a special course in which the students were encouraged to devote themselves to the study and elaboration of scientific theories. Our plans worked out very successfully, and the College, besides attracting a good number of students, became a show place for foreign visitors to be taken over. All this roused the jealousy of the Education Department, who insisted that the College ought to stand under their jurisdiction. To this plan I was constantly opposed. The change could have no result, unless it were to increase the vainglory of the Department of Education. It could not increase the efficiency of the College, nor diminish the expenses of running it. I stuck to my guns in this matter until 1886, when, in consequence of great administrative reforms, the College was annexed to the Imperial University.

CXXIII.—(MARQUIS) OKUBO'S FIRM ATTITUDE.

In the year 1872, differences of opinion as to the course to be pursued in Korea, shook the Government to its very base. Prince Sanjo, who was at the time Prime Minister, was between the fires of the two contending views, and his worries were so great that he fell ill and was obliged to resign. Iwakura succeeded him, and soon after his accession to office, Saigo and his sympathizers, who were all for the declaration of war, threw up their offices and retired into private life. It was due solely to Okubo's firmness that the difficulties were tidied over peacefully. A Satsuma man told me, at a later period, that when, during this crisis, Okubo was asked for advice by one of his colleagues in the Cabinet, he turned on him and said solemnly: "You are a Minister of the State; it is your duty to do what you yourself think to be right, and not to ask others for their advice."

I am sorry not to be able to chronicle the name of the Minister to whom Okubo administered this snubbing, for my informant did not know it himself. But the story will serve to show up Okubo's sternness.

CXXIV.—KIRINO LOSES HIS TEMPER WITH IWAKURA.

When the dispute between the advocates of peace and war with Korea was in full swing, Major-General Kirino paid a visit to Prince Iwakura. Of course the topic which was in every one's mind turned up in the course of conversation, and of course it led to high words. "Kisasa," said Kirino, quite forgetting whom he was addressing, for the word is only used in speaking to persons for whom we have the profoundest contempt, "Kisasa, you are a wicked traitor to the Empire." The word was of course a foolish one to use, but my reason for telling the story is to show how hot were our passions and party hatreds at the time. None but a man blinded with anger would have used such a term to a man like Prince Iwakura.

CXXV.—KIRINO'S RESIDENCE.

The site on which now stands the mansion of Baron Iwasaki, together with a considerable piece of Yushima, Hongo, which adjoins it—several tens of thousands of tsubo in all,—belonged to the Lords of Sakakibara during the period of the Tokugawa rule. At the restoration it passed into the hands of Major-General Kirino. When the war-party was defeated in the Council, and the malcontents were preparing to retire into Kyushu, Kirino disposed of the property. I had a chance then (which I let slip) of buying it for yen 7,000. It is now worth millions.

CXXVI.—GOSHU ROKUEN.

Go Jinzo, who was for many years an official of the Department of Finance, once obliged a friend by buying from him a small piece of land at Ogawa machi, in Kanda, for the sum of 56 yen, which seemed a fair price at the time, and which meant a very great deal to its original possessor. In the 18th or 17th year of Meiji (1883-4) Go sold the land again, and with the proceeds built a beautiful and luxurious mansion in the fashionable quarter of Bancho. It was to this mansion that the famous sinologue, Iwaya Ichiroku, gave the name of the Goshu Rokuen Tower.

CXXVII.—THE HAYASHI HOMESTEAD.

The original home of the Hayashi Family, in which they lived until the Restoration, was at Yagenbori, on a piece of land of some 300 tsubo in area, of which at least one half was covered with dozô buildings. When the family removed to Osaka in the 1st year of Meiji (1868), the land was sold for 60 yen for the whole piece. Fourteen or fifteen years later, a certain Mr. Yoshimatsu bought the land at 100 yen per tsubo. It would be impossible to say how many yen per tsubo the land is worth now.

CXXVIII.—THE SHIBA DETACHED PALACE.

What is now the Shiba Detached Palace belonged, before the Restoration, to the late Count Mutsu. It was offered to the ex daimyo of Kishu in 1818 for 3000 yen, and was subsequently transferred, by sale or purchase, to the Imperial Household Department, who have built on it an Imperial Villa. I heard this from Count Mutsu himself.

CXXIX.—CHANGES IN OFFICIAL LIFE.

Until the year 1880 or so, the life of Government officials was very simple. But after the overthrow of Saigo, and the assassination in 1878 of Marquis Okubo, Government officials began to feel more secure in their places and to breathe more freely. It was (to use a Japanese phrase) "as though a wen had been removed from above their eye." Then commenced a period of luxurious living. Expensive villas went up, fine collections of fine arts were made, elaborate gardens were planned and constructed. Festivities became the order of the day. And the luxury, which constantly increased, brought in its train much vice and corruption.

CXXX.—CURIO COLLECTING.

It is customary in our older families to have large collections of books of art treasures and so-called curios, many of which are ancient heir-looms, highly prized on account of their historical and other associations. It is a very laudable thing to collect curios for the sake of historical or scientific investigation, but there is a fashion of curio-collecting for mere purposes of ostentation or commercial speculation which is highly reprehensible.

One might as well boast about the costly Government bonds in one's possession as make constant display of one's costly works of artistic value. That curio collecting is not generally done from a genuine love of the beautiful, is to be seen in the fact that the important thing in a work of art is not its own intrinsic merit but the name of the man that made it. A forgery is much valued so long as it is supposed to be the genuine product of a certain artist's hand; but if once it is shown to be the work of some unknown hand no intrinsic merit of its own will save it from contempt.

CXXXI.—MARQUIS OKUBO, A LIGHT SHINING IN A DARK NIGHT.

Six years after the Restoration, and two years after the abolition of the clan system, the Government was shaken to its very base by the diversities of views about the Korean problem, and everybody was alarmed. Okubo alone remained unshaken. When hundreds of civil and military officers were sending in their resignations to follow the lead of Saigo, he never turned a hair, and his quiet confidence was a most powerful factor in the speedy restoration of order and tranquil government. He was indeed a lighthouse beacon guiding mariners across strong seas. I will give a few instances to illustrate his character.

CXXXII.—OKUBO'S PROMPTITUDE.

When China and Japan were worrying one another on account of affairs in Formosa, Okubo happened to be in the Tosa Prefecture, occupied in pacifying the province after Eto Shimpei's rebellion. When he returned to Tokyo, Ito went to meet him at Shimbashi, drove home with him, and told him the story of the troubles with China. Ito thought that war was inevitable, but Okubo would not give up hope. "I am sure that there is still room for a peaceful solution," were his last words as he parted from his friend. The next morning Okubo appeared at the meeting of the Cabinet with a written petition, asking to be sent as plenipotentiary to China. The Cabinet saw its way to approve of his petition, and the Emperor sanctioned the suggestion. Okubo at once went to China and brought the matter to a peaceful and successful conclusion. I can almost fancy that I see him now with his strong, reposeful, and determined countenance.

CXXXIII.—HIS NEGOTIATIONS IN CHINA.

I had an opportunity, when I was Minister at Peking, of seeing the record of his negotiations at this time. There was very little argumentation. At Tientsin, Li Hung Chang tried to detain him, and to get the negotiations into his own hands, but Okubo refused to be moved from his settled purpose. He just left a card for Li Hung Chang, and went straight on to Peking. At Peking he called first on Mr. Wade, represented to him how great would be the losses to British commerce should there be war between Japan and China, assured him of Japan's pacific intentions, and (I think) secured the exercise of Mr. Wade's good office. I believe that a plan was already formed in his mind when he told Ito at Shimbashi that there must be some peaceful solution of the question. Okubo was as far removed as possible from the school of diplomatists who confound diplomacy with speech-making.

CXXXIV.—FORMOSA INDEMNITY.

Mutsu Munemitsu once criticised Okubo in my hearing. He said that the negotiations were a failure, because Okubo had, for a small indemnity, restored territory in Formosa which was already ours by capture. I could not agree with him. The part of Formosa which was at that time taken by our troops was the uncultivated land inhabited by the savage aborigines of the island. To continue its occupation meant giving constant annoyance to China, without any benefit to ourselves. If Mutsu, with the tact and savoir faire for which he was so famous, could have managed to get hold of the whole island at the time, the case would have been different.

CXXXV.—OKUBO'S PRIVATE RESIDENCE.

With the money which the Emperor gave him in recognition of his great services on this occasion, Okubo constructed a foreign-style mansion for himself at Kasumiga seki. The thing was carried out, at his request, by the Architectural Bureau of the Department of Public Works, at a cost which did not exceed yen 4,000.

One of his friends suggested that it would be a good plan to have the space between the weather boards and the plaster filled with sand and earth, so as to drive the rats out. The plan was adopted. Alas! one day a heavy rain soaked into the walls and presently the wet mud began oozing through the wall paper, to the great detriment of the interior.

My friend Nakai told me that Okubo had got all, or nearly all, his furniture at an auction, at the time that the big firm of Onozon went smash. Na ai was, I must own, given to joking, and therefore not always to be implicitly trusted; but I think he said the truth when he declared that Okubo had furnished his house with second-hand furniture. No one could know Okubo well without being struck by the utter simplicity of his life. And yet the building of this house, and its furnishing, was one of the counts brought against Okubo by his enemies of the Saigo party. It was supposed to be a crying monument of Okubo's vanity and extravagance. Yet it was simplicity itself, as compared with the mansions which some of our high officials of to-day have built for themselves.

MR. FUKUZAWA ON THE EVENTS IN SEOUL IN 1884.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

[The present article is taken from a MS. found amongst the late Mr. Fukuzawa's papers. It contains accounts of what he heard from Kin Gyoku Kin, Boku Eiko, Jaone Kakugoro, Imaizumi Hidetaro, and other gentlemen connected with the attempted coup d'etat in Seoul in 1884. These men, who were actually participants in the affairs, took refuge in Japan, and, the intentions of the Japanese Government being then unknown, they were concealed for some time in Mr. Fukuzawa's house at Mita. The present MS. is based principally on statements made by Kin Gyoku Kin].

Kin Gyoku Kin had long enjoyed the confidence of the King of Korea, and was much opposed to the principles of the so-called Jidaito, the party which advocated a truckling policy towards a stronger power, i.e. China. When, in 1882, Boku Eiko was sent to Japan on an embassy of good will, Kin accompanied him, and took the opportunity of trying to obtain the help of Japan for the carrying out of his designs. In this he failed, so far as official promises of assistance were concerned, but through the good offices of a high Government official, he was able to secure an advance of yen 170,000 from the Specie Bank at Yokohama. This sum was not, however, sufficient for all his plans. Early the next summer Kin came over again to Japan with a power of attorney authorizing him to raise a foreign loan of $3,000,000. This was done in spite of the opposition raised by Mr. Takezoe, then Japanese Minister at Seoul, who publicly declared that the power of attorney was a forgery. Kin got secret help in Tokyo from the American Minister, through whom he was introduced to an American merchant in Yokohama, with a view to enlisting his aid in raising the loan in America, but the plan did not succeed. Mr. Shibusawa of the First Bank was also anxious to help Kin, and would have advanced from 100,000 to 200,000 yen, had not the Minister for Foreign Affairs (Mr. Inoue) stepped in to interfere. This was in January or February 1884, and Kin returned to Korea without accomplishing anything.

The attitude taken by the Japanese Government towards Kin and his party was a very conservative and cautious one. They regarded Kin Koku, and the others who shared their hopes as light, frivolous, men, of no weight or stability, and the Japanese Legation at Seoul treated them no better than did the Foreign Office in Tokyo. Mr. Takezoe, who had returned to Tokyo on furlough, refused to meet them at all: the chargé d'affaires, Shimamura, and the other members of the Legation followed the lead of their chief.

It was in March 1884 that Kin returned to Korea. About August and September he began to make some cautious advances towards the Legation, and was glad to find that his overtures were not so coldly received as they had been.

Mone Kakugoro first went to Korea with Kin and Boku. He entered the Korean Government service, and became editor of the Kanjo Jumbō. It was not long before his writings excited the anger of the Chinese. He now approached Mr. Shimamura, the chargé d'affaires, appealing not only for personal protection but also for pecuniary assistance on account of the insufficiency of the salary paid by the Japanese Government. His appeal was, however, in vain. The Legation authorities looked up Inoue as the alter ego (i jin-dō-i) of Kin and his companions and refused to give any assistance.

Inoue consequently left Seoul and returned to Tokyo, arriving there in May. War between China and France was threatening, and it was confidently believed that hostilities were unavoidable. The Tokyo Foreign Office was afraid lest Inoue's paper should fall into Chinese hands, and was consequently willing to make him a small grant to enable him to continue his work.

When Inoue returned to Seoul he found Mr. Shimamura carrying on negotiations with the Korean Government. He was trying to get them to allow the Anglo-Korean Convention to be applied to the proposed Commercial Treaty between Korea and Japan, but in this he failed. The Legation was still averse to the friendship offered them by Kin and Boku. They were on terms of intimacy with Kan Keishoku and Ri So-in whom they considered to be friends of Japan, and took but little note of the doings of Kin and Boku. Inoue's arrival changed the aspect of affairs. He managed to introduce Kin to Mr. Shimamura, and it was not long before the two men got into the way of consulting one another on their common objects.

II.

The mail arriving from Japan in the middle of September brought the news that China had proclaimed throughout the Empire that she was going to war with France. The same mail also brought many pictures and cartoons representing the division of China among the Powers. The news caused much disquiet in Korea, and high officials were eagerly debating among themselves as to what line Korea should take in the event of actual hostilities breaking out between China and France. Mr. Shimamura had a secret conference with Kin Gyokukin and Kan Keishoku and advised them to urge the Chinese Government to withdraw its troops from Korea. He (Mr. Shimamura) was much displeased at this time with Bin Eiyoku, who was constantly in the company of Chinese Officials both at festive entertainments and on hunting parties; as a set off to which Kin Gyoku Kin did everything in his power to give public expression to his esteem for Japan and the Japanese. This brought Kin Gyoku Kin into close touch with the Japanese Legation, which was thus, through Kin, enabled to enter into relations with Boku Eiko and other leaders of the Korean Independent Party.

One day Kin Gyoku Kin said to Mr. Shimamura; "Korea, as you see, is merely a piece of Chinese territory. The Sovereignty is virtually in the hands of China, and the Korean Ministers are so busily occupied in listening to the commands of China that they seem to have forgotten all about their own King. My colleagues and I are ready to sacrifice our lives to emancipate our country from the supremacy of China, but we are much troubled by the fact that there seems to be a fear of China in your countrymen. When I was in your country appealing for assistance, your people did nothing to help me, they rather threw obstacles in my way. This is a bitter disappointment, but we are not daunted by it. If no help comes to us from outside, we can take our lives in our hands and work out our own salvation."

Mr. Shimamura did his best to comfort him. He assured him that Japan was in no wise afraid of China, that she would rejoice to see the independence of Korea fully established, and that should Kin and his party determine on a rising they might rely on his giving them any assistance that lay in his power.

After that the leaders of the party of Korean independence had frequent interviews with the Japanese chargé d'affaires, and having satisfied themselves as to the bona fide character of his goodwill were consulting about the practical measures to be taken, when, to their surprise and alarm, the news reached Seoul that Minister Takezoe was returning from his furlough. All their hopes, they thought, would now be put to an end, for, besides his well known hesitancy and conservatism, the Japanese Minister and Kin had always been like fire and water together. Again Shimamura re-assured them. There would be no change in the policy of the Japanese Legation, and whatever might be Mr. Takezoe's private feeling towards Kin, they would not be allowed to interfere with the transaction of public business.

This was in the middle of October. On the 30th of the Month, Mr. Takezoe returned to Seoul, the Legation Guard having been relieved a few days previously by a detachment from the Sendai Division. On the 31st the Minister ought to have called at the Palace, but he excused himself on the plea that he was unwell. The whole of that day he was closeted with Shimamura and Inoue Kakugoro, telling them that Japan had made up her mind to fight China, on some plea connected with Korea, and that in order to gain the good will of the Koreans, she was going to return to them the indemnity of yen 400,000.

The news was not long in reaching the ears of Boku, who went at once to the Japanese Legation to see the Minister, but was denied admittance. The next day (Nov. 1) he was admitted to an interview. He told the Minister all about the condition of affairs in Seoul, and he sought the help of Japan for the reforms which he and his colleagues contemplated. The Minister insisted strongly on the need of reform, and hinted at the possibility of help from Japan, but gave no details as to how the help might be given. In the afternoon of the same day, Kin, who had also heard the rumours, arrived at the Legation on the same errand. He spoke to the Minister at length on the dangerous states of the country. If things were left to run their course they would go from bad to worse and the country would finish by becoming a province of China. It was the desire of his party to save her from this fate. Mr. Takezoe approved of his intentions, but wanted to know what steps were in contemplation. Kin gave no direct reply. He told the Minister that it was of the first importance to have confidence in a man, for without confidence one could not open one's heart nor take good counsel. The Minister had always, hitherto, treated him with suspicion, until that was removed it would be impossible for him to say all that was in his heart. Kin therefore asked the Minister what grounds he had for his constant suspicions. Mr. Takezoe was at a loss for a satisfactory answer, but parried the question by suddenly asking Kin what the Korean Independents would do if a third party should put in an appearance with promises or suggestions of help. Kin replied that it was certainly true that his party stood in great need of help from some outside party, but as to what would be the Koreans' attitude towards that party he could make no answer until he had consulted with his colleagues. He had noticed with great pleasure, from the demeanour of Mr. Shimamura, the change that was coming over the policy of the Japanese Government; but he was extremely anxious that the Japanese should trust him more and that they should take no rash steps. He then took his leave.

III.

On the second of November Minister Takezoe proceeded to the Palace for an audience, and informed the King of the Emperor of Japan's action in returning the yen 400,000 of indemnity. He was also the bearer of a present of 16 Murata rifles. Having finished this part of his errand the Minister then proceeded to demand a private audience, at which he urged upon the king the helpless condition of China, the futility of expecting assistance from her, the need of western civilization, and the imperative necessity for Korea of asserting her independence. No one was present at this private conference except Ri Soen whom Takezoe trusted, believing him to be a favourer of the Japanese claims. In this belief Takezoe was quite mistaken, for Ri Soen betrayed his confidence, and the details of the private audience were very soon known by Chinese and Koreans alike.

Whilst Mr. Takezoe was thus closeted with the King of Korea, Shimamura was waiting in the ante chamber along with the Korean Ministers, among whom was Kin Gyoku Kin. Kin spoke in Japanese, and confided to Shimamura that he and his partisans were contemplating a speedy move. In this Shimamura encouraged him, telling him to make haste, because Japan was ready for anything.

The next day being the 3rd of November, a dinner in honour of the Imperial Birthday was given at the Japanese Legation. Of Korean Ministers, Boku Eiko, Kin Gyoku kin, Ko Eishoku, Jo Kohan, Kan Keishou, and Kin Koshu were invited. (The last named was suspected of pro-Chinese tendencies, but he was Foreign Minister and could not be passed over. Li Soen was invited but was afraid to accept the invitation for fear of being compromised.) The Legation people were still inclined to trust Kan Keishoku and to suspect Boku and Kin on the slightest pretext. Kin was very much afraid that Kan Keishoku would overthrow his plans, he and Zoku were most anxious to break up the intimacy between Kan and the Japanese Legation, for it was of the utmost importance for their party that their plan should be carried out before the end of November, and not be liable to be thwarted by Kan's interference. Had the intimacy not been broken it is almost certain that the Japanese Minister would have refused to listen to Kin and Zoku, and that other measures would have been taken.

At the dinner were present, Mr. Foot, the American Minister, the British Consul, Mr. Aston, the Chinese Consul, Mr. Chin Jusho, and Herr Mellendorf. In the middle of the banquet, Mr. Asayama, the Interpreter of the Legation, stood up and delivered a speech in Korean on the shameless unscrupulousness and cowardice of the Chinese. He even went so far as to call the Chinese "sea-slugs," and in doing so gave a malicious glance at the Chinese Consul, who, without understanding all that was being said yet knew enough Korean to know that nasty things were being said of his country and to be mightily offended.

The next day (Nov. 4) Mr. Takezoe called at the Foreign office to press the conclusion of the Convention. The Koreans readily gave their consent, and the documents were signed on the 6th. After the exchange of signatures, Mr. Takezoe counselled Kin Eishoku, as he was a man of pronounced Chinese proclivities, to go to China and become naturalized. He would make a very excellent mandarin, and might get quite a large salary. Then he turned to In-Taishin, "you," said he, "are an intimate friend of Yuan Shi Kai's, and you treat the Chinese as you would your own Sovereign. Your loyalty is for China and not for Korea." In was much hurt at this gratuitous insult from the Minister of a foreign country, and high words passed between the two men. They would indeed have come to blows had not the bystanders intervened. Then Takezoe told Kan Keishoku of Japan's intention to make war with China. Of course Kan Keishoku told the news among his countrymen who were far from being easy in their minds in consequence. It must have been fear of the wrath of Japan that made In Taishin so long suffering under Takezoe's taunts.

On the evening of the fourth there was a small meeting at the house of Boku, at which Mr. Shimamura was present, as were also Kin, Ko, and Jo. At this meeting Kin first revealed the details of the conspirators' plan of action. Shimamura, who was not to be surprised, wanted to know how the plan was to be carried out. He was told that Ko Eishoku would give a banquet, at which action was to be taken. Koku Eishoku had only just heard of the details, and was much taken aback by its boldness of conception. And Kin more than once warned Mr. Shimamura to beware of the untrustworthiness of Kan Keishoku.

The first scheme had been to have a dinner either at Kin's house or at Boku's, and there to accomplish the purposes of the conspiracy. Kin had built a new house, and he now got his friend Jo Saisho to give a dinner party there and to invite the Cabinet Ministers. Jo did so, but very few of the invited guests accepted, which was somewhat disconcerting, as it showed that the Ministers were not very anxious to go to Kin's new house, and that consequently there was always a chance of the right people not being there when they were wanted. Other places were then suggested for the feast, but objections were raised to them all.

Then it was suggested that two men, disguised as Chinamen, should assassinate Bin Eiboku, Kan Keishoku, and Ri Soen, at some convenient opportunity, and that as soon as the rumours of the assassination got about, the patriots should accuse Bin Daiko and his son of having done the deed, and slay them on the spot. This plan, it was hoped, would get rid of many enemies at one stroke, but it was not adopted. The conspirators began to fear that they never be able to carry out their plans.

All this time, that is, during the early days of November 1884, the conspirators of the Independent party were in constant communication with the Japanese Legation, there being more than one clandestine meeting of Japanese and Koreans. The Japanese Minister, Mr. Takezoe, was a consenting party.

On the 6th of November the Shokonsha Festival Mr. Takezoe gave a great entertainment to which all Japanese in Seoul, civil and military, were invited. Fourteen Koreans were present, among them Kan Kaishoku's eldest son, Jo Saihitsu, and others. In the midst of the festivities, the Minister asked Captain Murakami to divide the whole company into two parties for a game of "flag snatching" (a very popular amusement 25 years ago). The white party were Japanese, the red flag Chinese, and when the whites won, Takezoe exclaimed so that all might hear, "What a good omen!"

A BOOK OF REFERENCE FOR CONTEMPORARY HISTORY.

The XXVth volume of the new series of Schulthess' Europaischer Geschichts Kalender has just appeared in Munich. From advance sheets which have reached us, the volume which comprises the history of the year 1909 consists of 730 closely but legibly printed pages octavo, and is edited by Dr. Ludwig Riess, whom many residents of Tokyo and Yokohama will remember with kindly affectionate feelings.

The book consists of three parts, the first of which is a chronicle for each country of Europe, arranged so that the chief events of almost every day appear in their chronological order. The notices seem to be chiefly extracts from newspapers translated into German, or taken from German newspapers. They are given very liberally, and, if one may judge from the extracts concerning Great Britain, with impartiality. There are, for instances, both German and British views quoted on the vexed question of naval armaments. It is not the Editor's object to bias the reader, but to lay before him the facts as plainly and as impartially as possible. The book calls itself a Kalendar of European History, but the time has gone by for Europe to be treated as an individual portion of the globe, without reference to the rest of the world, and there is a chapter on Asia which gives Dr. Riess an excellent opportunity for exercising his intimate knowledge with the Far East.

The second is a summary of the political developments during 1909 which occupies pp. 683-718. It is based on the chronologically arranged extracts in the previous part, and is very carefully and judiciously written, far remote indeed from the intemperate writings of partisan journalists on either side of the German Ocean. And the third part is a very carefully worked out alphabetical index, which adds very greatly to the value of the book. Any one interested in contemporary history, and conversant with German, will do well to have this valuable book of reference ready to his hand.

THE WORLD'S TELEPHONES.

The recent development of the telephone services in the world is great. The latest investigations show that the services are the most prosperous in the United States, followed by Canada, and Denmark; but Japan, Mexico, Russia, Spain, are insignificant as far as the service is concerned. Taking 100 inhabitants as the unit, the rate of the employment of the service is as follows:—

The United States.....	7.6
Canada	3.6
Denmark	3.3
Sweden	3.1
New Zealand	2.6
Norway	2.3
Switzerland.....	2.0
Germany.....	1.5
England	1.2
France.....	0.5
Hungary.....	0.5
Austria	0.3
Italy	0.2
Japan	0.1
Russian	0.1

THE CULTIVAT ON OF THE QUERCUS GLANDULIFERA.

At its meeting held some time ago, the committee of the Products Investigation Association which was entrusted with investigation on important timbers for industrial use adopted the encouragement of the cultivation of the nara or quercus glandulifera tree. Concerning this, an authority concerned said that formerly the Japanese used this tree as fuel alone, but later when foreign furniture and other domestic articles were imported it was seen that this timber forms one of the most important materials for such manufacture and commands a high price in Western countries. This tree is now also used for decorations inside houses, while in recent years the Japanese have come to employ this timber for making industrial articles. About three years ago the timber was first exported to foreign markets. Last year the Hokkaido alone exported 100,000 shime (sections one foot in circumference) to the value of some 500,000 yen, and the export is steadily increasing. Such being the case, if the Government should encourage the cultivation of the tree the results will certainly be good. The tree grows best in the Hokkaido and the North-Eastern parts of Hondo.

It is reported from Kyoto that on Wednesday morning the Prince Imperial inspected the Blind and Deaf-mute School and Higher Girls' School, and in the afternoon the Kyoto Weaving Company, the Zoological Garden, and the Kyoto-fu Library. Returning, His Highness stopped to worship at the Heian Shrine.

BISHOP LEWIS.

Bishop Lewis, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, wife and daughter were passengers on the Kamakura Maru which arrived on Monday. They report a most pleasant voyage; and, despite the bad weather which greets them, are being delightfully entertained by Yokohama friends.

The Bishop, accompanied by Miss Lewis, will continue his journey on the Kamakura Maru, hastening to Peking to take charge of the meeting of the Church Conference at that place, one of the four under his charge.

Mrs. Lewis will remain for some days the guest of Yokohama friends, joining her husband later on his return to their home at Shanghai.

RUGBY FOOTBALL.

The football match played on Thursday between the Y.C. & A.C. and a fifteen from the British ships in port resulted in a win for the local team, who scored two goals, one try (13 points) to the naval men's nil. The game was by no means a one-sided affair, as the score might seem to suggest. The Yokohama players had their hands full, and had to play their hardest to win. Two of the tries for the Y.C. and A.C. were secured, after some capital passing, by Vincent, while Lendrum converted successfully. The play throughout was keen, and, though neither team can be said to have been in training, the local men clearly had themselves better in hand towards the latter part of the game.

A few days ago a lad of nineteen named Takagi Kokichi was arrested in Tokyo on a charge of circulating counterfeit 50 sen silver coins. It is alleged that Kokichi was a tool of Shikakura Kintaro and his wife who were the real counterfeiters of these coins.

On the festival day of the Shuki Korei-sai the 33rd anniversary of the death of Great Saigo was celebrated at the Young Men's Association Hall in Kanda, Tokyo. Count Itagaki, Dr. Miyake, and many others delivered speeches referring to the greatness of the late Saigo Nanshu.

Among the members of the Los Angeles tourist party who arrived here on Tuesday from Manila on their return voyage by the steamer Mongolia, some have remained to have a further journey through Japan, while the rest sailed for home yesterday on board the same steamer.

The annual function of the worship of the Imperial Ancestors was held on the 24th ult. in the Imperial Palace, when the Feast of the Autumnal Equinox was celebrated. Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress, with the Princes and Princesses of the Blood, attended the function.

In the small hours of the 22nd ult. fire broke out in a house occupied by a Filipino, situated at No. 3,556 Negishi, Yokohama. The building and two adjacent houses were destroyed. Some question has been raised as to the origin of the fire which is being investigated at present.

The Servan traveller who is journeying without money round the world, arrived at Yokohama on the 24th ult. from Tsuruga. He has already travelled through Turkey, Italy, Switzerland, France, Germany, and Russia. On the 25th he proceeded to Tokyo and put up at the Fujiyama Hotel, Shiba.

According to the report of the Meteorological Station of this prefecture, the temperature during the autumn equinoxial week this year was a little lower than that in normal years. The rainfall, contrary to expectation, was far less than in a normal year, while the number of rainy days remained the same.

The Chicago University Baseball team of 14 lusty American athletes arrived on Monday afternoon on the Kamakura Maru and were met by a host of students from the Tokyo universities. They report a very pleasant voyage, while the officers state that they made things lively on the voyage, and did full justice to the Bill-of-fare at every opportunity.

On Tuesday evening a reception was given to Mr. Arakawa, the new Mayor of Yokohama, by prominent citizens at the Chitose Restaurant, Sumiyoshi-cho. One Hundred and twenty persons were present. Mr. Ono gave a salutary address on behalf of the promoters of the meeting, to which the Mayor replied, returning thanks for the reception and expressing his determination to exert himself to the utmost for the development of the city.

A large American tourist party is expected to arrive at Yokohama on Friday from San Francisco by the steamer Siberia. They will put up in the Grand Hotel, where a ball will be held the same evening. On the 3rd instant another party consisting of thirty-three ladies and gentlemen from California, will reach here on board the steamer Minnesota on a tour round the world. This party is directed by Mr. D. L. Robertson, ex-purser of the Minnesota.

At 10.50 p.m. on Tuesday fire broke out on board a lighter anchored off the Lighthouse of this port. The vessel was laden with 400 cases of naphtha belonging to the Rising Sun Petroleum Company, No. 27, Yamashita-cho. The cargo and vessel were entirely destroyed, the loss being estimated at 2,400 yen and 300 yen, respectively. The sendo who was on board the lighter was rescued by the steam launch Hagi Maru of the Harbour Police Station. The accident is said to have been due to the sendo's indulging in a smoke.

CORRESPONDENCE.

JAPANESE AND OTHER NOISES.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I was much struck by your comments in yesterday's issue on the subject of Temple-drums and Cathedral Chimes; and, in justification of your reflections, would like to say that on a visit to Sydney, N.S.W., after having lived for years in Japanese towns, I found the clang of the famous Post Office bell in that city, which rings every quarter, and of which the natives are so proud, almost intolerable. Now that I live in Yokohama, the "reverberant notes" of the Church bells on the Bluff always upset my nervous equilibrium while the beating of the temple drums pass by me unheeded. The answer, therefore, to your pertinent question would seem to be the old one, simply of familiarity breeding contempt.

Yours truly, M.

Yokohama, 29th September, 1910.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

GERMANY TO ADOPT AEROPLANES.

DIRIGIBLES HAVE PROVEN UNSUCCESSFUL.

London, September 23.

The Berlin newspapers report that French experience has induced Germany to decide against dirigible balloons, owing to their being so expensive, with their unwieldiness and liability to accident. Instead of purchasing Zeppelins' the Authorities contemplate training a corps of Aeroplanists.

THE TIBETAN SITUATION.

The Chinese Taotai who has seen the Dalai Lama at Darjeeling, regarding the situation in Tibet, is expected at Simla Wednesday to confer with the Government. It is reported at Darjeeling that the leading lamas at Lhasa strongly advise the Dalai Lama not to return unless granted a guarantee of safety by the British Government.

PERSIAN REGENT DEAD.

Reuter's Teheran correspondent reports that the Regent is dead.

THE TURKISH LOAN.

Reuter understands from reliable sources that there is no truth in the report that an English group has signed any contract connected with the loan.

THE ENGLISH LABOUR SITUATION.

The Edinburgh conference between ship-builders and boiler-makers has adjoined without results.

GERMAN WAR FLEET.

The first German dreadnought division of four ships has been formed at Wilhelmshaven.

THE TURKISH LOAN.

London, September 23.

The Foreign Office announces to-night that no action is being taken in Paris by the Cassel group except with its full cognizance and approval. This is regarded as implying that French interests will not be allowed to be prejudiced by any action of British financiers.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN PREMIERSHIP.

London, September 23.

The suggestion of General Botha's retirement has brought a shower of telegrams urging him to retain the Premiership. There is special concern in Natal over the prospect, where the idea of a Merriman Ministry is disliked.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

The decision of America to fortify the Panama Canal has evoked comment in France and Japan.

It is reported that the Japanese Foreign Office has appointed a jurist to investigate the international bearing of the question.

TURCO-ROUMANIAN MILITARY CONVENTION DENIED.

The semi-official press of Bucharest, while denying as a foreign exaggeration the reports of a Turco-Rumanian-Military Convention, admits that there is an amicable rapprochement between the two countries in the cause of peace.

POLITICAL COMPLICATION IN PERSIA.

London, September 24.

The death of the Regent creates a difficulty. The Khan Sardar Assad is credited with the ambition to succeed to the regency, with a view to ultimately replacing the Kajar dynasty by the Bakhtiari.

It is probable that the Government with the consent of the Mejliss, will temporarily appoint the Premier Regent.

THE EGYPTIAN NATIONALIST CONGRESS.

London, September 24.

The Egyptian Nationalist Congress met at Brussels. Violent speeches denouncing Great Britain and condemning Mr. Roosevelt were made. The Burgomaster of Brussels refused application for permission to participate in to-day's demonstration in honour of the victims of Belgium's struggle for independence.

PORTUGAL AND THE CHURCH.

King Manuel opening the Parliament at Lisbon, announced the firm resolve of the Cabinet to carry out the Liberal programme, enforcing the laws for the regulation of religious associations.

AEROPLANE FLIES OVER ALPS.

It is reported from Brigüe, Switzerland, that the airman Chavez succeeded in accomplishing a transalpine flight, landing at Domodossola in Italy. At the moment of alighting, however, a gust of wind overturned the aeroplane and Chavez was pinned under the motor, being badly injured.

THE KAISER'S VIENNA SPEECH.

London, September 24.

The Kaiser's speech at Vienna is regarded as an important political demonstration; The Austrian papers describe it as historic and memorable; while in one sense it reminded Austria of her obligation towards Germany, in another it was considered as indicating Germany's determination to remain united with Austria-Hungary under all circumstances. It is believed the speech is unpalatable in Russia.

ENGLISH LABOUR SITUATION.

London, September 24.

The Edinburgh Labour Congress of the ship-building interests has adjourned to enable both sides to consider proposals submitted. It will meet again to take up these proposals at a later date, not named at present.

LISBON'S PARLIAMENT.

London, September 26.

Lisbon.—Not a single oppositionist attended the opening of parliament. An adjournment is regarded as certain.

THE FINLAND DIET.

The President of the Finnish Diet refused to submit to it the Russian Ministerial proposals. The Diet supported his action. The dismissal of the Diet is momentarily expected.

TURCO-ROUMANIAN ALLIANCE.

The Times correspondent at Athens learns that Ion Bratiano, Roumanian Foreign Minister, informed the Turkish Minister at Bucharest, that, in the event of a Turco-Bulgarian conflict, Roumania would mobilize all her army corps along the military frontier of Bulgaria in order to be prepared for every eventuality. Roumania wishes this decision to be considered as a happy prelude to a policy of sincere friendship which Roumania desires to inaugurate with constitutional Turkey.

The correspondent adds that the possibility of a military entente between Greece and Bulgaria is now seriously considered as a counter-stroke to the Turco-Roumanian negotiations.

THE TURKISH LOAN.

Paris.—The liveliest satisfaction is officially expressed at the British attitude regarding the Turkish loan. The Temps says as a result of the conversation Cassel has had with the Foreign office and the financial world, he has abandoned the idea of attempting to issue the loan on the London market.

PERSIAN REGENT.

Teheran.—The Mejliss elected as Regent Nasir el Mulk a graduate of Balliol college at Oxford.

ENGLISH COTTON SPINNERS LOCK-OUT.

A resolution of the Card-roomers amalgamation yesterday says they are prepared to refer to arbitration the question as to who has broken the Brooklands agreement in the case of Fernmill, which must be kept stopped until the award is given.

Later.

The Card-Room workers have decided to accept arbitration on the understanding that the affairs of Fernmill are to remain as at present.

This is regarded as indicating that the feeling of cotton operatives generally is in favour of averting a lock-out.

EVIDENCE AGAINST THE SPIES IN GERMANY.

Later.

Berlin.—It is reported that under the mattress of the bed occupied by Trench on the 7th of September, at the Emden Hotel, there were found photographs and maps of Keil and Wilhelmshaven and the North Sea islands, as well as the forts of Borkum, with soundings attested. The latter were procurable only with German assistance.

AIRMAN CHAVEZ INJURIES ARE SERIOUS.

Later.

The French airman Chavez is in the hospital. He has broken both legs but his condition is hopeful. He has received the prizes of £3,000 sterling, although he did not reach Milan.

THE BALKAN CRISIS.

London, September 26.

Rome.—The Tribune is authorized to state that the reports of a Turco-German-Austrian alliance and of a Turco-Roumanian convention without the knowledge of Italy are baseless. The relations between Italy, Austria and Germany are most intimate and cordial.

PEKING-HANKOW REDEMPTION LOAN.

Part of the Chinese Government's 7 per cent. Peking-Hankow Railway redemption loan, to the amount of £450,000, was issued in London to-day at 108, and is already quoted at a premium.

THE COTTON CRISIS.

London, September 27.

The meeting of the Cotton Employers at Manchester is understood to have rejected the conditions which the card-roomers attached to their acceptance of arbitration.

THE "VON DER TANN."

It is decided that the German Dreadnought cruiser Von der Tann is going on a prolonged cruise round South America, where the republics are now largely occupied in strengthening their navies, with a view to advertising German shipbuilding.

INDUSTRIAL WAR IN GERMANY.

Berlin.—The Federation of Metal Employers have decided to lock out 60 per cent. of their workmen on the 8th prox., to prevent them from supporting the shipbuilders. Still a strike of 420,000 men is expected.

RUSSIAN NAVAL ESTIMATES.

St. Petersburg.—The estimates for 1911 are £11,300,000, an increase of £2,300,000 over those of 1910, and include £2,800,000 for new construction.

FALL IN CONSOLS.

London, September 27.

Consols have fallen to 80½, the lowest figure during the past half-century. This is in consequence of large gold withdrawals and an advance of the German bank-rate to five per cent., probable necessitating an early rise in the English bank-rate.

NEW ZEALAND AND THE EMPIRE.

Wellington.—Lord Islington, the Governor, in a speech dwelt on the internal consolidation proceeding in the self-governing States of the Empire. He confidently anticipated the approach of the wider and more complicated problem of how far organic unity of the various States in external affairs would be established.

THE LABOUR TROUBLES IN LANCASHIRE.

The cotton employers demand that the Fern Mill resume work immediately otherwise the lock-out will proceed.

THE TURCO-ROUMANIAN AGREEMENT.

Reaffirmation succeed denials as to the Turco-Roumanian military agreement.

The Times correspondent at Athens reports that 13,000 of the Asiatic troops have been disembarked at Rodosto in the course of the past month, and have been despatched to the interior of European Turkey; while most of the troops engaged in the suppression of the Albanian revolt have been distributed along the Bulgarian and Greek frontiers.

SOCIALIST SUCCESS IN PRUSSIA.

A socialist has been elected on a second ballot at Frankfur-on-Oder, defeating a National-Liberal. This is the ninth Socialist gain since Bulow's retirement.

THE ENGLISH NAVY.

London, September 28.

Admiral Lord Charles Beresford has sent an open letter to Mr. Asquith saying that the safety of the Empire demands the provision and laying down of 7 Dreadnoughts in addition to the five which are to be laid down next year. He quotes the number of these ships belonging to the Triple Alliance as 13 or 14, and he says that even then the position will be fraught with inextinguishable danger. The strength of the fleet must be measured by the work it has to perform. He insists on the necessity of a powerful fleet in the Mediterranean and of a strong squadron in the Far East for the adequate protection of England in the Dominion and in India. To meet these demands a substantial loan is required.

STRIKERS' RIOT IN BERLIN.

London, September 28.

A strike among the coal porters has broken out at Berlin, and is marked by constant conflicts with the police. These began on Monday night and three pitched battles have since been fought, a mob which joined the strikers, throwing stones and beer-glasses, interspersed with occasional revolver shots. On Tuesday evening sympathizers bombarded the police from windows with bottles, bricks, flower-pots and crockery. The police charged with drawn swords and fired their pistols at the windows. Ninety persons have been injured—thirteen seriously; two policemen are among the injured.

AVIATOR CHAVEZ DEAD.

The aviator Chavez, who recently suffered injuries on alighting after a splendid flight over the Alps, is dead, after much suffering. The Milan Aviation Committee has paid the brother of the aviator the trans-Alpine prize of £2,000 sterling.

TURKISH GRAND VIZIER RETURNS TO CONSTANTINOPLE.

The Turkish Grand Vizier interviewed the Austrian Foreign Minister at Vienna, after which he proceeded to Constantinople.

KAISER'S INVITATION TO KING OF PORTUGAL.

The Kaiser has invited King Manuel to visit Berlin in December. There will be great festivities and a military review. Special importance is attached to the visit.

THE SOUTH AFRICAN PREMIER-SHIP.

General Botha in the past three days has been so strongly urged from different parts of the country not to resign, and has received such repeated assurances of support that provided other portfolios can be satisfactorily arranged he will probably remain Premier.

LIEUT. SUTOR'S SENTENCE.

Lieutenant Sutor, who was sentenced to dismissal from the service, has had his sentence commuted to a severe reprimand.

PRINCE TSAI HSUN AT WASHINGTON.

President Taft has received Prince Tsai Hsun and entertained His Highness at a dinner in the White House.

ROOSEVELT ELECTED CHAIRMAN IN NEW YORK.

After all the fighting and abusive speeches at the New York State Convention Roosevelt has been triumphantly elected Chairman, having received 567 votes. Vice-President Sherman was second with 445 votes.

THE ALLEGED GERMAN SPY.

London, September 29.

Helm, the German subaltern recently arrested near Portsmouth, has been committed for trial. He has been allowed bail of £1000, in two English sureties of £500 each. Meanwhile he is remanded.

THE COTTON CRISIS.

The Manchester cotton crisis is regarded as acute. The secretary of the Cardroomers Amalgamation has replied to the employers that he is prepared to accede to the request of restarting Fern Mill on condition that the dismissed operatives are reinstated.

The Cotton Masters' Federation have decided that they are unable to make further concessions and that the lock-out must proceed.

ITALY AND AUSTRIA.

The forthcoming meeting of Sanguilliano and Aerenthal at Turin is watched with special interest, in view of the Near Eastern question and the Italian aloofness from the recent international combination.

FUNDS FOR IRISH AGITATION.

Buffalo.—The Irish Convention delegates have enthusiastically pledged themselves to raise the sum of £20,000 in two years for the furtherance of Home Rule.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

THE TURKISH LOAN.

London, September 23.

It is stated that the British Government is not connected with any Turkish loan negotiations. The Cassel group has not signed any loan contract. The Government has always impressed on Turkish Ministers the advisability of coming to terms with France. The Times favours the demands of the French Government for reforms in the Turkish financial administration, and assurances that French savings will not be spent in buying German battleships and other war material.

NEW YORK STATE CONVENTION.

New York.—Roosevelt's election to the temporary chairmanship of the Republican state convention is apparently assured.

TURKEY AND ROUMANIA.

London, September 23.

The Roumanian Foreign Minister recently made a statement to the Turkish Minister at Bucharest, that, in the event of an outbreak of war between Turkey and Bulgaria, Roumania will mobilize all her army corps along the frontier of Bulgaria, in readiness for every eventuality,—in order to give another proof of friendship for the Turkish Government.

WIRELESS TELEGRAM RECEIVED OVER 3,500 MILES.

London, September 24.

Signor Marconi aboard an Italian steamer succeeded in obtaining wireless messages from Clifton Ireland, and Glace Bay, Canada, a distance of 3,500 miles.

TURKEY AND GREECE.

Athens.—Turkish disarmament severities in Macedonia and continued arrests of Greeks in Salonika are increasing popular exasperation.

THE CANADIAN REGIMENT SAILS FOR HOME.

London, September 26.

The Canadian Rifles after a month's training at Aldershot manœuvres sailed from Liverpool. They were given a most enthusiastic farewell.

A HOLIDAY FESTIVAL AT THE EXHIBITION.

The Japanese equinoctial festival was celebrated at the Exhibition with much enthusiasm. The weather was fine. The chief feature was a reception at the Garden Club by Commissioner Wada, 2000 guests being invited.

The invitations included Ambassador Kato and members of the Embassy, with many other Japanese; also the Lord Mayor, and well known representatives of finances, science and art. The generosity and graciousness of Japanese hospitality are the subject of general comment by the guests.

The public portions of the exhibition were crowded with many thousands who loudly cheered the playing of the two national anthems. The festival ended with a brilliant illumination and lantern procession.

THE BALKAN CRISIS.

London, September 26.

Athens.—The Roumanian intimation of support relieves Turkey of the necessity of further large displacements of Asiatic troops. During the past month 13,000 troops have been despatched to the interior of Turkey, and arrangements made to transport most of the troops employed in suppressing the Albanian revolt and to distribute them along the Bulgarian and Greek frontiers.

Later.

Athens.—Apprehensions exist that a conflict with Turkey may be forced by irruption of Turkish irregulars assembled on the frontier. It is recognized that Greece is unable to repel invasion.

IRISH FUNDS AND FACTIONS.

London, September 27.

New York.—The arrival of Irish Nationalists to collect funds for their Parliamentary party has produced a bitter strife between the rival Irish factions.

FRENCH FOREIGN TRADE.

Paris.—The foreign trade for 1909 approximated to £480,000,000, being an increase of 1 per cent. during the past 20 years, compared with an increase of 212 per cent. in Japanese trade.

RUSSIAN AIR FLEETS.

London, September 28.

St. Petersburg.—The Aerial fleet Committee decided to order immediately twenty more aeroplanes and to prepare thirty military airmen by 1911.

THE NEW YORK CONVENTION.

New York.—The fight between Roosevelt and the machine politicians for the control of the Republican state organization is characterized by unparalleled bitterness. In spite of malignant speeches the undercurrent is distinctly favourable to Roosevelt, who sat humbly among the delegates until he was elected Chairman.

INTRIGUE IN PERSIA.

London, September 29.

Teheran.—Evidence is accumulating of a determined and widespread intrigue against the Cabinet. The negotiations for the withdrawal of the Russian troops are at a complete standstill.

RIOTS IN BERLIN.

Later.

Berlin.—There has been rioting in the Moabit quarter, in which the police after great provocation used their revolvers. The affair arose out of a small local strike in which the lower classes seized the opportunity to attack the police with showers of stones and flower-pots. The quarter is now strongly guarded by the police. All the window-shutters are closed. If they are opened, the police fire.

THE COTTON CRISIS.

The Lancashire cotton employers have refused to concede the men's demands. There is every indication that 700 mills will be closed on Saturday.

M. ISVOLSKY.

Paris.—Le Temps warmly approves the selection of Iswolsky as Russian Ambassador.

(RECEIVED BY THE FOREIGN OFFICE)

INTERNATIONAL MARITIME LAW.

The International Congress on Maritime Law, which opened in Brussels on the 12th instant, closed on the 23rd. The results were:—

1.—Unanimous approval of the draft of laws relating to prevention of, and succour in, collisions at sea.

2.—With regard to the question of colonization, Holland, America, England, Germany, Italy and Denmark stood aside, but the rest all adhered.

("DEUTSCHE JAPAN-POST" SERVICE TO THE "JAPAN HERALD.")

THE CROWN PRINCE'S TOUR.

Berlin, September 22.

The armoured cruiser Gneisenau, which has been ordered to join the German East Asiatic Squadron, will leave Wilhelmshaven for Colombo on Nov. 10th. At Colombo the Crown Prince will board the cruiser to continue his tour to the Far East. The Crown Princess will return from Colombo to Genoa on board a Nordd. Lloyd liner.

THE INFANTRY GUN.

Rumours, which have been spread, according to which the introduction of a new infantry gun into the German Army is said to be imminent, are not based on facts, the present model having proved to be excellent.

GREAT AVIATION PRIZE.

The B. Z. am Mittag has offered the sum of 109,000 Marks as a prize for the aviation competition between Paris and Berlin.

THE KAISER AT VIENNA.

The Kaiser has made a speech at the City Hall at Vienna, which was received with great enthusiasm. He emphasized the popularity of the German-Austrian Alliance amongst both nations and expressed his great respect and veneration for Emperor Francis Joseph.

GERMANY.

Berlin, September 23.

Liang Tun Yen, the ex-President of the Tai-wu-pu, has arrived at Berlin on a visit of recreation.

The Kaiser and Kaiserin will pay a counter-visit to the King and Queen of Belgium at Brussels at the end of October.

Count Wedel, the Governor-General of the Reichslande, in a speech, admonished the populace of Elsass and Lothringen to maintain unanimity and to be loyal to the Empire.

The lock-out of 400,000 workmen of the metal trades has been decided upon by the employers to begin on October 8th owing to the continuation of the dockyard workmen's strike.

Berlin, September 24.

The Kaiser and Kaiserin have left for Rominten after the Kaiser's conference with the Chancellor at Berlin.

Very strong evidence has been found against the two Englishmen, who were arrested recently at Borkum on suspicion of espionage.

Berlin, September 25.

Mr. Tezuka, Attorney-General of Japan, has arrived at Berlin.

PORTUGAL.

King Manuel of Portugal will pay an introductory visit to Berlin during the month of November.

TURKEY.

The Turkish Grand Vizier Hakki Bay, having returned from Paris to Vienna, has held conferences with Count Aehrenthal as to the new Turkish loan. In spite of all contrary rumours the loan will probably be eventually issued in France; if not, Sir Ernest Cassel, with the support of German financiers, will undertake to float the loan.

POSSIBLE EFFECTS OF THE ANNEXATION OF KOREA ON BRITISH TRADE.

The annexation of Korea by Japan, says the London Standard, will certainly have a prejudicial effect upon the trade of Great Britain in the Far East. Merchants trading in Korea are in a quandary as to whether the new Japanese tariff which will come into force next July will then immediately be made to apply to Korea as well. Should this be so, the existing tariff, which ranges from 5 per cent. to 20 per cent., may, as regards many articles, be doubled. On the other hand, it is pointed out that the present tariff treaty which exists between Korea and England may be continued during the next five years.

Japan possesses the bulk of the foreign trade carried on with Korea, although last year Great Britain exported to the peninsula £651,000 worth of commodities, or almost a third of the amount sent from Japan. China came next, with £447,300 worth of goods, followed by the United States with commodities approximating £240,250 in value. Most of the goods sent from European countries to Korea, however, are not shipped direct, but have to pass through Yokohama. The annexation of the peninsula can only mean a general improvement in the trade between Japan and Korea, to the detriment of the commerce of other nations.

Commerce in Korea has not yet gone beyond its infancy. Transactions are mostly carried out in market-places, of which there are now about 400 in the country. The business at these markets is limited, and amounts, in most cases, to nothing more than the exchange of daily necessities. Weights and measures which constitute the standard of commercial transactions have hitherto been manufactured in the different provinces in accordance with the system current in each, with an entire absence of uniformity. To remove the inconvenience thus caused, the local Government, in September, 1909, revised the weights and measures law, by which the denominations and standards of Korean weights and measures were made identical with those current in Japan. Further, the manufacture of these weights was made a Government monopoly, with a view to secure the distribution of uniform weights and measures throughout the peninsula in three years.

Korea first levied Customs duties on the merchandise of foreign Powers in 1894. As there then existed no proper agency for the collection of duties, the Government entrusted all the affairs relating to the Customs service to a prominent British subject, on condition that the State should receive £85,000 per year from this source. In January of 1908 the jurisdiction of the Customs service was transferred to the Minister of Finance. Following the termination of the Russo-Japanese war, in 1905, a new chapter was suddenly opened in the economic life of the country. Capital began to pour into the land from Japan, resulting in an increase of the purchasing power of the Koreans. This gave such an impetus to foreign trade that the ports then open became inadequate to deal with the goods arriving. To meet this exigency the Government increased the number of Custom-houses, and so allowed the foreign trade (exports and imports) of Korea to increase in 1908 to £5,513,800. The total amount received last year from Custom duties was £283,441—three and a-half times the amount obtained fifteen years before.

A MATTER OF SUPREME IMPORTANCE.

The matter of the annexation, says the Morning Post, is one of supreme importance for London and for Great Britain at large, in view of the enormous trade between our country and the East, and still more by reason of the Japanese tariff which will shortly come into force. But among those most competent to judge there should be no reason for dismay on the part of the British merchant and manufacturer. He may receive a temporary set back, but Korea offers infinite possibilities of trade, provided he is fully alive to them and to what his commercial rivals are doing.

"It is almost amusing to note our sudden interest in Korea," said the editor of the Anglo-Japanese Gazette to a representative of the Morning Post. "We seem to have become suddenly alive to the fact that the country exists since Japan has assumed control of it, and yet that control is only what might have been expected by anyone who has kept an open eye on Eastern affairs. Japan has always desired possession of Korea, and it was only a temporary rebuff when she was obliged to recall her representative after the assassination of the Empress. But she simply lay low and waited for another opportunity, which came when Russia obtained her timber concessions. Then Japan felt that there was excuse enough for her to make another forward step.

"The Belgians have also been active there, in a mysterious manner which suggests that they have strong secret backers, and they have obtained concessions on the railways."

PUTTING KOREA IN ORDER.

"But there is not much reason to anticipate commercial trouble. Since Japan has gone into Korea she has put things in order, cleaned up the country, so to speak, put the finances on a satisfactory basis, and the police on a more stable footing. There is far less of the corruption that used to prevail in every corner of the country, when no man—especially if he were a poor man—knew who would come along next and plunder him. Naturally, under the new conditions there is a prospect of greater prosperity. Trade will revive, and although Japan expects to get the greater share of that trade, other countries, such as Great Britain, ought to discover better openings than ever there were before.

"I do not think it can be denied that in the past we have not been fully alive to our opportunities, and now that Japan has taken the lead we are wondering what is to become of British interests. So far as I know, there is no British steamship entering a Korean port to this day. The nearest point at which they touch is Shanghai, which is between 500 and 600 miles from Fusan. And yet we have been sending large quantities of Manchester goods into Korea every year—cotton yarns, sheetings, and shirtings—sending them almost without troubling to get the orders, because Japan had to have the stuff, and sent to the best manufacturers for it. But now that Japan has begun to make Manchester goods for herself the problem resolves itself into a geographical proposition. To get her goods into Korea Japan has simply to ship them over comparatively few miles, either from Tsuruga or Moji to Fusan. Manchester has to send her products many thousands of miles, and, other things being equal, she is at a natural disadvantage in regard to Japan."

WHERE GREAT BRITAIN IS ON TOP.

"But although Japan can turn out 'coarse counts' as good as those from Manchester," the editor of the Anglo-Japanese Gazette continued, "she will never oust us in the making of 'fine counts,' which are only possible by reason of the inherited skill of the Lancashire workers. We should have lost the 'coarse counts' in any case, annexation or no annexation, tariff or no tariff. The new tariff will affect Korea, and for a time it will curtail imports of goods from other countries."

The question was put as to how we might hope to gain under the new régime.

"Well, for one thing, there is always a desire in these Eastern countries to obtain goods from abroad. The American comes to England to purchase English clothing, and the Korean and the Japanese are similarly keen on getting English stuff. Now that corruption is rapidly vanishing from Korea, and a man may reasonably expect to get a larger proportion of what he works for without being fleeced right and left, the Koreans will have more money to spend, and consequently there will be a revival in trade.

"Japan will not allow the country to lie idle. She will extend the railways, establish harbours, and develop the resources of the land, and all this cannot be done without foreign aid and foreign material. If Great Britain plays up to her opportunities there is no reason why she should not participate in a large share of this development. Even at the present time Japan puts a great deal of faith in British-made goods. She cannot afford to buy American stuff and throw it on the scrapheap in a few months; she wants something that will last. You may remember that some years ago Japan wanted a number of vessels for her Navy. She gave orders for one to be built at the Union Ironworks at San Francisco, another at Cramp's Yard in Philadelphia, a third at Stettin in Germany, a fourth in France, and one in England. It transpired afterwards that these were experimental orders, and England was the only country that obtained a repeat order. It is quite true that many thousands of dollars were spent on American rolling stock and permanent way for the Manchurian railways, but this was only on account of the need of quick delivery. Since then the orders have come to this country, and well-known firms in Manchester and Birmingham are manufacturing locomotives and rolling stock for them."

KEEPING AN EYE ON THE GERMANS.

"There is going to be a general industrial revival in Korea, and Great Britain will share in it, if—mark what I say—if we keep our eyes on the Germans and Americans. They are keenly alive to the commercial possibilities in the Far East, and are the most energetic 'bagmen' in the world. When a contract for electric lighting in Harbin was to be let, the Germans put up a building there, and sent out an actual plant to show the people what they could do, and naturally they got the orders. The British are too fond of relying on nicely-printed catalogues, and these are printed in English, which every Japanese and Korean is expected to understand. If we wake up and push ourselves forward we shall capture a large share of the orders, tariff or no tariff. We must not allow the Germans and Americans to do the window-dressing in the Far East."

FOR THE GOOD OF BRITISH COMMERCE.

Opinion in the City seems, says the Central News, to be divided as to the effect which the annexation of Korea will have upon British trade. In some quarters it is feared that the Japanese Tariff will be extended to Korea, and that this will kill the trade now done, particularly that from Manchester and Bradford. On the other hand, many merchants take the view that British trade will benefit. Mr. C. J. Catling, of the China and Japan Trading Company, in an interview with a Central News representative, said that the Japanese were up-to-date people and were bound to open out the country. It might be expected that a lot of railway material and building material would go out from this country, and there would certainly be many contracts for constructional work which would be shared in by Great Britain. Even if a tariff were set up, he believed that the annexation would undoubtedly be for the good of British trade.

LAWLESSNESS IN AMERICA.

An article taken from the London Standard under the heading "Lax Justice in America" contains so much of truth that it is worthy of study. The student of sociology can at once direct his mind to the cause of prevailing lawlessness. Over a million emigrants yearly are now entering the confines of the North American continent. Some of them are high class, well educated people, who immediately adjust themselves to new conditions and become good citizens. But, as a rule the better class do not emigrate—they are satisfied at home. It is generally the discontented man who seeks new lands. Again, many of these emigrants are exceedingly ignorant, coming as they do from among the peasants in countries where the ruling classes govern with a firm hand and where class barriers are almost impregnable. Eventually most of these people become good solid citizens through education and the gradual adjustment to new conditions. But on first being released from home-land conditions, in many cases "Liberty becomes License" with this class. Time is not available to get one group assimilated and settled down until the next year brings its new influx. American lawlessness is the greatest argument in favour of stringent regulation and limitation of emigration. These conditions apply to any new country and the remarkable record for lawlessness in the United States is largely accounted for by the larger population and territory to be ruled. The Standard writer does not endorse this view, but we still believe it to be the true solution. Lynchings and night-riding are entirely separated from the ordinary crimes and cannot be intelligently discussed by a writer unfamiliar with local conditions. That the Standard writer is not familiar with such conditions is betrayed by his speaking of "western night riders." The night rider atrocities were all perpetrated in the South. The Standard article follows:—

The flash of the assassin's weapon has caused a deep revelation of the extent to which Mayor Gaynor has attracted the attention of the people of the United States during the seven months that he has been at the head of the government of New York City. The tributes to his character, the feeling that was widespread during the first hours of the crime that his death would be a national calamity, are indicative of the change that is coming over the American government. Mr. Gaynor is the new type of magistrate that is gradually replacing the old-time corruptionist. He has been administering the affairs of the greatest city of the western hemisphere simply for the benefit of the community, and by doing this he has become a national personage.

On the day of his attempted assassination the "Independent," one of America's soberest and most conservative weeklies, went to press, not knowing of Gallagher's act, but printing a leading article, declaring:—

"Murder in the United States is an almost unpunished crime. . . . There is every reason to fear that an exhaustive survey would show an astounding indifference by American society as a whole to the ineffectiveness of our entire machinery of criminal justice. Whether it be the mob of lynchers or of strikers, the Black Hand assassin or the automobile thug; whether it be the group of 'gentlemen' meeting as boards of directors to combine insolvent companies, water their stocks, and defy the laws prohibiting contracts in restraint of trade; or whether it be the gangs of 'hoodlums' whose rowdiness on cars and in other public places has become the terror of women and children, these insolent criminals, high born or low born, with strangely few exceptions, are permitted not merely to escape punishment, but even without so much as wholesome fear of punishment to go on indefinitely perpetrating crime."

In the same number of the "Independent" is reproduced an address on "Unpunished Crime in the United States," delivered before the Wisconsin Bar Association by Judge Holt, New York District Justice of the Federal Bench. Judge Holt declares, after a careful estimate, that there are 100,000 Americans now living who, though they have taken part in lynchings, have never been called upon to answer for their crime. He further asserts there are 150,000 "hung murderers and unpunished felons" in America, who have wilfully taken an active part in assaults in strike riots that have resulted in murder or felony. He is unable to estimate the large number of unpunished criminals who under the name of "nightriders," have terrorised Kentucky and Southern Indiana and Ohio, committing murder and destroying property in an effort to keep up the prices of cotton and tobacco by restricting the output. Nor can he give an adequate measure of the innumerable "Black Hand" Italians who have blackmailed their country-men in America, following disregarded demands for money by assassination or the perpetration of arson or bomb-throwing. Says Judge Holt:—

"There has been no time in many years past in which crimes of violence have been more rife than they have been in recent years in the oldest and most thickly populated parts of this country. Take, for instance, the community in and about the City of New York. Murders, maimings, assaults with deadly weapons, dynamite bomb explosions, burglaries, highway robberies, cases of arson, particularly in crowded tenement houses, the shooting of wives by drunken husbands and of girls by degenerates whom they have refused to marry, in short every kind of violent crime has occurred in and about the city to an unprecedented extent. Some of these criminals, of course have been convicted. But in the great majority of cases the perpetrators of these crimes have not been arrested. Many of those that have been arrested have been discharged by police magistrates, notwithstanding the clear proof of guilt, and this condition of unpunished crime is believed to have generally prevailed in and about most of the large cities of this country. Under our present system the punishment of crime is a sort of lottery. Great numbers of criminals escape. A few are punished, usually after long delay, with extreme severity."

CONTEMPT FOR THE LAW.

This statement is not the exaggerated utterance of a sensation-monger. It comes from a judge of high repute and large ability, and must be endorsed by every one familiar with criminal procedure in the United States. Judge Holt finds the cause in the slow movements of the wheels of justice, but more than this must be held accountable. The great horde of low-type aliens that flock to America is a breeding centre of crime, but the solution of the immigration problem would not solve the crime problem. Few, if any, aliens are Southern lynchers or Western nightriders. One must search elsewhere for the root of the trouble. It lies in the lack of respect for law which prevails in the United States. There is little sympathy between the American lawmakers and the people for whom the laws are made. Public opinion has so long regarded legislators as corrupt that legal enactments have fallen into contempt. There is little of the English feeling that laws are enacted for the benefit of the country as a whole. Every time an American legislator is found guilty of bribery or working exclusively for his own interests—and such cases are constantly appearing—contempt for the law grows.

BETTER LEGISLATORS SOUGHT.

The solution is slowly working itself out, and the national renown of Mayor Gaynor is an indication that this is so. It is coming in the form of a change in the character of legislators and governors. A better type of man is being elected to office, and these men are preaching a respect for the law not so much by their words and deeds as by their characters. They are known not to be in politics for business reasons, but to be true public servants working for the benefit of the community exclusively. They are setting up a new standard of civic duty, around which more and more people are gathering every day. He who would take Judge Holt's arraignment to mean that democracy is failing in the United States must be myopic. Progress is slow on the surface, but it requires only a shaving of the surface to reveal the persistent forward movement. Successful emergence from the condition of political indifference is certain, because Americans are beginning to see the danger which is created by a low type of legislator. The great democracy is analysing its troubles, and is applying the cure. When a democracy can discern its pathological symptoms the cure must be effective, for self-preservation is the first law of nature. The outburst of sympathy for Mayor Gaynor, the shudder that ran through the country at the thought that his work might have been ended by the assassin's bullet supplies the antidote to pessimism that appears in Judge Holt's address.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

THE sealer Koyei Maru recently released by the Alaska Local Court, has arrived at Ishihama, Miyagi prefecture, with 182 seals skins on board.

It is reported from Fusan that the completion ceremony of the waterworks in that city was held on the 25th ultimo. The function was a great success in spite of rainy weather.

AT 11.55 a.m. on the 22nd ult. a slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama, lasting one minute and forty seconds. The oscillations were principally in a northerly and southerly direction.

THERE are symptoms of the spreading of cholera in Kobe and Osaka. Since the outbreak of the epidemic this year 26 cases had been reported up to the 21st ultimo in Kobe and 9 cases in Osaka.

THE steamer Ryojun Maru which left Moji on the 22nd ultimo for the west, ran aground off Tanokubi in a short distance from the port. It is reported that the vessel will probably be refloated at the next high tide.

It is reported from Dairen that the imports to that port during the first eight months of the year amounted to 252,505 yen, with an increase in bulk of 10,000 tons as compared with the corresponding period of last year. This was due to the increase of purchasing power of the agriculturists in Manchuria.

It is reported from Iki province that several days ago nine cases of Kerosine oil (flag brand) were picked up by some fishermen off Shiotsuhama, and 27 cases of the Rising Sun petroleum, on the water between Okinoshima and Ike province. The police authorities are making inquiries to discover the owner of these cases.

IN connection with strikes, lock-outs and suicides for lack of work in Great Britain, the following item seems almost pitiful. "It is estimated that the people of the United Kingdom spend $2 5,000,000 a year for sport. Of this $15,000,000 is for golf; $50,000,000 for cricket and football, and racing is set down at $25,000,000."

A MATSUMOTO (Shinano province) despatch says that the Soko Ginko in that city has been in difficulties on account of the loss of over 3 0,000 yen out of 420,000 yen, the paid-up capital. On the 25th ult. Messrs. Akabane Motoshi, Tanaka Bunjiro, and Saruhashi Sadajiro, Directors of the Bank, were arrested and their houses searched by the public procurator. Account-books were all confiscated.

A NAGASAKI telegram reports that the T.K.K. steamer Tenyo Maru which was on her way to that port from Hongkong, ran aground on Tuesday morning while running some 25 miles south-east of the mouth of the Woosung. According to a wireless despatch the vessel was immediately refloated, and no great damage to the hull was anticipated. The passengers and crew are all safe.

THE Prince Imperial who is to attend the special review of engineers at Kyoto, is reported to have arrived at Hichijo Station on the 25th ultimo. His Highness was received at the platform by Princes Kuni and Kayo, Lieut.-General Miyoshi, Commander of the Sixteenth Division, and many other officers and officials. After a short rest the Crown Prince and suite proceeded to the Nijo Detached Palace where His Highness was welcomed by the peers residing in Kyoto.

HERR DERNEBURG, German ex-Secretary for the Colonies, who is now in Seoul, has called on the Resident-General Viscount Terauchi at his official residence. The ex-Secretary is reported to have expressed his wonder at the peace and tranquillity so conspicuously reigning in the sequel of such a great event as annexation, and admitted the propriety of the policy adopted by the Resident-General in encouraging agricultural pursuits in the Peninsula.

ACCORDING to the investigation made by the Department of Communications, the number and tonnage of steamers possessed by various Powers stand as follows:—

	Number of Vessels.	Total Tonnage.
Great Britain	9,750	17,702,000
Germany	1,800	3,889,000
United States	1,720	3,662,000
France	800	1,445,000
Norway	1,390	1,122,000
Japan	260	1,150,000
Italy	430	961,000
Holland	500	924,000
Russia	700	760,000
Sweden	960	774,000
Spain	470	686,000
Denmark	550	677,000

THE number of commercial students accepted this year by the Department of Agriculture and Commerce, as the result of scholastic examinations, and subjects of study are fixed as follows:—Four will be despatched to China to study general commerce; one to Russia for commerce; seven to the United States, two to study commerce, one printing and book-binding, two porcelain manufacture and designing, one fancy matting, one the manufacture of medicines, and one tinnery business; one to Argentine for commerce; one to France for raw silk industry; three to Germany, one for electricity, chemistry, and technical industry, one for brewing, and one for cement manufacture; one to Switzerland for dyeing; and two to England, one for wire-manufacture and the other for the business of utilizing agricultural products.

REMARKABLE scenes have been witnessed in the great Bengal conspiracy trial now proceeding at Dacca. The prisoners seem to regard the trial as a joke, and laugh and talk as they carelessly lounge behind iron bars in court. Students daily line the route along which the forty-two prisoners pass on their way to the court and regard the accused as heroes. The trial is a most important one. In some of the seditious literature seized when the arrests were made there were songs which urged that the land should be washed in English blood. The conspiracy, according to the evidence for the prosecution, existed throughout the province of Bengal. It was started in 1905, when certain Calcutta residents went to Dacca, made inflammatory speeches and induced their hearers to take an oath that they would sacrifice their lives for their country.

A CHERBOURG dockyard mechanic named Debrix at the naval machinery workshop has invented an apparatus by means of which Hertzian waves can, he claims, be connected with the Morse telegraph, thus permitting ordinary and wireless telegraphy to be combined. The apparatus is now being examined by the Invention Committee of the Navy. The idea of M. Debrix, if it is practicable, is of the greatest importance to the navy and mercantile marine. It would place an ocean liner in uninterrupted communication with all the Continental telegraph offices. The application of the system would enable the establishment of high-tension stations to be dispensed with, and those already existing along the coast would suffice for immediate transmission. The cost of the apparatus is said to be very slight. This invention would, it is pointed out, render the greatest service to the fleet, as the offices of the Ministry of Marine could, by the Debrix process, be placed in telegraphic communication with squadrons on the high seas.

THE Prince Imperial is now in Kyoto to inspect the special manoeuvres of the engineering corps. Despite the inclement weather on Tuesday. His Highness left the Nijo Detached Palace early in the morning and proceeded to the scene of the operations. On their conclusion His Highness worshipped at the Imperial Sepuchre at Izumiyama.

MR. MOISSANT, a young Chicago architect, is the hero of one of the coolest and most daring exploits recorded in the domain of aviation. Only about a month has elapsed since he learned the art. He had no previous acquaintance with the route from Paris to Calais. He had never crossed the Straits of Dover. He is quite ignorant of the country between Dover and London. Yet on Tuesday evening, 16th ult., accompanied by his mechanic, to whom alone his intentions were known, he boldly set out from Issy les Moulineaux, just outside Paris, with the design of performing the journey to the British metropolis. He reached Amiens in a couple of hours, and remained there for the night. Resuming his flight early next day he descended at Calais two hours later. After a short stay there he flew the Channel, and arrived at Tilmanstone, a village near Dover, in rather over half an hour. Two especially noteworthy features stand out in Mr. Moissant's achievement. He is the first man to carry a passenger across the Channel. And he has apparently solved the difficulty of steering aeroplanes by compass, as he directed most of his journey by this means.

"THE Knight of Aksarbens" is the latest title conferred on Mr. Roosevelt, whose initiation as a member of this order, sworn to boast in the interest of Nebraska, was conducted at Omaha amid a series of hilarious after-supper scenes. On a stage set to resemble the chief street of Oyster Bay, clowns and songsters entertained the company with witticisms and doggerel verse at the expense of Mr. Roosevelt. Then the ex-President was invited to witness the trial of two initiates dressed to resemble the ultra-Conservative Speaker, Mr. Cannon, and the Free Trade Senator, Mr. Lafollette. Counsel for the defence depicted the prisoner Cannon as "the man who stood pat on the burning deck whence nearly all but him had fled." He urged the acquittal of Mr. Lafollette on the ground that he was a friend of the corporations and trusts. "Because when they were sorely burdened with the task of counting money he would arrange things so that they wouldn't have so much money to count." The jury voted unanimously for their acquittal, but the court declared it their painful duty to sentence both prisoners. Mr. Cannon would be banished to Kansas (the Progressive State where his name spells anathema), Mr. Lafollette to Rhode Island—the home of high Protection. After his initiation Mr. Roosevelt delivered a humorous speech in which he narrated how in the jungles of Africa he met six millionaires who were Progressives.

A PRINCELY GIFT.

SIR ERNEST CASSEL'S MEMORIAL TO KING EDWARD.

As a memorial to King Edward, Sir Ernest Cassel proposes, under the patronage of the King and Queen and the Queen Mother, and of the German Emperor and Empress, to establish an Anglo-German Institute with the object of facilitating employment for and rendering assistance to workers of English nationality in Germany, and of German nationality in England. A fund of £200,000 will be provided to start the undertaking, the details of which are now being elaborated.

Sir Ernest Cassel is the well-known financier, whose name is particularly associated with the development of the resources of Egypt. It was through him that the negotiations for financing the Nile irrigation works, including the building of the Assouan Dam, were carried out, and he has been connected with many other important undertakings in the world of finance. Sir Ernest, who is in his fifty-ninth year, was born at Cologne, where his father, Mr. Jacob Cassel, was a banker, and he has been conspicuous in all movements for bringing about good relations between Britain and Germany.

The number of English residents in Berlin is 17,000, while about 30,000 Germans are living in London. Many of these, it is pointed out, and especially many women, have been led to leave their native land through misapprehension or bad advice, and find themselves in a precarious and often desperate condition in a strange country, where all sources of assistance are closed to them as foreigners.

Sir Ernest Cassel in 1902 placed the sum of £200,000 at the disposal of King Edward for the building of the great consumptive sanatorium at Medhurst. In 1903 he placed £40,000 at the disposal of Lord Cromer for hospital work in Egypt; and the British Radium Institute, established last year, owes much to his munificence.

DREADFUL CASES OF RINGWORM

Heads Covered with Thick Scurf—
Cried with the Itching—Hospital's Treatment Gave Frightful Pain but Did No Good—3 Years of Torment.

OWE SCALP AND HAIR HEALTH TO CUTICURA

"Well over four years ago my two little girls were taken with a dreadful scalp trouble that the doctors called ringworm. They attended the Hospital as out-patients for a year. I had to apply their ointment with a brush, giving the children frightful pain. I also had to have their heads shaved every two weeks, but they got no better under the treatment. They used to cry with the tormenting itching, and their heads were covered with a thick scurf and dandruff.

"About a year ago I determined to try the Cuticura Remedies. I used plenty of Cuticura Soap and applied the Cuticura Ointment. I used only about three cakes of Cuticura Soap and three boxes of Cuticura Ointment and they were cured. Their hair is growing long and nice again. They had become so ill after their three years of suffering that I had to send one away to a convalescents' home as soon as she was cured, but now she is home, well and strong. My younger girl was away from school nine months with the disease. I am very grateful to Cuticura and for their children's sake I hope other mothers will try it. The Cuticura Soap I will always use for it makes the hair so lovely. Mrs. Nora Emmott, 38, Lena Gardens, Brook Green, W., London, Nov. 25, 1909."

Cuticura is the most economical treatment for the skin, scalp, hair and hands, of infants, children and adults. A tablet of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to effect a speedy and permanent cure.

Sold throughout the world. Depots: London, 27, Charterhouse Sq.; Paris, 10, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin; Australia, R. Towns & Co., Sydney; India, R. K. Paul, Calcutta; Japan, Matsuyama, Ltd., Tokio; S. Africa, Lennan, Ltd., Cape Town, etc. U.S.A., Potter Drug & Chem. Corp., Sole Props., Boston. Post-free, 32-page Cuticura Book, a complete Guide to the Care and Treatment of Skin and Scalp.

BIRTH.

PIGGOTT.—On October 11th, at 4, Shin-Ryu-Do Machi, Azabu, Tokyo, the wife of Lieutenant F. S. G. PIGGOTT, Royal Engineers, (attached to H.B.M. Embassy), of a son.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

It is officially reported that the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition will be closed on the 29th instant.

On the night of the 8th inst. the first snow of the season fell at Harbin. The thermometer registered 28 degrees Fahr.

It is reported from Seoul that Governor-General Viscount Terauchi is preparing to leave for Tokyo in a few days. He is expected to embark at Fusan.

COUNT OTANI KOZU, Lord Abbot of the Higashi-Hongwanji, returned to Kobe on the 5th instant from his long journey abroad. The chief object of his tour was making investigations of the Buddha's relics in India.

PRINCE TOKUGAWA, who is now returning from Europe, is reported to have arrived at Moscow on Monday. His Excellency is expected home about the 25th instant.

THE Aichi-Ken Commercial Museum has been established at Nagoya. The Museum consists of the main building, administration building, meeting hall, machinery building, bazaar, green house, and garden.

THE Prince Imperial, who proceeded from Otsu on Monday to Maizuru to attend the launching of the destroyer Umikaze, returned to Otsu the same evening. His Highness will start for Tokyo tomorrow, passing a night at Shizuoka.

THE Government of Uruguay is officially reported to have entered into negotiations with a telegraph Company at Berlin with a view to establishing wireless telegraph offices along the coast and on board various ships of the Republic.

A KOBE despatch says that in connection with raising a city loan amounting to 2,500,000 yen, negotiations are favourably progressing with the Mitsubishi and other banks. The loan is to be appropriated to the redemption of the waterworks loan.

THERE has, since the 3rd instant, been a run on the Biwajima Bank at Kasugai, Aichi prefecture. But the bank having paid over 100,000 yen, the situation is at present quiet. It is said that the run was due to defamatory measures adopted by some persons.

IN connection with the question of enlarging Nagoya harbour, the prefectural Assembly held on the 6th inst. an extraordinary city section meeting, when the original bill for the estimate of 3,143,140 yen was passed after amending it into 1,909,140 yen.

It is reported from Matsuyama that a bronze statue has been erected in honour of the late Nakaye Toju, a celebrated scholar in the latter days of the Tokugawa Government, on the site of the Otsu Castle. The unveiling ceremony took place on Tuesday.

It is announced that the Autumn Races in connection with the famous Hachiman Temple at Kamakura will take place on the 16th and 17th inst. This event should afford a good opportunity to travellers and residents of ensuring a pleasant week end at this picturesque resort.

A NAGASAKI despatch says that a passenger returning from Vladivostok reports the growing force of the Japanese traders' boycott against the Osaka Shosen Kaisha steamers. In the meantime the liners of the Russian Volunteer Fleet are said to be reaping the fishermen's profits.

A HANKOW telegram says that Mr. Hayashi, Chief Engineer of the Szechwan Hankow Railway, left for home on Tuesday. The Japanese engineers in the employ of the Ichang-Hankow and Szechwan-Hankow Railways, who on an average numbered as many as fifty, have thus all been discharged.

AN Utsunomiya despatch says that a thunderstorm was experienced on the 6th instant at Samukawa, Shimotsuke province. A house was struck by lightning and burned. One of the inmates and a neighbour fell senseless. Another thunderstorm raged in Ashikaga district the same day, and railway traffic was interrupted for a short time. About the same time hail fell in Tochigi prefecture, doing considerable damage to the crop.

It has recently been found that a large quantity of marble can be produced in the neighbourhood of Iwama Station, Ibaraki prefecture. A company with a capital of 1,000,000 yen is to be established with the object of exploiting the above, under the auspices of some leading businessmen in Tokyo.

THE Prince Imperial, who had just concluded his inspection at Kyoto of the special manoeuvres of engineers, visited Otsu on the 6th inst., and inspected the Ninth Regiment of Infantry, Shiga Kencho, and Female Normal School. His Highness also worshipped at the mausoleum of the Emperor Kobun and visited the Miidera Temple.

THERE was a very large attendance at Messrs. Jno. Hall's Auction Rooms on the 10th instant amongst which many rival interests were trying to obtain possession of the wreck of the Armoured Cruiser Bedford, but after long continued desultory bidding the auctioneers had finally to withdraw the property at 49,000 yen highest bid obtained.

THE largest French liner, La France of the Compagnie Générale Transatlantique, was launched at St. Nazaire on the 19th ult. Her displacement is 27,000 tons, and she is expected to cover the distance between Havre and New York in 5 days 16 hrs. The Mauretania, it will be remembered, displaces 31,900 tons and has travelled from Cork to New York in 4 days 10 hrs.

AN Otaru despatch says that on Sunday afternoon a railway accident occurred at the entrance of a tunnel near Ranto Station. The coupling of the engine and part of a goods train was suddenly broken off, so that the cars ran in opposite directions and were derailed. Four cars laden with oats were smashed, the loss being estimated at 54,000 yen. Traffic was suspended for several hours.

THE boy scout movement has struck Hawaii and already two patrols have been organized. The movement has met with a great deal of enthusiastic support, while the presence in the city of Lieutenant Colonel Bullard, U.S.A., is expected to add to the enthusiasm. D. Howard Hitchcock, the artist, is one of the enthusiastic scout advocates, having recently returned from California, where he attended some of the California scout camps and obtained much information on the movement.

Now that China has opened her Parliament, her budget for the fiscal year 1911-12 is to be submitted to deliberation in the Legislature. And preparations are now being made to that end by the Department of Finance. It is said that her expenditures have greatly increased as a result of the change of her political system, and there will be in consequence a deficiency of some 35,000,000 taels in the Central Government alone. Besides each province shows a financial deficiency of from 500,000 up to 2,000,000 taels, so that there is a total deficiency of at least 55,000,000 taels in China's finance for the next fiscal year. This therefore becomes the question of first importance for the Chinese Legislature.

EMBARASSING QUESTIONS.

The Governments of China and Japan are confronted just at present by some questions which threaten to develop troublesome phases. The habit with Chinese officialdom is to allow things to drift until they assume in the eyes of other nations the character of accomplished facts, often involving vested interests of considerable magnitude. Then the Chinese suddenly wake up and discover the existence of a state of affairs not strictly in accordance with treaty provisions. This was plainly the case with regard to the Koreans engaging in agricultural work in the Hsinmintun region. These Koreans had been for many years allowed to reside and work outside treaty limits, when suddenly the local authorities interfered and ordered them all to return within the conventional boundaries. It can scarcely be denied that the Chinese were within their strict rights in thus acting, and the Japanese Government seems to have recognised that fact by confining itself to a stipulation that reasonable compensation be paid to the retiring Koreans. The matter is more complicated, however, along the Yalu boundary. There the peoples of the two countries have been accustomed to ignore this natural barrier, and to settle freely on either side of the river, according as convenience or business interest dictated. There are some 30 or 40 thousand Koreans living on the northern bank of the Yalu, and a not greatly smaller number of Chinese reside on the Korean side. There is nothing in any treaty which helps to unravel this problem, so far as the Yalu is concerned; but in the case of Chientao there is a distinct agreement that Koreans shall be allowed to travel and settle freely within that district, provided that they are subject to Chinese jurisdiction. The situation has been decidedly complicated by the annexation of Korea, for one result of that measure has been to convert all Koreans into Japanese subjects, thus entitling them to the privilege of consular jurisdiction in whatever country Japan possesses that right by treaty. It is stated that immediately on receipt of the news of annexation the Chinese Government asked Japan whether she intended to claim that privilege for all her new subjects within Chinese dominions. The question of course elicited an affirmative answer. Then suddenly the Taol complication came upon the tapis, and judging from the attitude of the Chinese towards that question, they are determined to restrict the Koreans to the narrowest interpretation of the treaties. It is true that at Taol the sufferers were of Japanese nationality, but the incident can only be interpreted as indicating China's resolve to ignore established facts and revert to the strictest rendering of her conventions. In the Yalu region a tolerably effective reply might be made by compelling all Chinese subjects to remove to the northern bank of the river, but that would be a distinctly reactionary policy. The Japanese Government has to consider which course would inure to the greater benefit of its newly acquired subjects; that is to say, whether the privilege of consular jurisdiction shall be claimed at all costs, or whether it shall be waived on condition that rights of travel and residence are granted to Koreans outside treaty limits. Another point calling for serious thought is Japan's willingness to incur the expense of making due provision for the judicial control of her Korean subjects throughout the length and breadth of Manchuria. Is she prepared to enlarge the machinery of her consular tribunals so that it shall suffice for all the needs of such a situation? It is evident that the problem refuses to be easily solved, and unfortunately the Taol affair constitutes an inconvenient preface, for both sides are insisting with some acrimony on the strict letter of the law, and Japan, in posting a police force there, virtually makes the assertion that Chinese provisions for the preservation of peace and good order are not sufficient.

THE AFFAIR OF THE ADMINISTRATIVE COURT.

Saturday, October 8.

This matter seems likely to be taken up by the Barristers' Association. A meeting of the latter body has been held under the presidency of Dr. Hatoyama, and has decided that if the removal of the three judges is for bona fide reasons of decrepitude, there can be no ground for interference; but if personal considerations have really entered into the account, the matter is serious. Accordingly the barristers have appointed a committee to make full investigation.

The Kokumin Shimbun discusses this question editorially, but seems inclined to skim the surface rather than to sound the depths. It sets out by an expression of curiosity as to the source of the Constitutional breeze that is now blowing. Recently a question was vehemently raised as to whether the Constitution permits a cabinet to undertake such a measure as the annexation of an over-sea country without previously consulting the Diet. And now we have all this talk about the Constitution and the judges. But, after all, the present phase is not one for public interference. If the judges in conclave have decided that the provisions of a certain law are applicable to three of their number, what judicial tribunal can be said to have competence to query that judgment? It is certainly unconstitutional on the part of the people at large to interfere with the discharge of their constitutional duty by a chamber of judges.

It will be seen that the whole question hinges upon the physical condition of the 3 judges whom it is proposed to superannuate. These 3 judges themselves are said to have decided that they are victims of coercion prompted by the Prime-Minister, but they have failed to explain what possible motive Marquis Katsura could have for such undue interference. The present Premier has proved that he is nothing if not tactful and level-headed. We cannot suspect him of wantonly unconstitutional action.

Sunday, October 9.

We gather from reports published this morning that the three judges of the Administrative Court who are opposing the decision of their colleagues have practically failed in establishing their case. Much depended upon the view taken by the Association of Barristers, and these are said to have arrived at the conclusion that if the judges in conclave have, after due investigation, ruled that the sixth article of the Law of the Courts applies to the three recalcitrant judges, there is no possibility of going outside that ruling. The 3 judges themselves attempted to carry on their functions in spite of the ruling, but were politely informed by the President of the Court that their services were no longer required. It would seem in fact that all the forms prescribed have been duly complied with, and that there is no ground for legal complaint.

NAVAL INTELLIGENCE.

On the 10th instant the first Japanese ocean-going torpedo-destroyer was successfully launched at Maizuru. This type of vessel has been dubbed Kōyō Kuchiku-kan, a literal rendering of "ocean-going destroyer." The vessel is named Umikaze (wind of the sea). Her displacement is 1,150 tons and her speed, which is obtained by Parson's turbines, reaches 33 knots. The world's attention was called to this species of craft by the building of the Swift in a British dock-yard. The Swift displaced 1,800 tons; steamed 36 knots and carried four 4.7 inch guns and 2 torpedo tubes. It was a great step from the comparatively little destroyers hitherto employed to this British monster, and after a time the new departure came to be considered as excessive, so that the next ocean-going destroyers built by England displaced 1,000 and 900 tons respectively and had a speed of 34 and 33 knots. Japanese naval architects are said to believe that the Wind of the Sea represents the happy mean between the Swift and her English successors, but this of course remains to be proved by practise. Meanwhile it is noted that the largest destroyers possessed by other Powers are as follow:—

	tons.	knots.
Germany	670	30
United States.....	742	31
France	746	31
Italy	405	—
Russia	700	35

Referring to the above, the Nichu Nichi has an interesting note. It observes that the following vessels will be added to the effective strength of the fleet during this month or next; namely, the battleships Aki and Satsuma; the armoured-cruiser Kurama and the ocean-going destroyer Umikaze. Then on Saturday next the battleship Kawachi will be launched, and after her in quick succession will follow the battleship Settsu; the 2nd class cruisers Chikuma, Yahagi and Hirato, and the ocean-going destroyer Yamakaze (wind of the mountain). When all the above are included in the fleet they will represent an addition of 93,320 tons. The subsequent programme includes 1 battleship of 20,800 tons or 1 armoured-cruiser of 18,500 tons; 2 ocean-going destroyers of 600 or 700 tons, and 1 cruiser of 4,800 tons. On the other hand, 9 vessels, representing a total displacement of 25,460 tons, will have to be soon struck off the strength of the fleet. They are the following:—

Name.	Tonnage.
Chinyen	7,300
Namuro	3,700
Takachiho	3,700
Izumi	2,950
Hiyei	2,400
Katsuragi	1,600
Yamato	1,600
Musashi	1,600
Maya	610

Among the above the Katsuragi, the Yamato and the Musashi are now performing only duties of survey.

THE NEW NOBILITY IN CHOSŒN.

Friday, October 7.

The reports hitherto circulated from Seoul about the number and the titles of the new Korean Nobility prove to have been very erroneous. The statement telegraphed, it will be remembered, was that the total number of new nobles would not exceed 36, and that there would be among them only one count, practically the whole of the rest becoming barons. But it now turns out that there are more than 70 patents issued, and that the titles are not by any means so unevenly divided. Including the Emperor and the ex-Emperor, 4 princes are created, and then we have 12 marquises, 4 counts, 32 viscounts and 27 barons.

In addition to this liberality in the number of titles, the monetary grants accompanying the patents are much larger than was originally supposed. For whereas in Japan the common grant in the case of a newly-created baron is only 10,000 yen, the minimum in the case of a Korean baron is said to be 25,000, and a marquis gets 100,000. The grants attached to the intervening titles are not mentioned.

The solatia handed to retiring officials are also far larger than report stated at the outset. Thus we read that each former Minister of State is to receive 60,000 yen; each Shinnin official, 50,000; each Chokunin 10,000; each Sonin 3,000, and each Hannin 500.

These figures lend additional eclat to Mr. Sung Yong-chun's conduct in refusing the title of baron, together with its accompanying grant of money.

Saturday, October 8.

Again a correction has to be made in the reports hitherto published as to the numbers of the new Korean nobles. The corrected figures are now said to be Marquises 9; Counts 3; Viscounts 22 and Barons 45. The ceremony of conferring these ranks took place on the 7th instant, and is said to have been a most ceremonious affair, all the recipients of the honour being robed in the fullest of full dress. The patents were handed to each of the new nobles by the Governor General himself, who stood in the middle of the hall, where he was approached by the nobles in succession. The Governor-General did not make any speech, but each recipient of a patent was required to sign a document setting forth the duties and responsibilities of a peer of the realm.

The patents of nobility having been conferred and the certificates pledging the Government to pay solatia of fixed amount to the officials having been handed over, nothing remains to complete the programme except to give special rewards to private individuals who have distinguished themselves by filial piety, by wifely fidelity or by other meritorious actions. In determining these the local officials will be entrusted with the duty of investigation, and the rewards will ultimately be transmitted by the Chief of Political Affairs.

It is now stated that the main part of the Governor-General's immediate business having been concluded, he will return to Japan by the 20th instant.

We read in the Chuo Shinbun that some dissatisfaction has been caused by omissions from the lists of recipients of rewards. Special reference is made to Mr. Yu Kil-sun, formerly Minister of Home Affairs and a man of pronounced anti-Japanese views. His name appears on the list of newly created Barons but is not included in the roll of members of the Central Council. It is inevitable that some people should harbour feelings of discontent on an occasion of this kind. Men's appraisements of their own merits seldom coincide exactly with the value placed on them by others. We are somewhat surprised however to observe that Mr. Sun, former leader of the Il Ching-hoi, is among the men credited with dissatisfaction. His name appears on the list of Viscounts, but it is said that he thinks that his career entitles him to the rank of Count on at least equal terms with the ex-Premier, Mr. Yi Wang-yon. Considering that Mr. Sun is credited with the design of refusing to receive any title whatever, his purpose being to settle permanently in Japan under the name of Noda Heijiro, it should not be a matter of much consequence to him whether he is nominated a Count or a Viscount.

After the ceremony of conferring patents the ex-Ministers of State repaired first to the palace of the ex-Emperor and next to that of his father, to return thanks for the honour they had received. It is thought that the whole proceeding has produced an excellent impression in Chosen.

Sunday, October 9.

It was not to be supposed that the distributions of titles and rewards would leave everyone content. This morning (9th instant) news comes that Mr. Chong Kyu, husband of the former ex-Emperor's sister, attempted to commit suicide on learning that his rank in the new nobility would not be higher than that of Baron. It is this nobleman's son, Cho Nam-se, who was recently arrested on a charge of having misappropriated funds belonging to the ex-Emperor. Whether that disgrace did not unhinge the mind of the suspected man's father and predispose him to the rash act which nearly cost him his life, cannot yet be ascertained but is strongly suspected.

It appears however that Mr. Chong Kyu's case is not singular. The Nichinichi has intelligence from Seoul to the effect that there is much discontent and that the selections made by the Japanese Authorities are subjected to severe criticism.

The grants made to the various provinces are as follow:—

Out of the grant to the province of Kyongkwi the sum allotted to Seoul is 1 million yen. These funds are to be devoted to the support of the Yangpan, to education and to the formation of famine-relief funds. The proportion in which they are to be distributed is 60 per cent. to the Yangpan, 30 per cent. to education and 10 per cent. to famine-relief. The capital itself is not to be spent but only the interest, and all orders relating to the use of the money are to receive the approval of the Governor General's office. The division among towns and districts in each province is to be in the ratio of the population, and the method of expending the interest will be fixed by the prefect of the province.

Monday, October 10.

The figures originally announced with regard to the grants of money to newly-created Korean noblemen seemed very generous at the time, but the latest news shows that they are even more munificent than rumour represented them to be. Thus instead of 100,000 yen each marquis is to receive bonds representing 200,000; each count will receive 150,000; each viscount 100,000 and each baron from 20,000 to 30,000. Further, to specially deserving members of the former Council of State a sum not exceeding 50,000 yen will be presented. These are certainly most generous figures.

We mentioned in our last issue that certain grants were made to the 13 provinces for purposes of assisting the Yangpan, for promoting education and for forming a famine relief fund. We now learn from the latest telegrams that the sums thus allotted aggregate 17,248,000 yen. Hence, as the original total appropriated for the various purposes of solatia in connection with annexation, was 30 million yen, there remains 12,752,000 yen to meet the drafts on account of grants to the new nobles.

With regard to the discontent said to have been created in certain quarters owing to alleged omissions from the list of nobles, certain explanations are given. One refers to Yi Chun-yong. It is pointed out that this gentleman, being the eldest son of a man who has received a patent of marquise, will therefore succeed to his father's title. There was consequently no reason to bestow on him a special patent. As for the case of Mr. Yi Yong-kyu, who was leader of the Il Ching-hoi at the time of the annexation, the explanation given is that he has never served in a high official position, and that to have been merely the leader of a political party did not constitute a valid reason for granting him a title.

The same argument applies in a moderated form to Mr. Sum Pyong-chun, the original organiser, and for some time the leader, of the Il Ching-hoi. A title was granted to him without any reference whatever to his connection with the Il Ching-hoi, and solely on account of his services as a Minister of State. This principle was applied to all politicians and though misapprehension seems to have arisen in connection with the conferring of patents on some members of the Dai han Hyop-poi, the fact is that these men had previously held portfolios and were honoured on that account, not at all because of their political associations.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The Trade Returns for the first ten days of October are:—

	Yen.
Exports	13,274,000
Imports	8,969,000

Excess of Exports..... 4,305,000

The figures from January 1st to October 10th are:—

	Yen,	Compared with last year.
Exports	339,118,000	+38,186,000
Imports	356,083,000	+32,717,000
Excess of Imports.....	16,965,000

THE TARIFF.

The new tariff continues to be a subject of rumour and discussion. There is talk in irresponsible quarters of the return to Japan of Mr. Kato, Ambassador of this country in London, and there is a rumour in still more irresponsible quarters that his Excellency's return is owing to a disagreement between him and the Minister of Foreign Affairs in Tokyo on the subject of the tariff. These tales are telegraphed by the Asahi's correspondent, but our contemporary does not claim any special attention for them. It is further hinted that the tariff question is not unlikely to be dragged into the arena of party politics, since England as an exponent of fair trade would have no difficulty in finding a basis for concessions by Japan. That is somewhat stale news; a remark which applies equally to the statement that woollens and calicoes would be the English staples chiefly penalized by the new tariff, but that the effect produced on the consumption of these articles would not be appreciable as they have practically no competitors in the Japanese market. We observe that the Nichi Nichi Shimbun adds its voice to that of the Fiji Shimpō in advocating a conciliatory policy on Great Britain's part towards Japan. Analysing the conduct of the Government in this matter, our Tokyo contemporary arrives at the conclusion that two factors presided at the shaping of the official course. One was somewhat sentimental; namely, a strong desire to assert the tariff autonomy acquired by Japan after many years of unilateral treaties. The other was a disposition to sail with the current of the time; in other words to adopt a protectionist policy. To what extent these factors misled the Authorities the Mainichi does not undertake to state, but it leads us plainly to infer that the rates of import duty were needlessly augmented, and that there is some room for concessions to English interests. It leaves entirely to the country's diplomats the task of discovering this margin, but on the whole the Nichi Nichi may be now written down as a colleague of Fiji Shimpō in the tariff problem.

We read in the Niroku Shimpō that the Japanese Government will probably ask the next Diet to consent to a modification of the tariff in the sense of reducing the rates upon textile fabrics for the reason that they are a special product of Great Britain and an essential article of consumption in Japan. Our contemporary adds, however, that this concession, although appreciated by Englishmen, will not satisfy them.

In connection with this we may mention that under the heading of "Centre of depression in Kasumigaseki," the Hochi Shimbun publishes, avowedly on the authority of hearsay, an article to the effect that a great difference of opinion has arisen between Count Komura and Mr. Kato, Japanese Ambassador in London, on the subject of the tariff. The Ambassador, according to the Hochi's informant, specially criticised Count Komura's speech in the Diet when he referred to England's system as affording no room for tariff negotiation. That speech, in Mr. Kato's estimation, greatly offended British feeling, and Marquis Katsura is said to share the Ambassador's views. On the other hand, Count Komura's health is so delicate that he cannot continue to discharge the onerous duties of Minister of Foreign Affairs. We (Japan Mail) reproduce this story without the slightest pretence of credence. Such tales could be manufactured by the dozen and out of much less substantial material. There is no doubt that the tariff question presents serious difficulties, but a satisfactory solution of these is much more likely to be found by the coöperation of the above distinguished diplomats than by their separation.

Writing on this subject, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun observes that while the Foreign Office in Tokyo confidently anticipates a satisfactory settlement, the facts do not support that view. Prominent among these facts is the action of British producers. They are said to have telegraphed to their agents in Japan in the sense that no occasion exists for making imports in anticipation of the new tariff. The plain inference suggested by this action, if it has really been taken, is that British manufacturers entertain the conviction that the new tariff will not become operative in its present form. Our contemporary then proceeds to quote Count Okuma, whose criticism is that the tariff is neither fish, flesh, fowl nor good red herring. Its compilers had no definite policy: their opinions were divided between protection, revenue, free-trade and autonomy. The result was a mxtum-gatherum, unsatisfactory to everybody. That is a decidedly smart comment, but it strikes us as being decidedly superficial also.

Our readers will not be surprised to find that explicit official denials are published with reference to the stories circulated by the Hochi Shimbun to the effect that a difference of opinion had arisen between Count Komura and Mr. Kato, with reference to the tariff; that the former, partly owing to this cause and partly owing to ill-health, was about to resign, and that Mr. Kato was on his way back from London. In reproducing these tales we ventured to express absolute disbelief in them, and we now find that the leading Tokyo journals deny the rumours emphatically. There has been no difference of opinion whatever between the two statesmen, and although it is true that Count Komura has not visited his office for some time, the cause has been a temporary malady which has not prevented him from discharging his duties. We gather that some steps are being taken in London with reference to this tariff question.

We may mention that, according to the Nippon, the only feasible course is a frank reduction of tariff rates, and the probability is that a bill in that sense will be submitted to the Diet next session. The same journal says that the Finance Department has resolved to send a tariff expert to London in connection with this matter so that the exact views of the Government in Tokyo may be conveyed to the British Authorities. Thereafter a suitable measure will be drafted for submission to the Diet. We need scarcely say that in reproducing these statements we do not give them the slightest endorsement. We quote them merely as indications of the views entertained in certain quarters in Japan.

A KONSHIN-KAI.

On the 9th instant the citizens of Seoul, alike of Korean and Japanese origin, held a friendly reunion in one of the former palaces. The gathering was called a Konshin-kai, which means simply an amicable meeting, but its real character was evidently to celebrate the annexation and to show that the great event had not roused any feelings of bitterness. About 5,000 persons attended, and the costumes of the crowd are said to have been of a most motley character. They included foreign dress, Japanese habiliments and Korean robes. There were 3 addresses delivered. The first was by a representative of the citizens, Mr. Kojo, whose name is well-known in the newspaper world as a former correspondent of the Nichi Nichi Shimbun in Peking. The second was by the Director-General of Political Affairs Mr. Yamagata, and the third by Mr. Cho, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce in the last Korean Cabinet. All spoke very briefly, and took for their theme the necessity of cultivating friendly relations between Japanese and Koreans, and the beneficial results, both moral and material, that would certainly result from such a line of action. Then 3 cheers were invited for the Emperor of Japan and Chosen by the ex-Prime-Minister, Mr. Yi Wan-yong, and they were given with the greatest vigour, the band afterwards playing the Japanese national anthem. Refreshments were served at 30 booths, and the greatest possible harmony is said to have prevailed. There were many professions of eternal friendship, the Koreans uttering their vows in the Japanese language and the Japanese in the Korean. Further the city was beflagged as on an occasion of a great national holiday.

On the day preceding the above, Viscountess Terauchi assisted by Mrs. Yamagata gave a luncheon to some twenty of the most prominent Korean ladies of Seoul, including Princess Li. After luncheon there was a reception attended by about 100 guests, among whom was the ex-Emperor (junior). The party seems to have been eminently successful. It is remarkable as the first affair of the kind ever organized in the Korean Capital.

FORMOSA.

Things appear to be at a stand-still in Formosa. The terrible rains which descended continuously during a week from the 25th of last month, ploughed up roads and swept away bridges, so that further operations in the field became impossible. One barracks, although built on a height 300 metres above sea level, was utterly demolished. This does not mean that military operations are suspended. Everything in the shape of fighting had already come to an end for a time, and the troops were engaged in setting up wire-entanglements and constructing means of communication. Everything is now peaceful and the children of the aboriginies carry dumplings into the Japanese camp for sale. In fact the operations of the first year have come to a satisfactory conclusion, but next year the difficult task of subjugating the Taroko will have to be taken in hand. If that be successfully achieved, the rest will be comparatively easy, and although a period of 5 years was originally allowed for the whole of the operations, it is now thought probable that they will be accomplished at an earlier date. The section of the island hitherto held by the aboriginies measured one third of the whole area, so that their complete subjugation means a great deal.

CHOSEN.

There is a notable dearth of news from Chosen this morning. Only two items of any importance are to hand. One is to the effect that the special outlays which will be incurred up to the end of this fiscal year are, ordinary expenditures 6,940,981 yen and extraordinary 5,667,757; making a total of 12,608,738 yen. It is not to be imagined that these outlays are in excess of any previous estimate. What is meant by "special expenditures" is that as the Diet cannot be consulted about budgetary outlays incurred during the period from the date of annexation, namely October the 1st, to the end of the fiscal year, namely March the 31st, those outlays must be authorised by a special Ordinance. In a word these outlays may be regarded as the cost of running the Chosen Government during the first half year of its existence.

The other item of intelligence is that on the 10th instant the Governor-General summoned the first meeting of the Central Council at the former Residency-General. Sixty members attended and short addresses were delivered by the Governor-General and by the ex-officio President of the Council, Mr Yamagata. No business was transacted, the meeting having been of a purely ceremonial character. It is stated that the Council will hereafter be summoned twice or three times a month.

It is stated that when Viscount Sung Pyong chun waited at the palace of the ex-Emperor, Li Dai O, in company with several of the newly-created peers, in order to express their gratitude for the honour conferred on them, the ex-Emperor declared that it had been his most earnest wish to see every section of the nation receive the fact of annexation calmly and peacefully. He rejoiced that such had been the case.

The telegram which gives the above news adds that the Prince is so crippled by rheumatism as to be unable to move about without assistance.

Our readers will observe from the above that the ex-leader of the Il-Ching-Hoi, Mr. Sung, has not persisted in his avowed determination to refuse a title. There is no reason to suppose that he was not sincere in making that declaration. He has abandoned his intention in deference to the fact that his declination of the honour would have suggested false constructions.

Japan is promised a visit from the wives of the newly-created peers. A number of these ladies are said to be desirous of seeing the country to which they now owe allegiance, and they will follow the example of other tourist parties which have become a feature of the era. It is said that their visit to Japan will be made at about the time of the Emperor of Japan's birthday; that is to say, during the first week in November.

Another but very much smaller party is said to be about to set out from Seoul for Tokyo. It will consist of a representative of each of the new orders of nobility, and its object in coming will be to thank the Emperor for the honour conferred on the new peers.

It is now stated that Viscount Terauchi will leave Seoul for Japan on the 16th instant, and that his departure will be preceded by various farewell banquets.

Naturally the Japanese language is very fashionable in Korea. No less than 3 new schools for its study have been established in Seoul.

It was reported recently that one of the consequences of the introduction of the new régime in Chosen would be a large economy in connection with the establishment of the dethroned Emperor's household. That would indeed be a natural result, for there should be a very marked difference between the number of officials required to discharge the duties of a court with a reigning sovereign and the number required to form the household of a simple prince. Nevertheless the Mainichi Dempo's correspondent telegraphs from Seoul that there will practically be no diminution in the personnel of Prince Li's establishment, though the actual administration of affairs will be ordered somewhat differently.

The party of Korean peeresses who talk of visiting Japan are said to contemplate setting out from Seoul on the 3rd of November. They will number 30, and will be under the guidance of Countess Kodama and other Japanese ladies. The welcome accorded to these ladies will be by no means an easy problem to solve. Dinners and dances will scarcely be in their line, and the amusement of viewing autumnal tints has its limitations.

THE AFFAIR OF 1895.

The telegraph says that some Koreans have had the assurance to draft a petition for which signatures are now being sought. It will be remembered that, in 1895, a conspiracy took place in the Korean capital, and the plotters, breaking into the palace, murdered the Queen in a manner which lent additional horror to the shocking crime. Japan was then represented at the Court of Korea by Viscount Miura, and rumour busily insisted that his Excellency was more or less implicated in the conspiracy. He was recalled to Japan and subjected, together with his alleged accomplices, to a searching trial. But in the end nothing could be proved against him. His official career closed there, however, for he never received another appointment. It has not been asserted, however, so far as we know, that Japanese subjects took a leading part in this conspiracy. The resultant impression is that although 2 or 3 Japanese soshi may have been among the plotters, the latter were in the main Koreans, and the fiction about Japanese leaders was due to the fact that some of those who broke into the palace wore foreign costume and had their hair cut short. Naturally the incident was execrated by the intimate friends of the Queen, among whom were some foreign ladies. The strange thing now is that such a petition as that alluded to above should have been prepared and offered for signature. For the document contains a prayer, not that the perpetrators of the outrage should be pardoned, but that they should be rewarded. Nothing could more vividly illustrate the extraordinary misconceptions under which some Koreans labour with regards to the sentiments and policy of Japan. If the petition has any real existence, a fact which may be contradicted by telegrams even now on their way, we have no doubt that its signatories will receive at the hands of the Japanese well-merited punishment.

MR. DERNBURG.

Mr. Dernburg is evidently a man of very vigorous and independent ideas. In a speech made by him at Port Arthur on the 7th instant, he is reported to have strongly condemned the disposition shown by some of his country's officers to bring their wives and daughters with them when visiting this fortress. The fall of Metz was due to failure of provisions, but the fall of Port Arthur was due to the fierce bravery of the Japanese troops. The place ought to be inspected with reverend admiration by all military men, and Mr. Dernburg advised that it should be made the bourne of Japanese students' periodical travels. His Excellency then passed on to speak of the Kaiser, whom he had heard expressing regrets that the duties of the Crown did not allow him to travel extensively throughout the world so as to make himself fully acquainted with men and things. It was to correct that defect in the Prince Imperial's education that the latter's extensive tour of travel now about to commence had been planned by the Kaiser, and Mr. Dernburg declared that he would take steps to urge a visit by the Prince to Port Arthur. Turning to the question of trade, he said that some of his fellow-countrymen engaged in commerce in Japan had complained to him that the Japanese Government did not show sufficient consideration for the interests of the foreign merchant, but his own opinion was that her over-sea trade was so important for Japan and gave such earnest of development that she was bound to protect it by every means in her power.

Mr. Dernburg seems to have a keenly sympathetic nature. He spoke of the Shimpan-ro at Shimonoseki in terms almost dramatic, recalling the absorbingly important conference which took place there in 1895 between Prince Ito and Li Hung Chang. When he visited the place 3 or 4 foreign men-of-war were anchored beneath, and the associations connected with the scene moved him profoundly.

THE DEPOSITS BUREAU.

The Deposits Bureau of the Treasury is sometimes called "the palace of the sleeping demon" (fukuma-den) with reference to the large but more or less occult part that it plays in the national finance. The funds at its disposal are simply the deposits in the Postal Savings Banks. These deposits have shown a marked tendency to increase during recent years. Thus, at the end of 1909, they amounted to 123,379,000 yen, being an increase of some 18 million yen as compared with 1908, and of over 1 million as compared with the average of the past 5 years. This year, however, up to the end of August there had been an increase of 24,331,730 yen over the 1909 figure for the whole year, and if we assume that this will grow proportionately for the remainder of the year, the total increase by the end of December will be 30,188,750. Moreover it is certain that nearly all the depositors in the petty banks now about to be closed will transfer their funds to the Postal Banks. There are over 10 millions of such deposits, and if we assume the withdrawal of 3 millions, it will nevertheless result that the Deposits Bureau will find its funds augmented by about 37 millions as compared with 1909.

PANIC IN SHANGHAI.

The money market in Shanghai seems to be in a very disturbed state. On the 9th instant the large Chinese bank known as Yuanfeng-jun, closed its doors, and news was received shortly afterwards that no less than 7 banks in Swatow had taken the same course, probably as a consequence. Thereupon all the foreign banks in Shanghai announced that the paper of the Chinese banks would not be received over the counter. As the banks thus tabooed number over 20, the dimensions of the trouble may be estimated. The Chamber of Commerce—doubtless the Chinese Chamber is meant though the telegram does not distinguish—has held a meeting to discuss the situation, but as yet we have no news about the decision adopted. It will have been observed that monetary troubles menaced the premier settlement in China some time ago, but hopes were entertained that the difficulty might be tided over without a crash. These hopes have evidently proved delusive.

There is a conflict between the explanations offered about the origin of the panic in Shanghai. One story represents the Taotai as unavoidably compelled to press for repayment of public money deposited with the banks, and implies that the Taotai's dismissal was in consequence of failure to obtain repayment. Another and more probable account is that the Taotai was dismissed from office owing to some irregularity—"dishonesty" is the expression used in the telegram—and that his successor immediately made a call upon the banks. Whatever the exact sequence of the events may have been, the fact remains that the great bank known as Yuan-Feng-Jun has closed its doors, and that this involves a similar fate in the case of its 22 branches and agencies. Some time ago Shanghai was visited by a financial panic in connection with the rubber boom, but the dimensions of the present incident seem likely to develop much more serious magnitude.

Peking telegraphs that 700,000 taels has been placed by the Treasury through the Bank of China at the disposal of the banks in Shanghai, and the telegram adds that this measure has produced a good effect though confidence is by no means restored yet. It is added that accommodation will be given by the foreign banks to tide over the difficulty. Shanghai, however, does not take by any means so hopeful a view of its own situation. Already 7 banks of more or less magnitude have put up their shutters, and the embarrassment threatens to spread. The Chinese Chamber of Commerce has held a meeting and has made a telegraphic communication to the Prince Regent, setting forth that unless something is done quickly to relieve the situation, a number of manufactories will be obliged to suspend operations, and over 300,000 workmen will be thrown out of employ. The only remedy is to be found in a speedy supply of ready money, and the Prince is urged to instruct the Bank of China to place at once a sum of 5 million taels at the disposal of the Shanghai banks.

The closure of the Yuan Feng-Jun has evidently produced a feeling of consternation. This Bank was founded originally by Chinese capitalists of high repute, and the authorities had entrusted it with the handing not only of the Customs revenue but also of the indemnity funds paid by China to foreign countries. At first the Bank was said to have 22 branches throughout the Empire, but the number is now put at 17. All these have closed their doors as a matter of course. It is said that the Bank's loans to the public aggregate 20 million Taels, and its liabilities total the same sum. But in addition to this it is believed to hold 4 million Taels of Canton's customs revenue and 3½ million Taels of Shanghai's, neither of which is secured.

Mr. Kawashima of the Yokohama Specie Bank is quoted as saying that the three principal banks in Shanghai are the Yuan Feng-Jun, the Yuan-Chi and the Yuan-Ting. All these have suspended payment. The first named is the principal, and Mr. Kawashima puts its branches at 22. According to his information, the proximate cause of the trouble was a change of Taotais. The former Taotai was removed in consequence of irregular practices, and his successor suddenly called up the State deposits in the principal banks, which precipitate demand the banks were unable to meet. But there is a remote cause on which greater responsibility rests. It is the recent speculation in rubber. The banks were menaced with disaster in connection with this affair, and were only saved by the liberality of their foreign confières, which accommodated them to the extent of 5 million Taels. Still the direct blame must be attributed to the Government, and as the Treasury would be the heaviest loser were things pushed to extremes, it seems probable that palliative steps will be taken.

Mr. Iida of the Mitsui Bank, speaking through the columns of the Asahi Shimbun, takes a decidedly pessimistic view of the situation. He too traces the origin of the financial panic in Shanghai to rubber speculations the results of which, a few months ago were barely tided over. But thereafter the harvesting of fine crops not only of cereals but also of silk, supplemented by a marked rise in the gold price of silver, produced a feeling of buoyancy, and business-men were beginning to look for final emergence from the depression that has so long brooded over the market. This Shanghai catastrophe dispels that hope. Its effects will be experienced all over China and in the East generally, especially in Japan where the cotton-spinning industries will be very hard hit.

MAJOR-GENERAL AOKI.

Major-General Aoki, who succeeded the well known Colonel Shiba as commander of the Japanese troops in the metropolitan province of China, and who has of late been serving as military attaché of the Japanese Legation in Peking, landed at Moji on the 11th instant and was of course interviewed by a news-agency. The General comes to Japan as the chief of the Reception-Committee organised in connection with the approaching visit of Prince Tsai-Hsun. He says that the Chinese Government is anxious to submit to the new Senate, with as little delay as possible, a bill for providing China with a new navy. To that end the Prince's sojourn in the United States, and subsequently in Japan, will be shortened as far as possible. His Highness would have come to Japan first, but he was advised to defer his visit, as the senior officers of the Japanese Army and Navy would have been holding their annual conclave just at the time of his originally proposed coming. The Major-General does not vouchsafe any information as to the probable dimensions of the new Chinese navy. He passes on at once to politics. Undoubtedly the Chinese Government, according to him, was much perturbed by the conclusion of the Russo-Japanese alliance. Chinese statesmen regarded the annexation of Korea as a natural outcome of that alliance, and were not particularly excited about the former event, though the latter certainly caused many qualms. With regard to the interesting question of relations between the Prince Regent and the Empress-Dowager, the Major General denies, though not very positively, that any serious friction exists. This subject inspired a striking communication to the columns of the London Times recently, and from collateral sources we gather that the absence of friction is not generally credited. Speaking of Chinese finance, General Aoki is quoted as saying that possibly some compromise might be effected between the Government, on the one hand, and the advocates of speedily opening a national assembly, on the other; the compromise taking the line that the Senate would vote for additional taxes provided that the Throne agreed to anticipate the date originally fixed for the inauguration of parliament. With regard to Yuan Shih kai, we read that the Major-General credits the Government with a desire to recall him to power, but Yuan's willingness to resume office is considered very doubtful. One very striking statement attributed to this officer is that although the revenue accruing to the Central Government annually does not exceed 300 million taels, the sum actually collected throughout the Empire aggregates from 1500 to 2000 millions.

EDUCATION IN KOREA.

A very important question confronting Japan is that of education in Korea. Naturally the text-books in use among Korean students and the instruction given at the schools have hitherto breathed a spirit of anything but loyalty to Japan, and it is essential now that this state of affairs should be changed if Chosen is to be a peaceful part of the Japanese Empire. The subject has been taken up by the Imperial Education Council, which comprises practically all Japan's greatest educationists and which may be said to exercise almost paramount influence in the Mom-busho. A meeting has been held by this important body, and 3 resolutions have been adopted. The first is that steps must at once be taken to cultivate among the Koreans an intimate knowledge of the Imperial Rescript on education, and to teach them that the amalgamation of their country with the Japanese Empire is a natural and an inevitable outcome of the historical relations between the two countries. The second resolution is that every possible effort must be made to spread a knowledge of the Japanese language in Korea. Various devices for promoting that end were suggested by the Council, among them being the adoption of Japanese as the official language of Chosen. The third decision relates to text-books and readers for schools. The Council agreed that all expedition must be observed in providing an ample supply of these instruments of education.

THE CHINESE SENATE.

Friday, October 7.

Already there is talk of the proceedings of the Chinese Senate falling into a state of languor. It will be remembered that on the 4th instant, namely, the first day of its business transactions, the Senate decided to hand to a special committee of 18 an urgency motion with reference to the collision between the local assembly of Kwangsi—not Kiangsi as erroneously stated in our last—and the Governor of that province, which incident ended in the resignation of the Assembly en bloc. Meeting again on the 6th instant, the Senate proceeded to elect the members of the above committee, but apparently even this simple business was not transacted. The Senate seemed to be overtaken by a fit of atrophy. Its proceedings were of a most perfunctory character; the government delegates were conspicuous by the paucity of their number, and listlessness was the pervading atmosphere. How the business ultimately fared it is difficult to gather from the telegrams, but apparently the election was postponed, the general tendency being to do nothing and to treat the whole affair as a farce.

Saturday, October 8.

The first debate, properly so called, took place in the chamber of the new Senate on the 6th instant. It was observable that the proceedings seemed to have gained much in point of orderliness, and that greater interest appeared to attach to the doings of the Senate. The number of members present was 182; the number of Government Delegates 27, and the number of spectators 54. The chairman of the Special Committee which had been appointed to investigate the Kwangsi affair, presented a report of the Committee's enquiry. This document said that the Governor of the province had exceeded his legitimate functions, that he ought to be duly punished, and that the members of the local assembly should be invited to withdraw their resignation. It was with reference to this report that the debate took place. Several animated speeches are said to have been delivered, and in their sequel the report was adopted by a large majority.

It is fair to infer from the above that the reports previously received as to a listless and perfunctory mood on the part of the Senate were greatly exaggerated. The want of interest displayed on the 2nd day was due simply to the nature of the business before the assembly. It is scarcely possible to enthuse much over such a colourless affair as the election of a special committee.

Sunday, October 9.

It appears that the measure passed by the Chinese Senate with reference to a collision between the provincial assembly and the governor of Kwangsi took the form of a petition to the throne, and it is predicted that many similar questions will be submitted in the Senate. Should such be the case, that body will be converted into a species of administrative court. The delegation of such a function to the Senate would greatly restrict the administrative capacity of the provincial officials, and yet it is difficult to see how the right to petition the throne through the Senate can be denied to the people. Thus something of a dilemma already confronts the Government in connection with the working of the Senate.

Meanwhile the advocates of immediately opening a National Assembly have renewed their agitation in Peking. On the 7th instant, a body of 20 of them proceeded to the Prince Regent's palace, carrying a petition in that sense. They were told that the Prince Regent was at the Emperor's palace and would not be back for 3 days, whereupon they attempted to leave the petition with the Prince Regent's secretary. He however refused to receive it, and the petitioners then seated themselves outside the gate and announced their intention of remaining there until either the document was received or the Prince returned. This scene lasted until 9 p.m. when Prince Su escorted by a force of police arrived and took possession of the petition after admonishing its bearers.

On the same day another demonstration of a more violent character appears to have taken place. Seventeen students of Manchurian origin who are studying in Peking compiled a document setting forth the imminent danger that threatens Manchuria and urging the speedy opening of a Chinese parliament as the only measure for saving the situation. It is not quite clear whether these seventeen politicians repaired to the palace of the Prince Regent or confined themselves to holding a meeting elsewhere, but the telegraph says that 2 of them, in order to prove their sincerity, attempted to commit suicide in the presence of the conclave and were with difficulty restrained. Finally one of the two gashed his thigh and another his arm, and sprinkled the blood over the petition. A drop of gore adds incalculably to the dramatic character of an incident.

Monday, October 10.

We explained in our last issue that the Throne of China was placed in something of a dilemma by the necessity of choosing whether to endorse or reject the first petition sent up by the Senate. This petition declared in the name of the Senate that the action of the Governor of Kwangsi, in disregarding a decision of the local assembly of that province had been ultra vires. If the Throne endorsed this view, the competence of the new local assemblies would be materially widened, whereas, if it rejected the petition, the powers of the provincial assemblies would be proportionately restricted. The latest news is that the Throne has not only endorsed the petition, but also has lost no time in doing so. This is considered as a convincing proof that the Government of China is sincere in its intention of introducing parliamentary institutions, not in name only but in reality.

Tuesday, October 11.

An interesting telegram from Peking is sent by the Asahi Shimbun's correspondent. He describes the general opinions with regard to the future of the Senate as pessimistic on the foreign side and optimistic on the Chinese. It appears that the Senate is now resting on its oars for the alleged purpose of "adjusting" the measures which it contemplates discussing. That is a curious process for an advisory body to adopt. One would expect it to divide itself into special committees for specific purposes. However the telegraph represents things as we have stated them. The correspondent goes on to quote Englishmen as saying that the prospects of constitutional government in China are small, as its meaning and advantages are appreciated by only a small section of the nation, namely those who have travelled and witnessed the actual working of constitutions in the West. German critics are referred to by the same correspondent as declaring that the experiences furnished by the Senate prove the extreme inexpediency of opening a national assembly at once. All foreigners seem to be agreed that unless the Senate and the Government put more back-bone into the work than they have hitherto done, the country's progress towards a constitution will suffer a check. To onlookers from a distance it will probably suggest itself that these criticisms are somewhat premature. The Chinese themselves are said to take a hopeful view.

THE TAOEL AFFAIR.

There is a bye-product of this complication. It appears that for the better protection of their fellow-countrymen the Japanese local authorities have thought it necessary to establish a police-station in the region. To this the Chinese object strongly, calling it ultra vires.

Telegrams from Mukden represent the Viceroy of Manchuria as adopting a very strong line in the matter of the Taoel outrage. His Excellency declares that when the thirteen Japanese subjects repaired to the Yamen of the Chihsing to protest against the order for their removal within the settlement, they resorted to such violent methods that it became absolutely necessary to place them under police restraint. The Viceroy denies, however, that the term "imprisonment" can properly be applied to the subsequent detention of the 13 Japanese. They were merely kept in confinement, and all proper care and consideration was extended to them. The despatch concludes by protesting against the establishment of a Japanese police station at the place. That step is denounced as entirely ultra vires. It is alleged that Mr. Consul-General Koike has replied to this despatch in the sense that no excuse can satisfactorily explain the forcible detention of Japanese subjects during a space of 6 days, and that he must repeat his demand for the punishment of the officials concerned.

MONGOLIA.

A telegram from Peking says that the Prince Regent and nearly all the leading statesmen in the Chinese capital are devoting keen attention to the future of Mongolia. They feel that if things be left to drift in that region, as was the case in Korea, a similar issue may have to be encountered in the course of years. They have therefore formed an association called the Pan-meng-hui, a title which signifies society for the preservation of Mongolia. Among the steps advocated by this society the principal are to lose no time in organizing and stationing a Division of Troops in Mongolia; to undertake careful investigation of the conditions existing there; to unite the various local rulers into a solid league for the protection of the country, and to convert Mongolia into a recognised province of the Middle Kingdom. In short it would seem that a genuine feeling of alarm exists in Peking about the eventualities of Russia's advance in Central Asia, and perhaps the historical evidence as to the principle of natural accretion is sufficiently formidable to warrant Chinese nervousness in this instance.

CHINA.

A curt telegram reaches several of the Tokyo newspapers to the effect that the Chinese government has abandoned the gold standard recently adopted at the instance of Mr. Shen, President of the Board of Posts and Telegraphs and of the Currency Commission, and has substituted a silver one. This is supplemented by news that orders have been issued for the casting of a million yen worth of silver coins, but of what denominations there is no information. Altogether the telegram suggests that its senders regard a sudden change of standard by a great Empire in the light of a very trivial feat, but it will probably turn out that the whole story requires radical recasting.

Intelligence comes that Viceroy Shih has sent a company of troops to guard the Penhsifu coal-mine, but in the immediate context of this statement the wire records that, early in the evening of the 6th instant, a party of bandits broke into the Japanese quarters in the town of Tiehling, and raided the shop of a pawnbroker named Kimura, murdering his wife and escaping with considerable booty.

The advocates of the immediate opening of a national assembly are said to have derived much hope from the fact that Prince Su received their petition. But when it is remembered that the seventeen bearers of the petition had planted themselves in a group before the gate of the Prince Regent's palace and announced their intention of camping there until their cause obtained a hearing, it does not seem that any final importance attaches to Prince Su's act.

On the morning of the 9th instant the gentlemen of the United States commercial tourist party, 25 in all, were received in audience by the Prince Imperial. The ladies of the party will doubtless be received by the Princess at a later date.

The powder magazine at Paoting fu, the capital of Pehchili, exploded on the 7th instant, causing considerable damage to property, killing 10 soldiers and civilians and wounding 20.

The British Government, it is stated, has formally addressed Peking in the sense that without better railway communications it is impossible to adjust the affairs of Tibet satisfactorily. China is therefore urged to lose no time in constructing a line from Szchuan to some convenient point in Tibet, and Downing Street is said to have taken the precaution of reminding the Chinese Government that should money be wanted for this line, the preference must be given to British capitalists under the treaty. It is easy to foresee how this representation will be received by the Rights-Recovery Party in China, by whom railways have come to be regarded as the most subtle instrument of aggression that the progress of civilization has suggested.

News comes from Mukden that 2 Chinese constables who were in the employ of the Japanese Consulate there, have been arrested by the German Consular Authorities. The telegram goes on to say that they were found to be in possession of a pistol, and from Chinese sources a rumour emanates that the 2 men were engaged in a plot for the assassination of Mr. Dernburg. Of course the latter part of the story may be regarded as a sensational addendum, but the whole message is sufficiently mysterious.

The arrival of Mr. Tang Shao yi in Peking was expected to take place on the 12th inst. Mr. Tang, as our readers probably know, is the new President of the Board of Posts and Telegraphs. His name appeared prominently among those of the officials reappointed on the occasion of the recent changes in the governmental machine, but for reasons variously explained his proceeding to the capital was deferred, and at one time people talked of his probable refusal to assume office. These rumours however are now contradicted by the fact arrival in Peking; and the public will watch with much interest his methods of dealing with the difficult problems that he will have to handle. One is the case of his name-sake, Mr. Tang, chief of the Chehkiang Railway Company, who was deprived of that office by the Government and whose cause has been taken up by the provincial assembly. Another problem is the Foreign Railway Loan. How this is to be solved in such a manner as to satisfy both sides, we are unable to conceive, and that Mr. Tang Shao-Yi has agreed to accept office with such difficulties confronting him speaks volumes for his courage.

A curious rumour comes from Changchun. The Chinese Local Authorities there are said to have proposed the imposition of a special tax on tradesmen of their own nationality dealing in Japanese goods purchased from Japanese merchants. Such a step would amount to emphatic discrimination against the resident Japanese tradesmen through whose hands the goods pass. It would in fact be construable solely as an attempt to eliminate the Japanese middle-man from Changchun. Naturally the Chinese merchants affected are not disposed to submit tamely. They held a meeting and adopted a resolution to protest vigorously. If the story be correct, which is certainly open to doubt, we should think that the protestants will have the full support of the Japanese Authorities, whose countrymen would be flagrantly discriminated against by such a procedure on the part of the Chinese Authorities.

JAPANESE EMIGRANTS IN BRAZIL.

Mr. Takemura, being the representative of an emigration company which bears his own name, can scarcely be credited with absolute impartiality in his remarks about such affairs. Nevertheless, when due account has been taken of that fact, there remains enough to be very encouraging in his story of the latest emigration movement to Brazil. It is well known that previous failures in this kind of enterprise were due mainly to defective selection of emigrants. Instead of choosing agriculturists solely, the emigration company indiscriminately received students, teachers, ex-constables and, in fact, anybody and everybody. The result was that a troublesome process of weeding out had to be done on the other side in the sequel of experience, and a large proportion of the emigrants become labourers on railways and in mines. The last batch of 900, who proceeded to Brazil by the Ryofun Maru, established a different record. They were all carefully selected farm hands, and they found immediate employment on the coffee plantations. It is observable that the Kumamoto emigrants were specially noted for good work, and regarded as models of industry and punctuality. Preparations are now being made to send another batch of 1,500 men next March, but the Government of Brazil is inclined to set limits to the extension of coffee planting, and to encourage the growing of rice and barley. Mr. Takemura mentions as typical the case of an emigrant named Hashiguchi, who was able to send home 280 yen in the first year of his work and 270 yen in the second. These large savings are explained by the fact the bye-products of the coffee plantations almost suffice for the support of the labourers.

KOREANS IN CHINA.

One of our Tokyo contemporaries makes a statement, for which it evidently claims exceptional credit, to the effect that the Japanese Government is disposed to surrender the right of consular jurisdiction in the case of Korean settlers in Manchuria provided that China, on her side, agrees to remove all restrictions upon the trade and residence of such settlers. It appears to us that this would be a sensible compromise. It is very questionable whether Japan, with her present establishment, could hope to exercise efficient consular jurisdiction over Koreans in every part of Manchuria. The same problem presented itself in a similar form 3 or 4 decades ago in Japan, when it was objected by the Japanese Government that freedom of foreign trade and travel in the interior of the Empire would entail danger of miscarriages of justice, owing to the limited scope and petty machinery of foreign consular jurisdiction. In fact, consular jurisdiction is intrinsically a narrow system which cannot be extended without involving expense out of proportion to its advantages. It becomes therefore an important question to determine whether the Koreans would not derive greater advantage by submitting to Chinese jurisdiction and obtaining freedom to settle where they please in Manchuria than they would derive from greatly restricted settlement plus the privilege of Japanese jurisdiction. We suspect that if the votes of the Koreans themselves could be taken, they would be in favour of the former plan, although it has not a few obvious disadvantages.

KEROSENE OIL.

The competition between the Standard and the Rising Sun Oil Companies is attracting more and more attention in Japan. It is true that a cheap illuminant is provided for the people, but on the other hand the domestic production of oil is seriously menaced. It will be remembered that when the tariff was presented to the Diet last session, a strong disposition manifested itself to increase the import duty, but the House of Representatives was finally persuaded that 50 per cent. import tax would constitute quite sufficient protection for the Japanese product. To-day, however, some critics are crying out that if an adequate import duty were levied, Japanese oil would not now be threatened with expulsion from the market. For our own part we find this outcry somewhat hysterical. The competition between the foreign companies must be ephemeral after all. Things will soon return to their normal groove, and it really is difficult to think that any industry deserves greater encouragement than a discrimination of 50 per cent.

THE REVOLUTION IN PORTUGAL.

The following telegrams were published by the Foreign Office in Tokyo on the 8th instant, the first being from Mr. Arakawa, Japanese Representative in Madrid, and the second from Mr. Kato, Japanese Ambassador in London.

I.

"According to the report about the state of affairs in Lisbon, published by the Spanish Prime Minister, which is based on wireless and other messages from various quarters, the outbreak of the revolutionary disturbance seems to have been quickened by the murder of a revolutionary leader, Dr. Bombarda, a noted alienist and Republican representative, who was killed by a military lieutenant, one of his patients. The revolutionary rising took place at half past one on the morning of the 3rd inst., on a signal of twenty-one guns. The Gendarmerie and police force not proving equal to the revolutionaries, the troops were mobilized and severe fighting ensued. The Revolutionists used explosives. After a short time a part of the troops joined the revolutionaries, and three warships lying in the harbour followed their example commencing a bombardment. The Revolutionaries occupied the barracks in the neighbourhood of the Palace that day and attacked it. King Manuel was prevailed on by court officials to take refuge and left the Palace accompanied by several Ministers of State. The Revolutionary forces are under the control of military and naval officers. King Manuel is said to still have sixteen battalions. On the afternoon of the 5th inst. the Republicans proclaimed the Republican Government and a new cabinet was organized with Senor Braga as its head. According to a wireless message from the Infante Alfonso, His Highness is on board the royal yacht Amelia with the Queen Dowager. Nothing is reported about King Manuel, but he is thought to be also on board the royal yacht. Two British and two Italian and Spanish warships are now lying in the harbour."

II.

"According to the official report to the British Foreign Office the revolutionary disturbances in Lisbon commenced on the evening of the 3rd inst. The troops gradually joined the Revolutionists and on the morning of the 5th they proclaimed the Republic and formed a temporary government. According to Reuter telegrams the new Government recommended Senor Braga as President and also nominated new Ministers of the various departments, the Governor of Lisbon and also prefectural governors. The direct motive of the outbreak is ascribed to the assassination of the Republican leader Bombarda, but the principal cause is supposed to be complaints about and dissatisfaction with the policy of the royal regime. The whereabouts of King Manuel was at a time reported to be uncertain, but it is now officially reported that the King sailed for Gibraltar on board the royal yacht with the Queen Dowager, the Infante Alfonso and other members of the royal family and landed there on the night of the 6th. The Portuguese Navy and the troops in Lisbon, appear to have joined the Republicans, but nothing certain is known about the condition of troops in the provinces and the populace. The Government, though it thought that the outbreak of a revolution, would be unavoidable sooner or later, did not expect that it would occur so soon. It is said that no effective preventive measures could be taken as the great majority of the Lisbon troops had joined the revolutionaries. The new Republican Government seems to be making efforts to protect the life and property of foreigners in Lisbon. The powers are taking the attitude of bystanders."

According to telegrams received by the Hochi Shimbun, the numbers of lives lost in the revolution is 1,000 and the number of wounded 3,500.

It is said that the announcement made by the new Government in Portugal reached the Japanese Government on the 7th instant, but no answer recognising the new Government has been made yet.

It is stated in Tokyo that the new Portuguese Republican Government has officially addressed Japan asking that the Portuguese Chargé d'Affaires in this country should be recognised as Minister Plenipotentiary. This application is a little embarrassing. Japan has not the slightest sentiment one way or the other with regard to the outcome of the present revolution in Portugal, but she cannot well take the lead of other countries by assenting to a proposal which would amount to open recognition of the Lisbon Republic. Her evidently wisest plan is to rest quietly on her oars until the current of opinion is plainly directed by the Occidental Powers which have the most substantial interests at stake. One Tokyo journal suggests that Japan cannot do better in this business than follow England's example.

THE CABINET.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun seems to have constituted itself a player of the Cabinets' death dirge. It harps upon the two strings of tariff reform and financial adjustment. In treating these matters our contemporary does not appear to display its usual perspicacity. Its argument with regard to the tariff is that if the Cabinet took the nation frankly into its confidence, the people would not hesitate to sacrifice the increased customs dues on the altar of the Anglo Japanese Alliance. But surely that is a vapid utterance: How can the Cabinet take the people into its confidence on such a subject, and how could the people signify their willingness to make the above sacrifice? The Diet is the only recognised machinery for such an interchange of ideas, and as the Diet will meet now in a few weeks, sober-minded men will be disposed to possess their soul in patience for that brief period. Besides, the Government is bound to exchange views with Great Britain and the other Powers in the fullest manner before dreaming of making any explicit declaration. The Nichi Nichi has joined the Jiji as an advocate of more liberal tariff treatment for England, but it diverges from its distinguished contemporary's route when it challenges the Cabinet to make premature statements. As to the adjustment of the national finances, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun is evidently of the opinion that the sums now devoted to the redemption of the State debts should be employed for reducing taxation. It holds that in all this matter the Cabinet has been made a tool by interested financiers, who now recognise their mistake but dare not venture either to correct or to confess it. Doubtless among the masses of the people many will be found to endorse the policy of reduced taxation in preference to that of debt-redemption, and we should not be surprised if, under the goad of further journalistic urging, this view obtained sufficient currency to embarrass the Ministry. But we venture to allege that no thoughtful person will deny the expediency of Japan paying off her debts as fast as ever her strength permits. She is practically a not-independent State so long as her feet are shackled by a weight of foreign gold.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

There continues to be a great deal of talk about the Tokyo railway and its failure to complete its suburban lines within the fixed period. We notice, however, that not one solitary publicist undertaking to discuss this question makes the remotest reference to the cardinal question, namely, that of fare. So long as the citizens of Tokyo insist on limiting the fare to a figure at which suburban lines cannot possibly pay, it is extravagant to suppose that any company will build such lines. No such arbitrary restriction of fare was contemplated at the time of granting the charter and the fact merits prime attention at this juncture.

The question of municipalising the Tokyo railway is again upon the tapis, but he would be indeed a bold man who would venture to predict the outcome. Meanwhile the point calling for immediate consideration is the Company's failure to complete its suburban lines within the period fixed by the charter. The Company is understood to claim that it has been prevented from carrying out the stipulation by force majeure, namely, the city's failure to carry out its programme of improvement in the matter of widening the streets. It is journalistically pointed out, however, that this excuse cannot be considered valid, inasmuch as the widening of the streets has been actually effected in over 20 cases, but the extension of the railway in those localities still remains to be undertaken. An interview between Mr. Kawada, representing the directors, on the one hand, and the Governor of Tokyo, on the other, is said to have disclosed the latter's unwillingness to recognise the plea of force majeure, but at the same time his Excellency is said to have expressed the opinion that the Company's application for an extension of time must be granted.

RAILWAY JUNCTION IN ASIA.

The negotiations which have been going on for some time in St. Petersburg with regard to the linking of the Russian and Japanese railway services in Asia are said to have been brought within measurable distance of satisfactory settlement. An agreement with reference to the carriage of passengers was concluded some time ago, but the much more difficult question of goods transport remained to be discussed. This has now been practically solved, each side making large concessions. The programme is said to be that the service is divided into 2 sections, one comprising all the lines westward of Manjuri; the other, all the lines east of that point. No difficulty presented itself in dealing with the first section, but such was by no means the case with regard to the second. Here many conflicting interests had to be reconciled. The Russians for example wanted to make the railway feed Vladivostok principally, whereas the Japanese desired that it should benefit Dairen mainly. Then there was the question of competition between the steamers of the Osaka Shosen Kaisha and those of the Russian Volunteer Fleet. Apparently these perplexities have been overcome, for it is expected that the convention will be signed in a few days. Meanwhile much satisfaction is said to have been given by the action of the Japanese Railway Authorities in reducing the rates of freights on food stuffs carried southward from Harbin.

There is intelligence that the first part of the Convention with regard to the linking of the trans-Asian railways was signed in St. Petersburg on the 10th instant, and the remaining portion is expected to be signed next spring. The part concluded relates to the section which includes Harbin and Northern Manchuria.

THE TIMES.

Tokyo continues to be the scene of frequent burglaries, and publicists are busily discussing the causes of this phenomenon. One Tokyo newspaper, the Nippon, writes in a very pessimistic strain. It lays the whole blame at the Government's door. According to official statements the evil time has passed and an era of prosperity is beginning to dawn. In proof of this assertion attention is directed to the fact that the sums pledged on account of new industrial purposes or the extension of old have aggregated 300 million yen since the beginning of the year, and the amount of capital actually subscribed for these enterprises has been 80 millions. Our contemporary insists, however, that this record is not to be read in a favourable sense. The true explanation is that money has been cheapened by Government action in liberating large sums of the national debt, the consequence being that capitalists have been induced to invest in undertakings of a not too promising character. Proofs are visible on every side that business stagnation and depression are the order of the day. Thus a member of the Nippon's staff, having travelled by electric tram from Shinagawa to Ueno, that is to say, having passed along the principal thoroughfare of the city, counted no less than 126 houses of better-class merchants, all marked to let or for sale. If this is the case in the principal thoroughfare, one can conceive the conditions that prevail in the bye-streets. The whole trouble, in the Nippon's opinion, is to be found in excessive taxation. Unable to pay business tax and income tax, merchants are constrained to go out of trade. This argument is not confined to the Nippon, as our readers will have gathered from what has already appeared in these columns.

A CRIMINAL CASE.

Japan appears to have established a unique record in penal jurisprudence. Her law-courts have just concluded the trial of a criminal case in which the corpus vile was a portion of tobacco valued as 7 rin; that is to say, the seventeenth part of a farthing. The peculator was a man who had reached his 63rd year and the prosecution was at the instance of the Tobacco Monopoly Bureau. Whether the immoral veteran secreted a cigarette or made away with a pinch of tobacco in leaf form, the published accounts do not clearly indicate. These details are obscured by the salient fact that such an infinitesimally small larceny was actually carried from a court of first instance to an appeal court and finally to the Court of Cassation. The primary tribunal rejected the case, though a public procurator had been found to take it up. To the judges of the local court of Tochigi Prefecture, a theft of 7 rin seemed unworthy of cognizance. But the bench of the court of appeal to which the public procurator insisted on carrying the accusation, thought differently. After careful deliberation, they pronounced the culprit guilty and fined him 10 yen—a fine of a sovereign for a theft of less than a farthing! The old man was not content. He had means to reach the Court of Cassation, and the final sequel is confirmation of the judgment of the court of first instance and cancellation of that of the appeal court. The reason assigned by the high tribunal was that a quantity of tobacco valued at 7/10th of a farthing does not amount to a cognisable object in the eyes of the law. Stated in the learned phraseology of these judicial luminaries, the point seems convincing enough, but one is constrained to conjecture where the limit is to be fixed and what intrinsic value constitutes a mono in the eyes of the law. The old saying recalls itself, "it is a sin to steal a pin."

FOULING THEIR OWN NEST.

We are obliged to confess that certain Japanese newspapers and news agencies seem to have no scruple whatever in smirching the fair name of their own country. The pettiest object seems sufficient in their eyes to warrant the circulation of libels, which, if they were credited, would sink Japan to a very low depth of depravity. The latest of these disgraceful stories is put into circulation with reference to Mr. Ozaki Yukio. It is alleged that the expense of his visit to Europe, namely 12,000 yen, was defrayed by a syndicate interested in raising a foreign loan for the city of Tokyo, which loan was to be applied to the purchase of the Tokyo Railway. Now apart from the fact that Mr. Ozaki Yukio has served his country for half a century with absolutely spotless hands, there is the corollary that the expenses of his visit to Europe as Mayor of Tokyo were defrayed by the Municipality, and the apparent smallness of the grant made for the purpose was commented on by the press at the time. That Mr. Ozaki's presence in Europe—where his high reputation is happily above the reach of miserable defamation by his own countrymen—should be utilised for the benefit of the city of Tokyo and that his well-known character should enhance the chances of success in such a negotiation, are natural enough. But that his action should be perverted as it is by certain Tokyo journals shows, not that his motives are open to criticism, but that his critics read into his conduct the sentiments by which alone they themselves are influenced in the transactions of daily life. These slanderers are their country's worst enemies, and we are constrained to say distinctly that Japan is suffering severely at the hands of her own journalists.

A COTTON-GROWING COMPANY.

We are not at all surprised to learn that a big company is in process of formation for the purpose of growing cotton in Chosen. Recently published official documents show that on an area of land measuring from 3,500 to 3,700 acres, cotton has been grown by the Experimental Farm to the value of nearly 1½ million yen. It has always been alleged by nominally competent judges that the soil and climate of southern Korea are eminently adapted for cotton-growing, and that if a little vim were put into this enterprise, the cotton-spinning mills of Japan might easily be supplied from Chosen alone without any recourse to Bombay or the United States. The projectors of the new company are all men tolerably well known in the business world and connected, for the most part, with the spinning industry in Japan. They put their capital at 20 million yen and they talk of growing cotton over an area of 450,000 acres, thus obtaining a crop which they estimate at from 30 to 35 million yen per annum. They propose to ask the Government for State aid of the same character as that given to sugar in Formosa,

TOKYO GAS QUESTION.

The Niroku Shimpō published on the 7th instant the 6th of a series of articles attacking the Chiyoda Gas Company and denouncing it as a mere castle in the air. The most notable count of the Niroku's accusation is that whereas the Chiyoda Directors claim to have acquired a suitable plot of land measuring 13,000 tsubo, they are unable to indicate the locality of this property. All their promises are said to be mere talk, and the chances of their scheme materializing are dismissed as evanescent.

The principal share-holders of the Tokyo Gas Company have held a meeting in Tokyo and have emphatically decided that no compromise shall be effected with the Chiyoda Company. These men evidently consider that a company which undertakes to supply gas less than a year hence, and which does not yet possess even a site for its plant, cannot be regarded seriously. They condemn the tendency shown by Baron Shibusawa and others to listen to terms of compromise, and they are in favour of letting the Chiyoda folks severely alone. Meanwhile the Niroku Shimpō continues its series of articles attacking the Chiyoda. From the minuteness of the details there can be no question that the Niroku's information is furnished by responsible persons.

NEWSPAPERS IN SEOUL.

An anonymous traveller, who has just returned from Chosen to Moji, is quoted by the Chuo Shimbun as attributing to the Governor-General the design of subjecting newspapers in Korea to continued censorship even after the completion of amalgamation. His Excellency is also credited with having determined to exercise over all news agencies the same supervision as that to which newspapers are submitted. This may be a mere rumour, but on the other hand it may be correct. We find it quite conceivable that even though the Governor-General were not a military man, he has conceived a not exaggerated idea of the mischief that can be wrought by newspapers when freedom of speech is perverted into licence. The fact that amalgamation was effected with a degree of smoothness and peacefulness which could not reasonably have been expected is perhaps attributable in some measure to the surveillance exercised over the press from the time of Viscount Terauchi's appearance upon the scene. The Viscount was Minister of State for War in 1905-6, and the experiences that he garnered on that occasion may have stood him in useful stead at this historical crisis in Chosen.

THE CONSULAR QUESTION IN KWANTUNG.

Some months ago a troublesome question arose in connection with the degree of authority exercisable by the Governor-General of the Leased Territory in Manchuria over the Japanese Consuls in this district. Viscount Oshima insisted that the Consuls must receive their instructions direct from him, if due coöperation was to be secured between the discharge of their functions and the exercise of the Governor-General's authority. To this the Foreign Office in Tokyo was represented as replying that it could not possibly sanction such a delegation of an important part of its duties to a third party, and the Governor-General thereupon tendered his resignation. The difficulty was solved in a somewhat superficial manner by investing the Consuls with ex officio functions under the Governor-General, by which device they became in some nominal degree subject to the latter's authority. But we gather from our Japanese contemporaries that this temporising method has not been successful. Troubles have again risen owing to a conflict of authority, and it is expected that the problem will be brought before the Diet in its next session.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, October 7.

There is nothing special to note with regard to the events on the 7th instant. No restoration of confidence is yet apparent.

Saturday, October 8.

A depressed feeling still prevails, mainly owing to doubts about the harvest.

Monday, October 10.

The market was sharply depressed yesterday by the publication of an official announcement that the Treasury will float 5-per-cent. bonds for the purposes of the Salt Monopoly, thus abandoning the 4-per-cent. basis.

Tuesday, October 11.

The feeling in the forenoon showed some slight improvement, but depression re-asserted itself in the afternoon, and prices closed on the downward grade.

Wednesday, October 12.

The feeling yesterday was depressed but some improvement took place at the close of the afternoon session.

Thursday, October 13.

There was an improvement in the forenoon yesterday, but depression re-asserted itself in the afternoon, and the Stock Exchange shares, which had risen two points, fell four, thus closing 2 points below the figure on the 12th. We append the quotations for December delivery:—

THE TWO LOANS.

Japanese capitalists are in the position of being invited to subscribe for 2 loans simultaneously. One of these amounts to 15 million yen and takes the form of debentures of the Hypothec Bank. The interest is 5 per cent. the net price 98 yen and the period of redemption 25 years. The other loan amounts to 10 millions and is in the shape of debentures of the steel foundry. Here too the rate of interest is 5 per cent., but the price of the bonds is only 95 and the period of redemption 20 years. It is said that capitalists welcome both loans with equal pleasure in view of the plentifulness of money seeking investment. It is true that the debentures of the Hypothec Bank are practically a State debt, but, on the other hand, the debentures of the Seikosho are secured by a lien upon the whole of that Company's property, which represents fully 17 millions. It is thought therefore that both loans will be eagerly subscribed.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

We read in the Kokumin Shimbum a statement, apparently founded on good authority, to the effect that President Taft has decided to ask Congress to grant a subsidy for the encouragement of navigation, and that the Presidential message which is to accompany the bill has already been drafted. The President points out that the total sums granted by the various countries of the world in the shape of steamship subsidies amount to 70 million yen in round numbers per annum, and that the United States is conspicuous by its abstention from this policy. Japan on the contrary, America's greatest commercial rival on the Pacific, is exceptionally liberal in the matter of shipping aids. When the Panama Canal is opened, United States manufactures will find a great market in South America as well as in the Orient, and steps must be taken without delay to equip the country with the means of entering that market. The President does not advise any large measure of liberality at the outset, his idea being that the first step in this direction should be of a conservative, and tentative nature.

We read in the Kokumin Shimbum that the Chief of Police in Tokyo has been interesting himself in the number of electric cars run by the Tokyo Railway Company. Some time ago, he ordered that the number must not be less than 680, and although the Company pleaded that the recent floods had resulted in a considerable decrease of its conductors and motor-men, the Chief of Police, finding that the number of cars actually plying was 20 short of 680, imposed a fine of 19 yen. The cars now running total 730, but they are still crowded to overflowing in the morning and evening, and many people are delayed for a long time awaiting transit. The Chief of Police is said to have again ordered that additional cars shall be provided for morning and evening service, and we presume that the Company will have to obey. It is a little strange, however, that the Chief of Police should be invested with this arbitrary power. To talk of extra cars in the morning and evening is easy enough, but in practice one extra car, whether in the morning or the evening, is practically extra for the whole day, and the Chief of Police thus has it in his power to create an intolerable system for the Company.

We are not surprised to find that the authorities of the Railway Board deny the plan attributed to them, namely, to proceed at once with the changing of the gauge on the State railways already constructed, and to leave future constructions to private enterprise which will be permitted to employ light lines. It is pointed out that to change the narrow to the standard gauge between Tokyo and Shimonoseki alone would cost 200 million yen, a sum altogether in excess of the Government financial ability. Moreover, there are lines calling for construction without delay, and to sacrifice these on the alter of the gauge would be very bad policy.

It is alleged that a company founded by Mr. Fukuzawa Momosuke and others, has applied for a charter to construct an underground electric tramway 3 miles long between Kudan and Meijiro. These projectors were recently credited with a much larger scheme than the above of the same nature, but they appear to have drawn in their horns and to be inclined to content themselves with a small enterprise. Tokyo journals do not speak in a hopeful tone of the programme. They hint rather that the interests of the projectors are limited to the sale of share-rights.

It is stated that the affairs of this well-known broker give promise of satisfactory adjustment. His debts amount to 600,000 yen, but, on the other hand, he has considerable assets which have not yet been hypothecated. Moreover his fellow-brokers are inclined to assist him, and altogether a satisfactory settlement is likely to be reached.

On the 7th instant Dr. Tsumaki, the civil engineer charged with the duty of examining the proposed sites for the new Houses of the Diet, presented his report to the especial committee of the two Chambers. The report was in favour of the original position in Nagatacho, namely the ground now occupied by the Basei-kyoku, the Privy Council and other buildings in that neighbourhood. It will be remembered that the presentation of this report had been deferred for the purpose of completing certain investigations as to the nature of the sub-soil. These have now been concluded with the above result. It is not to be inferred however that the work of erecting the Houses will commence immediately. On the contrary we deem it not improbable that the heavy expenses incurred in connection with the annexation of Korea, and the extraordinary grants that will have to be made on account of the recent floods may induce the Government to postpone an outlay of several million yen on a work which can very well afford to wait a few years.

In consequence of the extraordinary prevalence of burglaries in Tokyo, the Chief of Police on the 7th instant made an exceptional call upon the metropolitan constables, so that 4,700 of them were parading the streets until 5 a.m. on the 8th. This sudden move appears to have taken the burglars by surprise: over 70 of them were arrested, some on suspicion and others in the very act of committing the crime. Tokyo newspapers have a great deal to say upon this subject, but the gist of it is that the exceptional prevalence of crime is due mainly to distress consequent upon the inundations during the Autumn. One or two journals are disposed to insist that the weight of taxation is chiefly responsible, but considering that the taxes today are practically what they were 5 years ago, it is difficult to endorse that theory.

The Japanese metropolis is at present pervaded by something like an epidemic of burglaries with violence. The season of transition from autumn to winter is always marked by an increase of theft, but the crime generally takes the form of larceny (setto), whereas this year robbery with violence (gōto) has become the habit. Not in one quarter of the city only, but from practically all directions, comes intelligence of this kind of crime, and while the police are accused of want of vigilance, there is also a disposition to lay the blame on the new law. Under the old Penal Code 7 years was the longest term of imprisonment for larceny, but it has been extended to 15 by the amended code, and the idea is that burglars now think that they may as well be killed for a sheep as for a goat.

The returns compiled by the Bank of Japan show that out of 56 staples 22 remained stationary in price during September as compared with August; 23 appreciated, and 11 depreciated. The final account is that there was an average rise of 0.99 per cent. The principal appreciation took place in articles of daily consumption, as rice, barley, textile fabrics, fish and so forth.

We read in the Chuo Shimbun that the negotiations for a South Manchuria Railway loan have been suspended. The Directors of the railway are unwilling to pay more than 4.5 or 4.6 interest whereas English capitalists will not take less than 5 per cent. The total amount of the loan is 60 million yen, but as only 55 millions would actually come into the hands of the railway Board, and as 20 millions would have to be appropriated to paying off the previous debt, only 35 millions would be available for the work of construction. It is certainly a most unfavourable time for loan floating just at present in Europe. In Germany and Austria the conditions suggest something like a panic, and in London a further rise of the Bank-rate is anticipated.

It has been decided that the cable from Fusan to Tsushima shall be transferred from the Great Northern Telegraph Company to the Japanese Government. The Company's charter expires in 1914, and the Directors are said not to have thought it worth while to reject the overtures made by Japan in view of the shortness of the remaining period. The Kokumin Shimbun says that the Netherland's Minister has been instrumental in arranging this affair, and that the price paid by Japan has been based on the profits which would have accrued during the remaining 4 years of the Company's charter. This will be followed immediately by the laying of a direct cable between Shimonoseki and Fusan.

There is something akin to a feeling of consternation in the sugar market at present. The world's consumption of this staple is 6 and a half million tons (beet-root sugar), but the available supply last year was 200,000 tons short of that figure, and there resulted a marked increase of price, so that in May of the current year the quotation was nearly 15 shillings. It then became known that the crop for 1910 would be a bumper, totaling probably from seven to seven and a quarter million tons. The result was that holders began to unload with precipitancy, and 2 or 3 days ago the price had fallen to the neighbourhood of 10 shillings. A panic threatens.

A vigorous movement has been inaugurated by the Osaka Police Authorities against 6 petty banks which have their head-offices in Tokyo, with one exception, and whose field of principal operations is Osaka. The exception is the Imperial Trust Company (Teikoku Shintaku Kwaisha) and the 5 Tokyo banks are the Fudō Chokin Ginko, the Kyodo Ginko, the Kigyo Ginko, the Toyotama Ginko and the Azuma Ginko. These institutions combine a system of lotteries with ordinary banking business their main object being to attract deposits by people of small means. In Osaka all their principal officials have been actually placed under arrest, and the general impression seems to be that the police have taken a very wholesome course.

We gather from a note in the Asahi Shimbun that Tsingtau in Shantung has become a sort of incidental arena for coal competition. In the first place it is the natural emporium of the Weishen coal mined by the Germans. Then suddenly at a recent date the Mitsui Company placed upon the market a quantity of the Fushun mineral, which, while possessing higher calorific qualities, was offered at the same price. To these rivals was added coal from Kyushu imported by the Germans, but nothing is said as to the comparative qualities of the latter.

It is announced by the Oriental Development Company that its first Colonization movement will commence next month, as an exceptional measure. In future the conditions of colonization will be announced in February every year; the applications will be received up to June of the same year and the selections will be announced in August. This year, however, the above dates will be neglected. Our readers will remember that the Korean Court, in becoming a shareholder of the Toyo Takushoku Kaisha paid for its shares in land not in money. It is for the purpose of reclaiming and colonizing this land that the Company is now taking the above measures.

The municipality of Tokyo has decided that the land of Shibaura, the reclamation of which has involved an expenditure of 18 yen per tsubo, shall be sold at a minimum of 36 yen. Even after full space has been appropriated for road making this will leave a profit of from 600,000 to 700,000 yen. There is some talk of putting up the land to competitive tender, in which case it will probably sell for more than 36 yen a tsubo. People are asking what the Chiyoda Gas Company will do in that case since the Directors count on sixteen or seventeen thousand tsubo for a site at Shibaura.

According to the Nippon the Cement Companies of Japan are in a very bad way. The prices ruling in the market do not pay even the cost of production. It appears that Japanese manufacturers use old-fashioned machines the products of which are incapable of competing with those of machinery employed abroad. On the other hand to instal good machinery would involve an outlay which the share-holders are not prepared to make.

Mr. O'Brien, the American Ambassador, instead of spending his annual leave in China and the Philippines as he had intended, has decided to avail himself of permission he has received, to spend his leave in the United States. The Ambassador and Mrs. O'Brien expect to sail by the Empress of Japan for Vancouver on the 18th instant. They are planning to return by the Siberia on December 16th.

Japanese journals state that a company has practically been formed for building an electric railway from Hiratsuka via Hachioji to Takasaki in Gumma prefecture. The company is composed of Englishmen and Japanese, the principal among the former being Mr. W. P. Macnaughten and Mr. A. W.

Cowen, while among the Japanese we observe Mr. Takagi Masayoshi, Mr. Sato Ko chiro and Mr. Ishikuro Ken. We cannot say that these Japanese names inspire great confidence, but everything must have a beginning. The capital of the Company is put at 10 million yen and is to be obtained entirely in England. Electric lighting is to be a part of the enterprise.

Two centres of depression are approaching the main island, one from the direction of Oshima (Satsuma), the other from the north-west of Riukyu.

We read in the Tokyo papers that the directors of the Hoden Oil Company have suddenly changed their tone and refused to recognise any responsibility in connection with the tank-steamers! It was thought for some time that, owing to the intervention of Baron Shibusawa and others, the Hoden Company would acknowledge its indebtedness, and on that supposition negotiations were opened. But at the eleventh hour the Hoden directors have developed an obstinate mood, so the Toyo Company is said to have presented a definite demand for payment by a fixed date. Failing compliance with this demand, the law will be appealed to. The amount in question is 3,400,000 yen, and the Hoden Company is said to be without the means of meeting such an obligation, even if ordered by the law courts to do so. The curious feature of the affair is that Mr. Asano is a director of both companies.

It is reported from Vladivostock that the measures taken by the Russian Authorities to suppress the anti-Japanese element are of the most drastic character. The regular police and the detective force are exercising the greatest possible vigilance, and any one against whom proof of anti-Japanese designs is obtained, finds himself immediately under arrest. Even the Japanese Consul has a guard of Russian constables attached to his person by the local authorities. In these circumstances the anti-Japanese element finds itself deprived of all opportunity, and its leaders are perforce obliged to abandon their designs or leave Vladivostock.

We observe that the formation of a Japanese rubber Company has been practically decided. The principal projector is Baron Sonoda (Anken) formerly Governor of Hokkaido and Chief of Police in Tokyo. The capital is 1,200,000 yen, and two-thirds of the total is put up by the projectors. The programme of the Company is not only to plant rubber but also to import it in a finished and in an unfinished state, and to manufacture it in this country. The proposed plantations are to be in the South Sea Islands.

A telegram received at the Naval Department says that the Ikoma arrived at Singapore on the 12th instant.

THE UPHEAVAL IN PORTUGAL.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 8.)

IF the somewhat conflicting reports which have come over the wires during the past two days are to be accepted without reserve, Portugal has passed with dramatic suddenness from the monarchical to the republican state. A few hours seems to have sufficed to effect the profoundest change the government of a nation can undergo. The revolution may be said to have been born during the night of Monday, the 3rd instant—one telegram puts the hour at 1.30 a.m. on the 4th,—when serious disturbances broke out in the most beautifully situated of Europe's capitals. At eight o'clock on the following morning, according to Reuter, the garrison troops, upon whom in ordinary circumstances would have fallen the duty of suppressing the disturbances, drew up in the principal square of the city and went over en masse to the Republican side, "amid the cheers of the populace." Simultaneously the Navy—which consists, in the main, of some half-dozen small cruisers—showed no hesitation in following the example of the Army, and turned its guns on the Palace, where apparently some resistance was offered to the insurgents by the Palace Guards. The police were mobilized, but were driven back by the populace, who had provided themselves with bombs. Desperate fighting ensued throughout that day (Tuesday) and the succeeding night, the artillery and rifle fire being described as incessant. At four in the afternoon, presumably of the 5th, the Republican flag, hoisted over the Arsenal and the Townhall, was saluted with a salvo from the fleet, and a similar honour was accorded to Senhor BRAGA, whom the provisional government had elected president. The insurgent leader, whose name the telegraph gives as EUSEBIO LEDO, made a reassuring speech to the citizens from the balcony of the Townhall, and there seems to have been a conspicuous absence of looting. On the whole, however, the Royalists,—like the outside world—appear to have been taken somewhat by surprise. The plans of the revolutionary party were evidently laid with uncommon skill and secrecy, so that the news of the upheaval probably came as unexpectedly to the nations as the sound of the first shots to the ears of the Royalists. No organized opposition seems to have been offered to the flood of revolution by which a kingdom of nearly a thousand years' standing has been swept away. As to the fate of the young Monarch, who little more than two years ago succeeded his murdered father on the throne, speculation is rife. One report represents him as present in the Palace during its bombardment by the insurgent fleet; another places him at Cintra, 15 miles west of Lisbon by rail; another again at Mafra, which lies a similar distance to the north. As both of these are inland towns, these rumours as to King MANUEL's retreat are inconsistent with the announcements that the Monarch has taken refuge on a British warship and is already en route to England; or that a Brazilian warship is conveying him across the Atlantic to Sao Paulo. Later telegrams describe the King as having left the Palace during the night of the 4th "for a place of safety." Certainly, if it was the policy of the loyalists to keep the whereabouts of their Sovereign a mystery, they have succeeded admirably. At all events, it would seem clear that King MANUEL, recognizing the hopelessness of resistance, has abdicated the throne of the Braganzas. It can hardly be denied that the unpopularity of the Monarchy, which was probably the predisposing cause of the assassination of DON CARLOS and his eldest son on February 1st, 1908, has increased rather than diminished since that fatal day. The fact that some thousands of armed peasants played an active part in the stirring events of the week must be accepted as evidence that the anti-dynastic movement was of national dimensions. The corruption prevailing in official and political circles, which the young King was either too weak or too indifferent to check, appears to have been largely instrumental in moving popular discontent to the point of rebellion. So far as we are aware, history does not show that corruption in the official world flourishes less under a Republican than under a Monarchical form of Government—rather, we fancy, the reverse; nevertheless, the present revolution seems to have been provoked by mingled dislike of the Monarchy, as such, and indignation at the political incompetence which has gathered about it.

With regard to the possible effects of the revolution, we must await more explicit information both as to the aims of the insurgents and the policy of those whom they have driven from power. On this latter score there has been a singular dearth of news for some time past, a circumstance which warrants the belief that a rigorous censorship of the Press has been in vogue. All that the outside world has been permitted to know is that King MANUEL, in opening the new session of the Cortez on the 23 ult., announced "the firm resolve of the Cabinet to carry out the Liberal programme, and to enforce the laws for the regulation of the religious associations." From this meagre intelligence it may be inferred that the agitators on behalf of the Church have had a hand in the fomenting of the revolt, or that, at least, their withdrawal of support from the present régime has provided the Republicans with a long-sought opportunity. If this be the case, the situation is not without danger for the Liberal Ministry of Senhor MORENA at Madrid, and for the person of King ALFONSO himself. In the meanwhile, and pending the receipt of further information, it may safely be assumed that the traditional friendship of England for the Royal House of Portugal will lead her to extend both to the nation and its deposed King such offices of goodwill as the circumstances may suggest.

"THE FIRST PRESIDENT OF THE WORLD."

THE astonishing hold which Mr. ROOSEVELT has acquired over the mind and imagination of the people of the United States is attested by the most cursory inspection of any American newspaper. Not only is the ex-President everywhere received with frantic enthusiasm, but he is made the subject of extravagant comparisons and prophecies, even in the more serious organs of opinion. Thus, one American magazine of sober repute suggests that Mr. ROOSEVELT "epitomizes in his own person the evolution of man from the mighty hunter of wild beasts down to the modern prophet of universal peace." This last attribute is magnificent, but hardly (in present circumstances) convincing. For the quondam Colonel of Roughriders—who, it may be said without disparagement, dearly loves a fight—seems to be in for a struggle of an anything but pacific character with a section of the American people which, if numerically small, is phenomenally powerful. Indeed, it may be said that the Nimrod of the African wilds has become, in his own country, a hunter of men. And we fancy that the slaughter of big game under the Equator will prove to have been an easier task than the hunting down of political "crooks" and "bosses;" and war with wild beasts in tropical deserts an altogether simpler affair than war with "trusts" in Wall Street. Mr. ROOSEVELT's enemies, of course, are men full of their own smallness—little tin gods on wheels of corruption; but the forces for which they stand are a power in America, and it is not for a moment to be supposed that the Lords of the Money Bag will yield without a struggle to the demands of an awakened national conscience. But if the task is big, so is the man. Not even the bitterest of the ex-President's foes, individual or corporate, can deny the force of his personality and the immensity of the influence which is his. If there is a man in the whole range of the civilized world to-day who can rid American political and municipal circles of their ingrained and apparently hereditary corruption, that man is Mr. ROOSEVELT. It has been the custom among American caricaturists to represent the ex-President, in his pursuit of clean government, as provided with a big stick. It would be more apposite to picture him as armed with a besom. There is much dirt about the colossal structure of American public life—and by no means in the corners only; and it will need all the powers of this modern Hercules, and the very biggest broom available, to do all the cleaning required. But, at the same time, there is no reason why the estimates of Mr. ROOSEVELT's undoubtedly remarkable character should not be governed by moderation. An English review, not long since, took the people and press of its own country somewhat severely to task for attaching an exaggerated value to the capacities of a certain great general for whom the British Government at present has no use. If the encomiums bestowed on Lord KITCHENER were deemed extravagant, what is to be said of the wild eulogy which follows Mr. ROOSEVELT wherever he goes? We have before us a pamphlet of prophetic character, purporting to be a speech addressed, in the year of grace 1920, to the "Convention of the Federated Nations of the World," assembled at the Hague as the temporary Capital of the World, placing in nomination THEODORE ROOSEVELT as the first President of the World. The idea, of course, was suggested by the astonishing success of what has been called Mr. ROOSEVELT's recent Odyssey through Europe, "which surpassed the triumphal march of any Cæsar or any hero the world has ever seen or known of." The writer of the pamphlet, who retrospectively declares that "when, ten years ago, this man emerged from the wilderness of Africa, he already had the stamp of destiny on his brow," thus sets forth the claims of his nominee to the supreme post of first World-President:—

The "MAN OF THE HOUR," the man to whom the finger of Divine Fate points for this great responsibility is Theodore Roosevelt; Roosevelt the scholar, acquainted with lowly toil,—the statesman with all the genius of the combined politicians of the world—the Christian with toleration for every belief and every non-belief—the intellectual giant, and the consummate specimen of physical prowess—the polished and refined, yet the rough-rider and the "rough and ready"—the devoted head of a family, yet not swerved from duty by sentimentalism—the thinker, the doer, the warrior, the farmer, the mighty hunter—he is good enough to be a preacher, and is at home in a mining camp and with the cowboys. He is brave in every fibre of brain and body. He would dare martyrdom, but he is so resourceful, so many-sided, and so versatile that nobody on earth would dare throw down the martyrdom gauge. He is master of himself to such a superlative degree that he is the willing servant of all the other people of the world. Roosevelt represents and will foster the brotherhood of man and UNITED KINGDOM.

Not content with this impressive compendium of all Mr. ROOSEVELT's virtues, the intrepid pamphleteer compares his hero with CÆSAR, NAPOLEON, GEORGE WASHINGTON and ABRAHAM LINCOLN, to the disadvantage of these acknowledged giants among men, and incidentally extols the land of his birth by apostrophizing its administration as "the greatest achievement among attempted governments by human device." Now we have no hesitation in saying that we share, in large measure, the pamphleteer's admiration of Mr. ROOSEVELT—though we question whether, if invited to enumerate his virtues, we could make so exhaustive a catalogue; but when we are invited to endorse a claim for perfection on behalf of the government of the Great Republic, we must confess to a feeling of compunction. Mr. ROOSEVELT at this very moment is proclaiming to the world, both inferentially and categorically, the political wickedness of America. He has announced, in no uncertain terms, his determination to purge his country's government of its rottenness. Of course it will be urged that the pamphleteer's eulogy applies not to the government of the United States as it is now, but as it will be a decade hence. This involves the assumption that the expiration of that brief space of historical time will find the National Edifice empty of the seven devils of corruption, swept and garnished. If that be so, if indeed the Hero with the Big Stick—or rather, with the Besom—will have succeeded in sweeping out of office the myriad parasites of Mammon and their kinsmen, the descendants of Demas, then he most assuredly will have deserved—honoris causâ, if for no other reason—the first Presidency of the World. We await with interest the march of events leading up to that grand consummation.

FENIANISM UP TO DATE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 13.)

WHILE the American Hercules is engaged in "stumping" the Western and Southern States to secure the requisite amount of support for the new Republicanism of which he is so strenuous an exponent, the Irish Napoleon is "starring" the Eastern States on a dollar-raising expedition. Such at least may be inferred from the announcement that Mr. REDMOND has set his heart on extracting at least $100,000 from the well-lined pockets of his American friends to further the cause of what is euphemistically designated the "Home Rule campaign." The Nationalist leader, we venture to think, makes an excellent beggar, for he possesses, in a wonderful degree, the power of adapting himself to his audience. Of his facility in this respect he has given many instances nearer home than Philadelphia or New York. Before a Wexford audience, he has been known to roar in the true leonine fashion; but when the occasion demands, he "will roar you as gently as any sucking dove." Thus, when absorbed in the pursuit of vote-catching in the North of England, he is careful to present Nationalist claims in the most favourable light, and to avoid any suggestion that Home Rule is regarded by the bulk of his followers not as an end, but only as a means to an end. On such occasions, the Nationalist record is liberally whitewashed; and the aspirations of that pious and inoffensive association, the United Irish League, are represented as merely expressing the natural longing of a peaceable people for autonomous government in local affairs. Wherefore, at Barrow-in-Furness, Home Rule means

"the creation on Irish soil of an Irish Legislature with an Executive responsible to it, which will have control of all purely Irish affairs, such a Parliament being, of necessity, subject to the Imperial Parliament at Westminster." In Wexford, however, Home Rule has a different signification. Thus Mr. REDMOND, at New Ross, a few months ago:—"We to-day send this message to England. We tell her that we Wexfordmen to-day hate her rule just as bitterly as our forefathers did when they shed their blood on this spot. We tell her that we are as much rebels to her rule to-day as our forefathers were in '98." It may be remembered that when Mr. REDMOND last returned from America to his benighted countrymen, he assured them at Limerick that "he came as the representative of the principles for which ALLEN, LARKIN and O'BRIEN died." Now these men were known to be Fenians, and their "principles" involved complete separation from British rule, and the establishment of an independent Irish Republic. The creed of these men may be gathered from the oath which every Fenian used to take in the days of PARNELL, and in the spirit of which his successor works to-day:—

"I do solemnly swear that I will do my best to establish the national independence of Ireland, and I will bear true allegiance to the Supreme Council of the Irish Republican Brotherhood and Government of the Irish Republic and implicitly obey the Constitution of the Irish Republic and all my superior officers, and I will preserve inviolate the secrets of the Organization."

"None of us," said the man whose mantle has fallen upon Mr. REDMOND, "whether we are in America or in Ireland, will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England."

So much for the principles by which the Irish Nationalists—Separatists—is a preferable, because plainer, term—are actuated. What of their practice? Does it agree with those principles? We fancy that the most critical observer would find little difference between profession and performance in the creators of Irish unrest to-day. Under the feeble, semi-sympathetic administration of the present Liberal Government, which depends for its very life on Irish sufferance, crime flourishes—paid crime, artificially fostered crime, cruel and cowardly crime—in Ireland, north, south, east and west; and the Liberal Ostrich, in the person of the nominally responsible person, the Chief Secretary, sees it not. We even find Roman Catholic bishops and parish priests extending "cordial welcomes" to Fenian ex-criminals; and exhorting their parishioners, in their unswerving pursuit of "the goal," to adhere faithfully to the "the old methods." What these "old methods" are, anyone who possesses the most rudimentary knowledge of the history of agrarian crime in Ireland can well imagine for himself. Cattle-driving (in which Ministerial apologists profess to see no harm), boycotting, intimidation, pay-no-rent campaigns, persecution of Protestants are now reinforced by shooting outrages and malicious injury to property. We make two extracts from the Irish Times to illustrate the point:—

The Irish Attorney-General has once more afforded to the general public an opportunity of observing the entire futility of attempts to enforce the law, under the ordinary procedure, against Irish criminal conspirators. A number of persons, including a Nationalist member of Parliament, chairmen of local councils, solicitors, and officials of the United Irish League were recently brought before a bench of magistrates at Longford. The charge was one of boycotting, and no attempt was made to refute the evidence produced by the police. The majority of the local justices refused to send the case for trial before a jury. It is of course still open to the Attorney-General to bring the accused persons to trial either on his own motion or by having them returned by a resident magistrate. No one knows better than the Attorney-General that the chances of a verdict from an Irish jury in such circumstances are very shadowy indeed. The victory lies with the boycotters, who are thus stimulated to further outrages on their unfortunate victims, to whom the law affords no protection, and who have no course open to them but a life of terror or surrender of their lawful property at the bidding of the conspirators.

Serious shooting outrages continue to be reported from the counties of Clare and Galway. The impunity which the perpetrators of such crimes enjoy in these districts has emboldened the miscreants to an alarming extent, to open fire in broad daylight upon a man returning from his place of worship on a Sunday morning in full view of the congregation and within hearing of numbers of policemen. This certainly reaches the limit of audacity, and the perpetrators get off scot-free, for, owing to fear of sympathy with the criminals, no one will give evidence against them, and if they did, no jury would convict. The victim has his wounds dressed by the surgeon and takes the warning by surrendering his legal rights. The police are powerless either efficiently to protect threatened individuals or to vindicate the law where thus grossly outraged. . . . The Pistols Act, if it were in force in Ireland, would apply to these outrages, but there is now no restriction whatever on the use of firearms, and in the disturbed areas arms can be obtained and used for the worst purposes with absolute safety to the criminal.

Such is the fruit of the seed sown broadcast in the Distressful Isle by the foreign-paid emissaries of the United Irish League, not a few of whom, as members of the Imperial Parliament, have taken the oath of allegiance to the Sovereign of the United Kingdom. Meanwhile the trouble-makers are being urged to resort more and more to physical force as a means of securing the destruction of British rule in Ireland. We take the following incendiary appeal from a recent issue of the Gaelic American (the italics are our own):—

"The 'Force' that we Irish must cultivate—and it is the only force that can and will prevail in the end, is that which includes the Moral Force created by a Nation of Soldier Saints (sic) prepared to use every weapon that God has given them, strong to suffer and strong to wait, together with the 'Physical Force' which really is nothing more than a name for that privilege which is their inherited right, the right to die for Ireland on a field of battle. A 'Moral Force' movement, i.e., a movement that stops short of shedding blood, and therefore forbids you to make the last sacrifice—that of your life—cannot be taken very seriously, and must end in contempt and ridicule.

"Let every one of us realize that with outside trouble for England our chance will come, as it came before, and let us say to ourselves that with the help of God we can, and we will be ready to take it. . . . Let us also learn to understand and master the secret defences England has surrounded us with, also those that surround the British coast, so that we can have something to offer the invader of England in exchange for our freedom, and let us have a distinct foreign policy and be in touch more particularly with the nations likely to make war with England, and that no time may be lost. Above all, let every man or woman who dares, go out and preach to the people on these words of John Mitchel, 'Let the man among you who has no gun sell his garments and buy one.'

In this candid exhortation to the people of Ireland to cultivate the friendship of England's potential enemies, and to prepare to assist them when the day of battle comes, the Gaelic American unconsciously supplies the key to the whole situation, as it must appear to any Briton, whatever his political creed. Could any statesman, Unionist or Liberal, be so mad as to grant independence to an admittedly hostile Ireland? There are Liberal statesmen who talk airily of granting Home Rule; but they know not what they say, or what the Irish leaders mean. Mr. ASQUITH's idea and the ex convict CONDON's idea of that vague generality are (we have no hesitation in saying) as widely asunder as the poles. But this much we may affirm—that the public blindness of a large section of the Liberal party on this point constitutes a grave national and Imperial danger. The aims which the Fenianism of to-day has in view are such that any Liberal Ministry which brings those aims one iota nearer accomplishment, will be guilty of the unpardonable sin of putting a sword into the hands of their country's enemies.

RATIONALISM OR SOCIALISM.

A REJOINDER.

The Editor of the Japan Herald (and we may presume he has sympathizers) seems somewhat exercised over a recent article in the Japan Mail laying upon Rationalism considerable responsibility for the disintegration of thought now going on in Japanese society and showing the very serious result it threatens to have upon the Empire. Special indignation is exhibited at the suggestion that Socialism is but the natural outcome of Rationalism. Naturally a bombshell thrown into the rationalistic camp will become a matter to which exception is taken. The Russians objected to being shelled in Port Arthur, but the shelling had to go on till the moment of surrender; and so truth must continue to oppose error even to the extent of very frank opinions; and the Japanese Government may have to fight both Rationalism and Socialism if it is to retain any proper authority over its subjects in this country.

The Editor of the Herald is himself not noted for great modesty in expression of frank opinions. Any one who could lend countenance to the baseless and extravagant statement that "all missionaries are liars" is as soundly convicted out of his own mouth as would the present writer were he to claim that all Rationalists were maniacs or all Socialists lunatics or felons. One must be fair enough to give even the Devil his due; and so all intention of being unjust to Rationalists is hereby disavowed. The Editor of the Herald takes the case too seriously when he concludes himself classed among the insane. It would not be quite the truth to say that he has as yet advanced that far; but to the degree that he is a Rationalist of the modern type, he is undoubtedly on a line with the reasoning that leads to lunacy. If he does not get there it is only because he has not the courage to push his convictions to their logical conclusion; and self-control always indicates that at least a little sanity is left. At any rate the man who imagines he is right and all the world in error is usually not far from madness. Herbert Spencer was a good type of this mental attitude. Lunatics are as a rule very skilful in argument. The difficulty is that they argue in a circle. Of course all reasoners argue more or less in a circle, but the difference between the circle of the lunatic and that of the sane man is that the sane man's circle is large enough to embrace the universe, while that of the madman is within the circumference of his own head. In other words, he believes in himself; and I still agree with those who contend that the only man who perfectly believes in himself is the lunatic.

The easiest way to prevent a discussion of this kind being unprofitably prolonged is to ask the Rationalists whether they are prepared to claim that their attitude to life has had any moral influence on the world. Is the effect of their train of reasoning constructive or destructive? Have they built up the great forces that have been strengthening the moral sense of mankind, or have they tended but to weaken those forces? The impression left on some of us is that Rationalism has been almost wholly a destructive influence in human society. It takes away what man, through long ages of conflict and evolution, has gathered as the sum total of his moral and spiritual convictions, and gives him nothing to believe in and live for instead. Rationalism is like the man who burns down the city to give the people better houses. But the sane man knows that even a hovel is better than no house, and a crust better than no bread. No man in his senses will do anything to destroy the moral and religious convictions of mankind unless he has something better to substitute for them. The trouble, as already suggested, is that if a man is not perfectly sound mentally he is very apt to believe so much in himself that he can hold honestly that all the world is wrong and he and his alone in the right. Such an egoist can be classed only with lunatics, for he is one either openly or in disguise. He no doubt always considers himself a blessing in disguise, but so long as the best minds regard his disguise as perfect, he must be content to keep quiet or go into the asylum.

Nor can any adherent of the rationalistic theory of life claim that his process of reasoning has done anything to make the good more free and the evil more enchained? May not Rationalism well be challenged to deny the grave accusation that in all countries where its propaganda has flourished it has tended to weaken respect for authority and personal achievement? Is it not already having just this effect in Japan where the religious force has not been sufficient to counteract its influence? The Rationalist in Japan has not the courage to push his convictions to their only natural conclusion, but some of the Socialists of the more insane type have. Rationalism has taught these to believe in no authority higher than the human, and therefore to look upon the Emperor and the Government as the tools of the mob rather than as servants of Heaven. So the demented socialist steps into the arena and challenges the Powers that be. He would demand of Heaven why things were created and of Kings and Em-perors that they give a reason for their being. Yet though he has the courage to push the theories of the Rationalist to their logical conclusion, he betrays his insanity by the devilish methods he adopts; for when he has come to the end of his line of reasoning, reason itself fails him, and he sees no way to enforce his egoism but by the bombs of the assassin.

No, Rationalism is not a cult to be merely endured or a cause to be supported. It is a disease to be treated and eradicated. This is seen in that its adherents regard it as something to be justified and defended. It is composed of men who are not bad at heart and not wholly insane of head; but their hearts and heads are too small and defective to embrace the total of man's highest and greatest convictions and attainments. They are even too purblind to see that these convictions that in the last 2,000 years have changed the very face of the world, can never be lightly abandoned or ignored by intelligent beings. Now if a man finds he cannot side with and believe with the best, his rational attitude should be silence and regret. If a man cannot emulate the highest, he ought at least not to spite him or try to destroy him; for the failure of the defective is no fault of the good. But when a man is mentally defective, as in such a case he usually is, he cannot see his duty in this respect. All that can be done with him, therefore, is to leave him to himself; and then if he insists upon forcing the community into his view of things, he must be placed with those deprived of freedom because they fancy they can think when they can do nothing of the kind.

A great deal could be said of the pernicious influence that Rationalism has had upon Europe, but it will be sufficient to remind the Editor of the Herald that the movement he supports was at the bottom of the French Revolution, an episode which, though it had some right on its side, yet left France so morally weak that she has since never fully recovered. The same movement is responsible for the troubles in Spain, and finally for the present Revolution going on in Portugal, where the rightful King of the country has been dethroned and the mob set up on the pedestal of authority. If one had the data at hand it would be easy to show that the agents at the bottom of these efforts against authority have no faith but that of the Rationalist. There is no fear of Heaven before their eyes. In the middle ages they might fanatically have imagined themselves thunderbolts from Heaven putting down tyranny and injustice, or else in league with the Devil, simply because, as a matter of fact, they were mad; but in these days when both Heaven and Hell have passed away, and only the earth remains, they are called Rationalists, men who believe in themselves, before whom Emperors and Kings must bow, abandon and abdicate their thrones. At the present moment Rationalism is doing its best to undermine American society. It is yearly lengthening the nation's divorce lists, filling its prisons and penitentiaries, and disgracing the land with rioting and mob violence. If one could examine carefully into the creed of these violators of law and decency one would find that invariably they were Rationalists. They certainly do not belong to the churches. If among rationalists may be included the names of some highly intellectual men, such as the Editor of the Japan Herald enumerates, it can only be said that whatever moral force they commanded, they did not get it from Rationalism but from the Christian mothers that bore them, or from the Christian society in which they had to live and with which they had the good judgment to conform. But for every good man in the ranks of Rationalism there are a thousand others who care nothing but to have their own way, and are influenced very little by the higher motives. If it could be said of religion, as it can truly be said of Rationalism, that for every upright member of the Church there were a thousand bad members among the revolutionaries, the criminals, and the law-breakers of the world, it would surely show that whatever evil influence Christianity had, it certainly could not prove itself to be a good influence, seeing that the majority of adherents were believers in nothing, and went to swell the ranks of the degenerate. Yet I think it can be said, with a large degree of truth, that the majority of those on the frayed-out fringe of society as well as the majority of those who defy or undermine authority, are, if they are on any side at all, on the side of the Rationalist. The most dangerous man on the face of the earth is the man who believes himself to be his own God. He can have little appreciation of the tie that binds all men into one brotherhood under one common Father, which is the only bond that can ever prevent the disintegration of society and preserve a high state of civilization.

TOKYO NOTES.

It is said that the Japanese workmen brought to London for the purpose of building the various styles of native architecture connected with the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition, have left a lasting impression upon the districts where they lodged by their insistence upon having a regular bath. At first, landladies ready to put them up were found in plenty, but when it was discovered that bathing facilities were a frequent and essential part of the accommodation, difficulties began to arise. In time a solution of the difficulty was found, however, and it is reported that penny-in-the-slot baths may now be had in that part of London ad libitum. It is certainly a great advantage to the poor of Japan that facilities for personal ablution are cheap and convenient in every city, town, and village of the Empire. In the smaller towns of Europe and America it is next to impossible for a poor man to bathe conveniently. If he has a home of his own he may have a dip in a wash tub full of hot water in his kitchen after the family have retired; and in summer he may dip in the sea, if he chance to live on the coast. But if he is a labourer in lodgings, or working on a farm, he will have to go to a hotel and pay at least fifty sen before he can get all clean. It surprises one travelling through Europe and America to find how often extra payment is demanded at hotels, if one's tastes should be so luxurious as to desire a bath. Evidently a bath is not regarded as a regular and essential part of life's make-up, like meals or windows. Still, it is not always easy to judge, and one might unconsciously make a mistake and run away with a false impression. In Europe, at most of the hotels, one has to pay extra for light as well as baths; but it would be somewhat unfair to conclude that light was regarded as a non essential of daily existence. In America it is esteemed very much out of place to charge extra for light and heat; I have often been charged extra for a bath by hotels that would not think of demanding anything extra for light. In the matter of baths America is fast out-distancing Europe, for there are few tenement houses built there now-a-days without the regular bath-room and all its conveniences. In fact, one might say that in cities there are none at all. But this does not hold so universally in the small towns and in the country parts, where the wash-tub is the only stand by. Very few of the smaller towns have public bath houses, these being as yet confined to the large centres. Many are able to obtain baths by becoming members of young men's clubs and so on. With regard to customs in Europe and America, it may be more just to judge the matter from the point of view of hotels than as representing the various countries included; because in England, for instance, some hotels include a bath in their rates, while others charge for it. I may say that when last in Europe a British hotel in Naples was the only one in a long list that offered a free bath.

In Tokyo the street-car seems now to have become as urgent an essential of daily existence as the bath-house. In few cities have we seen the cars so well patronized. The rush at times is simply terrific. Sometimes one waits while nine or ten cars go by without being able to find even standing room. It would seem as though even twice as many cars and twice as many lines of road could find plenty to do. There are one or two improvements in the manner of managing the cars that could be easily made, and as such improvements would greatly add to the comfort of the public it is really a great pity that the municipal authorities cannot have them carried out. In the first place, the conductors ought to be given orders to keep the ventilators of the cars open. At present these essentials of health and comfort appear never to be put into use and the result is that at times the atmosphere in the cars is simply vile and poisonous. There is absolutely no reason against putting the ventilators to the use for which they were placed in the cars, and it seems a grave neglect on the part of the management that conductors are not required to attend to so important a matter. Then, the conductors ought to be positively forbidden to push passengers by main force into crowded cars. It is most unpleasant to have a conductor order you peremptorily to go into a car that it is quite impossible to find room in. When a car is full, it is full, and there is no way to get into it except by being rude to those occupying it. Now if the conductor is honestly convinced that there is room for an extra passenger in the crowded car, he ought himself to be compelled to find the space for you before ordering you to enter. But this does not bother him in the least. He simply tells you that you must go in, and compels you to make room for yourself. If you try to point out that he is requiring an impossibility, it only starts an argument and leads to further unpleasantness. The only thing to be done is to leave the car and take another, but in this case the conductor will not return your ticket, so that you will be obliged to pay double fare. Another ground of complaint is that conductors sometimes refuse or neglect to stop at the place your ticket is marked for, and thus you are carried several hundred yards out of your way. In other countries, if the car does not stop at the proper place, the passenger simply pulls the bell and the motor-man pulls up; but in Tokyo the bell is considered quite as sacred as it is on the steam railway, and no passenger would dare to pull it, even though he were carried the whole length of the route. Is there no one that will call the attention of the street railway management to these matters which are so easily remedied?

One hears various opinions from time to time as to the new issue of bank notes now put in circulation. The five-yen bills are so very different in appearance from our old friends of long and useful standing that it is almost a shock to be offered one. They cannot be regarded as quite so dignified and money-like in appearance as the old issue; this we think most people will be disposed to admit. They are, however, so very peculiar that they may be safer as proof against counterfeiters. There are few makers of false money who would be brave enough to face that smiling rascal that grins at you when the note is held up to the light. But what the note gains in security it loses in appearance. In America there was once an issue of notes of rather diminutive size to the value of 25 cents, but they became so unpopular that they speedily went out of circulation. They went almost universally by the name of shin plasters; and when offered in payment or change were always met by a polite request for common money, if possible. Parents got rid of them by making presents of them to children as curiosities, and even the children used to keep them as toy-money, never thinking of putting them into circulation. The new five-yen note is not exactly so undignified as to be dubbed a shin plaster, but its light colour is so much like mere parchment that it may perhaps be expected to acquire dignity with age. Be it remembered, however, that it is only the aspect of the new notes, and not the number at one's command, that is objected to.

The baseball contest now going on between the Chicago men and the teams representing the Keiogijuku and Waseda Universities is creating considerable interest in Tokyo. Immense crowds of both Japanese and foreigners have assembled to witness the games so far played, and excitement on both sides has been keen. The American Ambassador has been extending courtesies to the three teams, and they have had a group photograph taken in company with the Ambassador and some of the legation staff, which is being sold among the students. So far the Americans appear to be having the best of the game. When it comes to a matter of long legs, it is somewhat difficult for the Japanese athlete to compete with the Anglo-Saxon. The Japanese show great technical skill both with the bat and on the diamond generally; but when speed is the prime factor, as it usually is in baseball, they are not in it with the Americans. Moreover, these visitors no doubt represent the "star" players of a great university; they are picked men both as to physique and skill. In Japan that kind of man does not go in for baseball. He is more likely to be found in the jūjitsu ring, or displaying his agility with the sword. Compare the average Japanese baseball team with the average of physique one sees in the various classes at the Japanese universities, and the conclusion is inevitable that the strongest and most active men are not in the baseball teams. In America it is just the reverse. The finest all-round athletes are secured for the diamond, just as they are for football, so that an American baseball game represents that most exciting and interesting of all human moments when Greek meets Greek. Still, considering the strength of the team against which they are contending, the Japanese players are putting in an excellent record; and if they should succeed in finally defeating the Americans, it would indeed be a notable triumph.

MR. FUKUZAWA ON THE EVENTS IN SEOUL IN 1884.

(FROM THE "JUJI SHIMPO")

IV.

On the following day Kin Gyoku Kin took two famous go players, and went to the Japanese Legation, ostensibly for a game of go, though this was but a mere pretext to cover up the reason for his frequent visits to that house. No meeting of importance, however, took place on that day, and Kin speedily returned.

On the tenth of November there was, however, a go meeting at Kin's house, at 3 p.m. to which came Minister Takezoe, Mr. Shimamura, Messrs. Asayama and Suzuki, interpreters at the Legation, Mr. Consul Kobayashi, and Mr. Kinoshina, Manager of the Seoul Branch of the First Bank. Three Koreans were present, — Jo Kohan, Boku Saito, Iu Chigu. They were later joined by Ko Eishoku.

On the night of the 20th November the Japanese troops held manoeuvres on Nanzan. They had had manoeuvres there before, but always in the day time and after consultation with the Korean Foreign Office. This time however there was no notice given, and no asking for permission. Minister Takezoe had become very outspoken since his return to Seoul and had allowed the rumour to go abroad uncontradicted that Japan meant to fight China. The rumour naturally made the Chinese and Korean diplomatists very uneasy, and whatever the Japanese did was immediately fastened upon with suspicion.

The first thing next morning there came a protest from the Korean Foreign Office. When asked his motives for acting as he did, Mr. Takezoe is reported to have said that he wanted to test the spirit of the Chinese and Koreans, and that he was quite satisfied that they would be easy to deal with, now that he saw how easily they were scared by his simple manoeuvres.

During those days the leaders of the Independents were constant visitors at the Japanese Legation. On Nov. 26 Kin Gyoku Kin came alone to the legation and told Minister Takezoe of his intention to assassinate the members of the Korean Cabinet. The Minister made a show of withholding his consent, but Kin said that the Independents were going to carry out their project whether the Japanese helped them or not, and then went on to talk of contemplated political moves. What was most essential at this juncture, was money; was the Minister to be relied upon for services in procuring a loan?

Mr. Takezoe gave a ready consent. If only the political reforms urged by Japan were carried out, he would promise his assistance in procuring a loan of any amount. There would be no difficulty in raising a sum of 100,000 yen, or even more, on the spot, from Japanese resident in Seoul, and this would be at once available for use. He even went so far as to speak of possible collisions between Japanese and Chinese troops. The Japanese, he said, could, by entrenching themselves at Hokugaku, hold out for two weeks; if they could fortify Nanzan, they could maintain themselves for nearly two months. Mr. Takezoe spoke in a very excited manner. He let fall no word of promise as to help in the matter of assassinating the Ministers, but Kin was nevertheless able to read from the Japanese Minister's looks and gestures his approval of their design.

Kin now took his leave. They might never meet again, he said; but if Fortune favoured his designs he would certainly return once more.

The next day Kin went to his country house, to which he invited Captain Murakami for a lengthy interview. On the 29th Nov. he returned to Seoul; on the 30th the conspirators met to discuss their plans. Some of those present deemed it advisable to hire Japanese sōshi to do the deed; it was resolved, after some discussion, to employ none but Koreans. The party of National Independence had the fullest confidence in the Japanese Legation.

The attitude of the Japanese Legation towards Kin Gyoku Kin and Boku Eiko had undergone a radical change during the month of July and August 1884. When Takezoe returned to his post at the end of October he let it be known that Japan intended to help on Korean independence and to attack China. The news greatly excited the Korean leaders. They knew that Takezoe was by no means a politician of independent views. He was, as a rule, timid and cautious and apt to follow the lead of others. When therefore the Koreans saw the change which came over him on his return to Seoul, and heard him speak so resolutely and defiantly, they felt that he must have the authority of the Japanese Cabinet behind him, and felt correspondingly elated.

The men whom the Party of Independence wished to put out of the way were Bin Daiko, Bin Eiyoku, Bin Eiboku, Chō Neika, Kan Keishoku, Ri Soen, and In Shin-tai. The conspirators, after discussing many projects, decided to set fire to the Betsu Gū or Detached Palace, and to murder the Ministers as they ran up dutifully to give assistance to the Royal Family.

About noon on the 1st December, Kin and two others went to the Japanese Legation. The Minister thought it best not to see them, but Mr. Shimamura came out and told them that further interviews would only lead to idle talk instead of to action. The Koreans then told him of their design of setting fire to the Palace. Mr. Shimamura approved of it, and asked when it was going to be carried out. The Koreans could not say for certain: certainly within a week, they thought. At any rate they would let him know as soon as the date was fixed.

We may here pause to explain that the reason for mentioning a week seems to have been that the Koreans knew that the S.S. Chitose Maru was due from Japan on the 7th December, and that they were afraid that she might bring news calculated to change the present dispositions of the Legation people. It was therefore most important that the coup should come off before the arrival of the steamer.

From the Legation the conspirators adjourned to the house of Boku Eiko, where they found assembled a company of "sōshi" with whom they conferred as to the details of the coup d'état. These sōshi were all graduates of the Toyama Military School in Tokyo, were all skilful fencers, and soldiers.

It was arranged that Bin Eiyoku should be assassinated by In Keijin and Ri Danko; that Boku Sanyu and Ko Ryotaku should kill In Shin-tai, and that two other pairs of assassins should despatch Ri Soen and Kan Keishoku. Every victim had thus two assassins assigned to him. The whole attack was put under the direction of Ri Ensho, who was the oldest of the conspirators, two others were detailed to act as sentries, and two more to set fire to the Palace. The thirteen sōshi, (there were really 43, for thirty joined the conspirators later), were placed in ambush at the Gate of the Golden Gate to lie in wait for the arrival of three other members of the Korean Government, and the commander of the Palace Guards, who was a strong sympathiser, posted his soldiers in the manner best calculated to promote the objects of the conspirators.

Behind the Korean sōshi were to be stationed four Japanese of the same type, whose duty it was to be to kill the Ministers in case the Koreans failed in their attack. Of these four, one came from the Japanese Legation, one was a soldier, and the other two were private persons who had already joined the conspiracy of the Independent party.

On the 4th of December a grand banquet took place to celebrate the opening of the new Post Office. It was attended by all Ministers of State, diplomats, and other distinguished personages. Mr. Shimamura sent his wife to represent him; he himself remained at home on the plea of sickness. He gave bearers and policemen who escorted his wife to the banquet, with orders to be very careful that evening in case of any trouble.

During the forenoon of that day the Legation people busied themselves with fetching ammunition and provisions from the barracks; a detachment of soldiers came over in the afternoon, and held themselves in readiness for any call, it being expected that the project of the conspirators would be carried out that evening.

YOKOHAMA SAINT ANDREWS SOCIETY.

At an extraordinary General meeting of the society held on Friday afternoon at the Club Hotel there was a large attendance of the members to discuss amendments to the Constitution and rules of the society.

The name of the society has been changed to The Saint Andrew's Society of Yokohama and Tokyo. At the annual general meeting held immediately afterward it was decided to hold a ball on Saint Andrews day, the 30th November. The following were elected office bearers for the ensuing year. President, Alex. Cumming; Vice President, H. A. Stewart; Hon. Secretary, John. G. Gibson; Hon. Treasurer, T. Seggie; Committee, C. Murray Duff, James Thom, A. J. McClure, C. A. Fraser and Geo. Miller.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

RUSSIAN PRESS ON GERMANY.

St. Petersburg, September 22.

The Novoe Vremja, stung into plain speaking by a couple of articles in the German press somewhat more than usually abusive of Russia, in connection with Persian affairs, says: "The object of the Anglo Russian agreement is to restore order in Persia. If Germany had had the same object in view there was never any objection to her joining forces with the Russian and English representatives and aiding in their difficult task. But this is not what Germany is doing; she prefers to go her own way; this is plainly seen, for she is playing in Persia the same double game that she played in Morocco aforetime. And as soon as ever Germany was set aside there all troubles ceased at once as by the wave of an enchanter's wand. We are not Germanophobe, and indeed we prefer to avoid all 'philisms' and 'phobisms'; we recognized that every State in certain definite circumstances may be either helpful or injurious to us. Consequently we prefer neither to especially love nor specially hate anybody: a healthy egoism and calm attitude in face of any problem that may present itself will immediately enable us to distinguish between our friends and our foes. We remember all that has passed of old time between Russia and Germany, and that past represents a capital far too valuable to fling out of window. But why do the German papers vilify Russia in a manner even more truculent than could be matched in any organ of the British press at the time when our relations with England were at their worst?" Germany has been suggesting to Turkey to find a "new Korea" in certain districts bordering Turko-Persian frontiers, and the indignation of the Novoe Vremja is natural enough.

DIET OF FINLAND.

The extraordinary session of the Finnish Diet, summoned to consider the Russian proposals for equalising the rights of Russian resident in Finland with those of the Finnish born, was opened in state by the Governor-General yesterday. In spite of all the efforts of an alarmist press to excite apprehensions for the future, no interest is taken in the prophecies of the agitation mongers. The Finns will probably see reason and recognise that Russia is dealing with them in a spirit of fairness and caution. A demand that Russians should be treated fairly in Finland, just as Finns are fairly treated throughout the Empire, is too simple to offer much opportunity for creating trouble. Yet the old gang of agitators, if reports are to be believed, are bent on rousing all the opposition possible. The end will be the same, for Russia has on her side the rights of the questions at issue and, if driven to it will enforce them by less friendly means than the present reference to an elective assembly with an invitation to express the opinion of Finland upon these eminently moderate proposals. But there is no doubt now left that if the Finns decline to take the hand held out to them gloved in velvet, they will speedily find it another mailed fist.

FOREIGN NEWSPAPER CORRESPONDENTS AT THE DIET.

It is with a feeling of astonishment that the Russian public read of the great concourse of foreign newspaper correspondents assembled now at Helsingfors for the opening of the extraordinary session of the Finnish Diet. "Is it possible," says the Russian, "that the admirable Finnish agitation organisation has succeeded in persuading the outside world, and England in particular, that world-stirring events are about to happen in Finland?" It seems about the most likely explanation, and it may be surmised that the disappointment at the absence of sensational copy will be proportionate to the expectations so unwarrantably aroused by those whose whole "public" career has been tinged by that fatal facility for making the wish father to the thought and then presenting the thought as solid fact to nations that deal in facts and facts only. The Russian proposals, on which the opinion of the Diet is asked before formally taking steps to introduce the needed reforms, will be laid before the Diet by its officials to-morrow. They are so moderate that it is inconceivable any sane body of men with the interests of their country really at heart will venture to reject them. Yet it is reported this evening that the agitation leaders are preparing to throw out the proposals en bloc without discussion on a so-called technical point which begs the whole question of Russo-Finnish relations. As so often said in these columns before the only statesmanlike way of meeting Russia's proposals is to meet them half way or else put up a fight. The latter has never been intended and, of course, would be simply absurd unless Finland had behind her one of the Great Powers of Europe. That combination has not yet been formed and Russia has no intention of obliging either Finnish or other ambitious ones by waiting until it does take concrete shape.

AVIATION IN RUSSIA.

The All-Russian Aviation Week, postponed from Sunday owing to high winds, was successfully opened yesterday afternoon. The morning began with rain which was only cleared about noon by a wind that still held on sufficiently strong to threaten attempts at flying: a couple of hours later, however, matters improved and until dusk flying was going on. In all ten flights were made, but no records broken. To day it is expected that the dirigibles will arrive on the course at the aerodrome by flying from their hangars at Gatchina. As on the former occasion large numbers of soldiers and police are drafted on to the ground, obviously with the object of giving the services a chance of seeing what may one day become a familiar feature of modern warfare. The number of Russian officers taking part in the flying indicates the interest taken by the Army in the progress of aviation, and the "tommies" show discrimination as well as enthusiasm in their applause.

TELEPHONE INVENTION IN RUSSIA.

A Russian has invented an apparatus for application to an ordinary typewriting machine which, by means of ordinary telephone wires, will enable a letter to be reproduced on one or more machines while being written. The invention has many possible applications, but its commercial value is thought to lie in the convenience of communicating written orders over the ordinary telephone wires found in every office. The confusion and inconvenience caused by telephonic misunderstandings will thus be entirely avoided, the recipient gets his message in writing and an identical copy of the same remains with the sender. The device is electrical in character, the sending machine with its apparatus being switched on to the telephone wire and the receiving machine, also fitted with the special apparatus, being similarly attached after the ordinary telephone call has got through.

BOMBS UNEARTHED UNDER UNIVERSITY FLOORS.

Bombs and rifle ammunition have been discovered concealed beneath the flooring under lecture-halls at the Moscow University. From certain indications the police are of the opinion that they have lain there since the troublous times five years ago.

AMBASSADOR TO PARIS.

The death of M. Nelidov, Russian Ambassador at Paris, creates a vacancy which will be filled on the return of the Emperor in November. It is extremely likely that M. Isvolsky, who has so long desired to take a first-class Embassy, will receive this appointment. M. Sazonov, now Adjunct-Minister of Foreign Affairs, would then take M. Isvolsky's place. Nothing however will be officially settled until November. With the retirement of Mr. Isvolsky from the Russian Foreign Office the changes in that department will probably be extensive.

NEWS CENSOR.

The "Berliner Tageblatt," which has had the bad taste to continue its attacks upon the Emperor of Russia even during his Majesty's visit on German soil, has been prohibited altogether in Russia. Another German paper will probably be prohibited shortly for the same reason. The total prohibition of a foreign paper in Russia is an exceptional form of censor restriction, and is but rarely employed.

COURT FESTIVITIES IN PROSPECT.

During the greater part of the Summer, St. Petersburg has been busy with renovation of all kinds on a scale rather more extensive than is usual. The Winter Palace, the Ministries and other Government Buildings, and many of the larger private palaces have been cleaned, repainted and put in thorough repair. It is hoped that at length it will be possible for the Court to spend a Winter in St. Petersburg. The intention has been frustrated for two years past by deaths in the Imperial family, which precluded all thought of Court festivities. After the visit to Germany, which is proving so beneficial to the health of the Empress, the Imperial family will proceed to Belovoso for some weeks' shooting. The sport here includes the shooting of that magnificent monster, the European bison, or aurochs, herds of which occur only in the Belovoso forest and in the Caucasus. They are reserved for the sport of the Imperial party. The return to St. Petersburg will not be before November.

NAVIGATION ON THE SUGARI.

Russian merchants on the Sungari complain that their steamers while allowed to navigate the river are prevented from tying up to either bank to unload goods or passengers, the Chinese authorities interpreting the understandings with Russia as Shylock read his bond. It was arranged in the case of one steamer that it should tie up at the wharf rented at Girin for the official company's boats, but the owner of the land objected on the ground that the Chinese authorities had already bastinadoed with bamboos others owners of similar river side land whenever a Russian private steamer succeeded in landing or taking off goods.

ENGINEERING WORKS ON THE AMU DARJA.

The official Turkestan Gazette says that work has been begun on the construction of the dam across the Amu Darja (Oxus) which besides giving enough water to fill the canal system already in existence that has turned a sandy waste into a Garden of Eden for luxuriant growths of all kinds, will also serve as a bridge to carry the railway across the river. The spot chosen for the dam is near Kizil-Ajak.

THE BUDGET.

The various Departments of State are now putting in their estimates of expenditure for 1911, for budget purposes, to the Duma. The Ministry of Education estimates an expenditure of about ten millions sterling, which is half a million less than the profit brought in by the Russian Posts and Telegraphs. Is education dirt-cheap in Russia? or do letters and telegrams cost enormously? The comparison raises many such suggestive queries, all of which at one time or another have formed the subject of attempts at reform by the Duma.

CHOLERA AND SANITATION.

Kronstadt, which a fortnight ago succeeded at considerable expense in entirely purifying its water-supply from the cholera vibriation by the process of chemically cleansing the service pipes, is again developing cholera cases. It has been decided to repeat the purification process, but, as this is obviously the merest palliative so long as St. Petersburg continues to pour its sewage into the Neva well above Kronstadt, the fortress-town will appeal to the Minister of the Interior to compel the St. Petersburg municipality to either sterilise its sewage or else deliver it to the sea below Kronstadt instead of simply running it into the Neva from which St. Petersburg itself derived its water-supply.

MANCHURIAN BANDITS.

The Khun-Hutze ("Red-beards") the notorious robber-bands of Manchuria, have become so emboldened of late that they established themselves in Harbin itself, apparently during the time when Russian energy was hampered by small international incidents. A number were arrested by Russian armed police after a skirmish in which a number of casualties occurred.

GERMAN OFFICERS RELEASED.

The two German officers recently arrested at Moscow on suspicion of espionage have been released from custody and sent over the frontier. One of them, Lieut. Heinve, was merely looking on at some manoeuvres in the neighbourhood of Moscow and appears to have drawn suspicion upon himself by his mysterious carriage. The other officer called at his address after the lieutenant had already been taken into custody.

PROTECTION OF PATENTS.

The police are engaged in making active perquisitions in Moscow and St. Petersburg musical instrument shops, in consequence of the complaint of an English manufacturer of grammophone records that his patents were being infringed, and Russian-made plates were being sold under false pretences to the public. The grammophone business in Russia is enormous and any infringement of record rights is disastrous to an importing firm.

PERSIAN AFFAIRS.

The turmoil in Persia from time to time takes on new phrases but in no wise tends towards improvement in the direction of law and order. Another mustaheid has been assassinated. Another Russian revolutionary provided apparently with a passport by Turkey after being expelled from Persia on a Consular complaint as a Russian, has been placed at the head of the Teheran police. The time is approaching when some form of interference will become necessary on the part of the two Powers which have made themselves responsible to the world for the restoration of law and order in Persia. It is suggested that before Russia actively intervenes perhaps the aid of England, who has also suffered in the South and is still unable to get any reparation, may be called for to put pressure upon Persia in a less drastic form than by flooding the country with troops, which is Russia's only possible way of making her power felt there to-day.

AGRICULTURAL EXHIBITIONS.

It is characteristic of the comparatively little interest hitherto taken in Russia in the staple industry of the country, agriculture, that only yesterday was opened in St. Petersburg the first Dairy Exhibition for All Russia. Notwithstanding the fears entertained owing to the cholera and still more the prevalence of foot and mouth disease in the Provinces the exhibits were numerous and the show fairly well attended.

REVOLUTIONARIES RAIDED.

A secret printing-office of the Revolutionary Party has been raided by the St. Petersburg police who arrested two young men engaged in preparing to print revolutionary "proclamations".

THE WARWICK MAJOR'S COMEDY COMPANY.

Mr. Warwick Major must have been gratified by the big crowd which notwithstanding the heavy rain and sloppy roads assembled last night to witness the opening performance by his Company of "Jane" at the "Gaiety." The cast of "Jane" is not a very long one and briefly the plot is as follows: Charley Shackleton a young bachelor of extravagant habits in drawing large sums of money from his trustee, has excused his expenditure on the ground of his non-existent wife's extravagance and the heavy expenses attendant on the arrival of a son and heir—equally non-existent. The trustee (Mr. Kershaw) comes to London in order to quietly remonstrate with Charley's wife and induce her to be more moderate in her pecuniary demands on her husband. The letter announcing Kershaw's intention to visit him only reaches Charley an hour or so before his proposed arrival and as Shackleton has neither wife nor baby on the premises he is at his wit's ends how to satisfy his trustee. After some amusing expedients have been suggested and rejected, "Jane," his parlour maid, who has, by the way, married his valet—(William Fepson) that morning, consents to act the part of Shackleton's wife for a few hours! further borrows a baby from a friend (Mrs. Poxton) living next door.

The love-sick valet has the mortification of seeing his newly wedded bride indulging in playful interludes with her supposed husband, (Chusby) and also mildly flirting with the susceptible old guardian, Kershaw.

Incidental characters are Charley's fiancée, (Lucy Norton) and a widow of uncertain age (Mrs. Chadwick) also the page boy (Claude) in addition to the baby who has no speaking part.

We may say at once that in the hands of this capable company the piece went with a swing from start to finish and it was of course on Miss Georgie Corlass that most of the interest centred. She acted with a verve and vivacity which should ensure her a brilliant future in comedy, whilst her rendering of two musical numbers shewed that she has not lost any of her daintiness in dancing, also that she has returned from her holiday in England in most excellent voice. She received a great reception and was the recipient of many handsome floral tributes.

Of the others, Warwick Major was quite convincing as the very perplexed and much worried bachelor, Shackleton, and Mr. G. F. Storey gave a clever portrayal of the love sick butler, Miss Maude Drewry did the little she was called upon to do as Charley's fiancée very prettily and Miss Dale was very realistic as the lady from next door who lends the baby (Mrs. Poxton). Her husband (portrayed by Mr. Ry. Rivington) only makes one entrance but it was most effective. Mr. Jess Sweet acted with too much abandon as the page boy but his dancing evoked the greatest enthusiasm. Mr. Robert Stephenson as the trustee Mr. Kershaw, called forth roars of laughter by his straight hometalk, while Miss Minnie Rayner as the Widow Chadwick, often brought down the house. Altogether a most pleasant evening which augurs well for the continued success of the Company in Yokohama, was brought to a happy conclusion.

The impression produced by this Company's performance on Monday night, drew again last night a vast crowd to "The Gaiety," despite the wretched weather, in order to witness that delightful farce, "Are you a Mason?" Although anything but new, this play seems to exercise the same influence over every audience before which it has been given, that is, one of uncontrollable laughter and amusement from start to finish. Needless to say that such a piece in the hands of a Company specially constructed, seemingly, for the production of "Farce," realized all that was expected of it, and perhaps more so, judging by the rounds of applause which greeted all the artists in turn. Plot, there is none to speak of. All the interest and action in the play centre in the troubles and perplexities of the two gentlemen, who in order to hide their peccadilloes, have represented themselves to their respective wives as Masons, and one of them even as the Grand Master of a Provincial Lodge.

Mr. Robert Stephenson who gave us such an excellent Trustee as Mr. Kershaw, on the opening night of the Company, was also on this occasion the source of considerable merriment as Amos Bloodgood, the supposed Grand Master; and very ably seconded by Mr. George F. Storey as Frank Perry, his son-in-law, the other bogus "Mason."

The part of George Fisher a stockbroker formerly an actor, was well played by Mr. Kenneth Brampton, particularly in his masquerading as a girl, in which character he undoubtedly made the most of his histrionic abilities. Mr. Jess Sweet was good as a gentleman farmer from Yorkshire, while Messrs. Reginald Rivington and Ronald Garland also took part in the play.

Of the ladies' parts, those of Mrs. Bloodgood and Mrs. Perry could not have been in better hands, for Miss Minnie Rayner had shown us on the opening night, as the Widow Chadwick, that she can thoroughly identify herself with her part. This she illustrated again last night, to the great satisfaction and vast amusement of the audience. Miss Lilian Lloyd as her companion-victim of man's deceit and wicked wiles, aptly seconded her.

Mrs. Perry's two sisters, Annie and Lulu, represented respectively by Miss Stewart Drewry and Miss Nina Osborne, entered thoroughly into the spirit of the play, and also showed us that the larger part of this company is many-sided in its accomplishments.

The entire cast, which comprises 13 characters, includes of course some superfluous material, but although on this occasion forming no part of it at all, Miss Georgie Corlass delighted the audience with the charming song, "She's a pretty little girl from Nowhere," a catching ditty which is all the rage at present in London.

The whole piece, which abounds in absurd episodes, and ludicrous situations, as played by the Warwick Major's Company last night, vastly redounds to the credit of the members for this particular kind of low Comedy.

"YOU NEVER CAN TELL."

The interest in the Warwick Major's Comedy Company is evidently not to be damped by the atrocious weather, which so far has attended their performances, for last night another good House was on tiptoe to witness "You never can Tell."

Classed by Mr. Bernard Shaw himself as one of his "pleasant" plays "You never can tell" is a comedy which abounds in clever sayings. It is a play that gives one to think, and by dint of much thinking one slowly realises that G.B.S. is merely telling the world, in a frivolous, epigrammatic way, the old truth that nature predominates everything. But he leads up to it by such a process of mental tortuousness that one never can tell what is going to happen. This process consists of mustering an array of metaphor, for which the author must have scoured all the heights of heaven and the depths of the earth, and a continuous fire of witty epigrams that must have been very carefully thought out, yet maintained the ingenuous freshness of spontaneity.

But shorn of all this superhuman effort, the play is primarily one of prosaic environment. It all springs from the meeting of a mistrained pair of children with their long lost father, and the scene of meeting is the operating room of an impetuous dentist. These irresponsible children have a sister who is what is known as an advanced young woman. The advanced young woman and the dentist, who is just an ordinary brainy, modern young man, discuss love, and the dentist agrees with her that so-called love is merely a phase of chemistry. Then he, quite paradoxically, imprisons a passionate kiss on her chaste cheek and well! there you are. You never can tell. This is quite new to the advanced young woman, and she is sunk in shame at having, even for a moment felt her scientific armour pierced by the barbed arrows of primitive passion. And the young man, too, in explaining the duel of sex has quite a job to convince her that youthful male nowadays is specially equipped to penetrate the modern woman's scientific armour, and that it's all in the nature of things that he should be. Then there is the mother of the young woman. She has successfully shown, in books, how life ought to be lived in the twentieth century; her books have run to several editions; but somehow she can't quite live up to her books. Then there is also the father, who has been lost for eighteen years. He is an egoist and has a fine capacity for self-sympathy. He expects a great deal from his new found children, but in the end he is content with what he gets. There is, the waiter, whose philosophy is worth more than the learning of the mother, or the egoism of the father, or the advancement of the advanced young woman, and who has a son at the Bar, whom he addresses as "Sir." Everything comes all right at the end, but, as G. B. S. proves, it might not, if nature had not been lurking in the background. Which all goes to prove, of course, that "you never can tell" or as Mr. Punch once put it "you never can be shaw."

The Company did its best in this play, but it is questionable whether Mr. Warwick Major is well advised in departing from the legitimate sphere of low Comedy in which the members of his Company seem to be the most at home. The piece was admirably mounted and the handsome dresses might easily have made up with a certain portion of the audience for histrionic shortcomings, while the excellent music contributed to a large extent in soothing a disappointment about the far-from-immaculate rendering of the brilliant and sparkling dialogues, with which this play abounds.

It did not require much effort, either on the part of the players or the audience, to be earnest last night, for the wretched weather which appears to be dogging the footsteps of The Warwick Major Company, was sufficient to damp the most exhilarated spirits, except of course those of Miss Georgie Corlass, whose irrepressible vivacity seems to be proof even against this so far atrocious Autumn Season.

In "The Importance of Being Earnest," Oscar Wilde's best known work, Miss Corlass as Cecily Cardew made a charming Ward, full of that somewhat exotic eccentricity with which most playwrights deem it necessary to invest that particular species of womanhood. Miss Minnie Rayner as Lady Bracknell, made the best of her part, which may also be said of her daughter, the Hon. Gwendoline Fairfax (Miss Maude Stewart Drewry) who together with Miss Prism (Miss Nina Osborne) showed to good advantage in a passive attitude. But if the ladies' parts must have been a severe tax on those representing the various characters of the play, how much more must this have been the case with the gentlemen of the cast, who, with the exception of the Butler Merriman (Mr. Jess Sweet) and the Man-Servant Lane (Mr. Reginald Rivington)—who acted with commendable naturalness and ease,—evidently did not feel very much at home in the characters of a Rector, or the lord of a Manor House. Mr. Geo. F. Story as Algernon Moncrieff, friend to the Lord of the Manor, has also given us much better work as Tipson, the manservant in "Jane," than in his latest character.

The presentation of this brilliant play was seemingly much appreciated by the audience.

COŪNI HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMŌ.")

CXLII.—FUJITA'S FORGERIES.

The public was much alarmed in the 12th year of Meiji (1879) by some forgeries of paper money. Fujita Denzaburo was a rich merchant of Osaka and a great favourite with Chōshū statesmen, especially Marquis Inouye. The militarists from Satsuma hoped that the trial of Fujita for forgery would bring out a great deal of evidence unfavourable to Chōshū in general and Inouye in particular, and thus deal a blow to the political influence of their political rivals. But Satsuma had lost a great deal of prestige since the death of Ōkubo, and the rising star of Itō seemed to secure the ascendancy of Chōshū. It was this sense of falling behind their rival that made the Chōshū men so eager to bring Fujita to justice. The trial brought out some very outspoken evidence, quite characteristic of the simple-hearted men of Satsuma.

CXLIII.—MR. NUMAMA MORIICHI.

Loud cries for the opening of a Parliament were to be heard in the 13th and 14th years of Meiji. Political meetings were being held, and speeches delivered, and several political parties or associations sprang into existence, one of the most influential of which was the Omeisha, of which my old friend, Mr. Numama Moriichi was the leader.

Numama had been a naval officer in the Tokugawa service, and afterwards a military drill-instructor. After the Restoration he served in the Council of the Elder Statesmen. I never looked upon him as a political leader, and I was consequently much surprised to find him a man of such influence with his party followers. Time can mould men's characters to many shapes.

CXLIV.—RETIREMENT OF COUNT OKUMA.

The Government of Restoration, commonly known as Satchōtohi, was composed of men from the four clans of Satsuma, Chōshū, Tosa, and Hizen. Okuma belonged to the last-named clan, as did also Goto, Soyejima, Itagaki, and Eto. It was foreseen that he would be thrown out of the coalition, and this actually took place in 1881.

Okuma's advocacy of Constitutional Government was, considering the conditions of the country at the time, absolutely inconsistent with the views and interests of the Militarists of Satsuma and Chōshū, and his presence in the Cabinet became consequently impossible. Fortunately, however, the Militarists were not strong enough to resist the popular outcries backed as they were by the quiet influence of statesmen like Ito and Inouye who remained in the Cabinet, and were its actual brains, even after Okuma's retirement. Okuma's retirement was not quite fruitless, for only a short time afterwards the public had the pleasure to receive an Imperial promise of a Parliament to be convoked ten years later.

CXLV.—THE FAILURE OF THE TEISEITO.

In the 14th year of Meiji (1881) His Majesty promised his people that a Parliament should be summoned for the 23rd year (1890). In the face of that promise, a section of the Cabinet resolved on the formation of an Imperialist Party (teiseitō) which was intended to maintain as far as possible the absolute power of the Throne even after the promulgation of the Constitution and the opening of Parliament.

The strange part of this project was that men who formed the association professed to have a perfect horror of all such political associations and parties! But the Fates were against them, and to protect themselves from Government by party by the formation of a party,—what could one expect from such a project but a fiasco?

CXLVI.—FUKUCHI'S LAPSE.

I cannot exactly remember when it was, but it was somewhere about those days, I watching a play at the Shintomiza Theatre, when the proprietor, Morita Kanya, came and told me that Fukuchi had sold the Nichi Nichi Shimbun to Count Tanaka Koken for yen 100,000. Fukuchi was to have yen 20,000 for himself, and the balance was to be spent in liquidating the liabilities of the newspaper, which were considerable. Morita added that it was a most pitiable thing that a man like Fukuchi should sell his principles for so paltry a sum as yen 20,000.

Fukuchi had in the past vehemently attacked the Government for abuses connected with the sales of Government property in Hokkaidō. He had also been a strenuous advocate of Constitutional Government, and his paper, the Nichi Nichi, had commanded the respect of the people.

The sale of his paper, and with it, the sale of his political principles, marks the beginning of the decline of the journal's popularity and of Fukuchi's influence. Even in this degenerate world of ours, consistency with principles is the real soul and spirit of a man, without which he cannot stand erect and command the allegiance of his fellow men. The world never sees without regret the lapses from grace of men like Fukuchi.

CXLVII.—THE DEATH OF THE CZAR, AND THE IMPERIALIST PARTY.

Alexander II. of Russia was assassinated by a Nihilist on the 13th of March of the 14th year of Meiji (1881). Mr. Den Keijiro, First Secretary of Legation at St. Petersburg, returned from Russia shortly afterwards, and told such interesting stories about the czar's death and of the loyalty exhibited by the thousands who went daily to visit his tomb, that the members of the Imperialist party were apparently much moved thereby.

Alexander II. was a very gentle Monarch. He is famous for his emancipation of the serfs, his removal of many harsh points in the laws of his country and for his gentle administration of the Government. It was even rumoured that he had in his pocket on the very day of his death the draft of a Constitution which he intended giving almost at once to his people. It was very natural that the world should mourn for the death of so kind a ruler, and the grief was by no means confined to Russia. It was universal. Not only did the Nihilists lose very largely the sympathies of the civilized world; but the promulgation of a Constitution for Russia was in consequence delayed for many a long year.

It should not however be forgotten that the harsh and repressive measures of the Russian Government were mainly responsible for the birth of Nihilism, and that had there been no Nihilism there would have been no assassination of Alexander II.

But how absurd was the contention of the advocates of absolute Imperial rule that the grief evinced by the Russian people for their murdered ruler showed that they desired nothing more than an Absolutist Government. Their grief was perfectly natural and right, but it had nothing to do with political proclivities.

CXLVIII.—I ACCOMPANY PRINCE ARISUGAWA TO RUSSIA.

In the 15th year of Meiji I was sent in the suite of Prince Arisugawa Taruhito, to attend the coronation of Czar Alexander III. For some reason or other, the Coronation was postponed for one year, and Prince Arisugawa took the opportunity of the delay to visit other countries in Europe.

His reception as Imperial Envoy was most cordial in Russia, and next to Russia, in Italy. In England, Germany and France, he was received rather coolly. Austria, Holland, Belgium, Spain, and Portugal, gave him the reception usually extended to a Prince of the Blood. In America, Gen. Grant gave a private reception as well as an official one. About a score of the richest men in America were gathered round the table, and the decorations and menus were exact replicas of those used in Tokyo when General and Mrs. Grant were entertained there by our citizens. It was quite evident that the General had been much impressed by the hearty welcome the Japanese had given him.

THE YOKOHAMA LITERARY SOCIETY.

At the annual meeting of the Yokohama Literary Society the following officers were elected:

President.—Rev. E. S. Booth.

Vice President.—Mr. S. H. Somerton.

Hon. Secretary.—Mr. R. H. Box.

Hon. Treasurer.—Mr. F. S. Booth.

The Committees are as follows:—

Literary Committee.—Mrs. J. L. Dearing, and Mr. A. W. Sherriff.

Musical Committee.—Messrs. Nipkow and W. H. Lewis, with power to add to the number.

In taking the Chair, the President-Elect paid a pretty compliment to the retiring President, stating that he was sure he expressed the feeling of the entire society when he said that he was sorry Mr. Mollison's departure prevented the society from re-electing him for another term, and wished Mr. and Mrs. Mollison bon-voyage and a happy vacation in the home-land.

He also commented on the fact that this was the 25th year of the society and remarked the improvement which both the society and its members had made.

The business meeting was followed by a short but very enjoyable musical programme.

THE JAPANESE TARIFF QUESTION.

SOME GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

Tokyo, August 24.

Two words, "autonomy" and "reciprocity," writes the Special Correspondent of The Times in the Far East, run like a refrain through all Japanese comment on the tariff question, and until the meaning and the importance that the Japanese attach to these expressions are understood it is impossible to appreciate their attitude. British merchants and manufacturers are, naturally enough, concerned only with the increase of the duties levied on British imports into Japan; to the Japanese the question of the actual amount of the duties is only a branch, though doubtless a very important branch, of the tariff question. For the European traders the expiration next year of the 1894 treaties, embodying the conventional tariffs, is only important as involving a considerable increase in the duties which they, or their customers, have to pay; in Japan the day on which those treaties expire is eagerly looked forward to as one of the great dates in modern Japanese history, as the day on which the country will attain for the first time to that full international status which, throughout the last 40 years, it has been the ambition and the constant effort of her statesmen to achieve for her.

The first Japanese mission sent abroad, in 1871, had for its object to obtain the restoration of Japan's judicial and fiscal autonomy. The attempt was a failure; and it was not till 1894 that, by the abolition of Consular jurisdiction, the right of Japan to administer justice to all within her boundaries was recognized. Important as that concession was, it did not place her upon a footing of complete equality with other Powers. The commercial treaties concluded at that time limit the tariff autonomy of Japan to such articles as are not included in the conventional tariffs embodied in the treaties, and impose no corresponding restriction on the fiscal autonomy of the other parties to them. In the Japanese view they thus violate the principle of reciprocity that should be observed between Powers of the same standing; they are treaties such as the Great Powers conclude with countries like China, Siam, Korea, and the Balkan States, not with one another; their existence is looked upon as a humiliation for Japan; and it is regarded as inconceivable that, when they expire, any Japanese Government should consent to conclude with any other Power any tariff agreement which contained any restriction on the fiscal autonomy of Japan without a corresponding restriction on the fiscal autonomy of the other party to the agreement.

With Great Britain, as Count Komura has explained in a much quoted and not altogether happy utterance, an agreement of this reciprocal character is taken to be impossible so long as her present system of Free Trade is maintained. To be perfectly candid, an agreement in which tariff concession should be balanced by tariff concession would not be altogether easy even if Great Britain were to abandon Free Trade; for British imports from Japan are trifling in amount and consist almost exclusively of raw materials on which there could be no question of placing any duty.

THE QUESTION OF RECIPROCITY.

In England there seems a tendency to regard the placing of heavy duties on British imports into Japan while Japanese imports are admitted free of duty into Great Britain as in itself a violation of the principle of reciprocity on which the Japanese lay so much stress. That, however, is due to a failure to understand what the Japanese mean by that principle: the Japanese idea and the British idea of reciprocity differ so considerably that it is almost a pity to use the same word to express them. And this by no means applies only to tariff matters. A few instances taken almost at random will make the difference clear. Japanese subjects enjoy exactly the same rights of landownership in England as do British subjects; yet no Englishman, or any other foreigner, can own land in Japan; or, rather, to speak quite by the book, the law recently passed by the Diet, while conceding in theory the right of foreigners to own land, surrounds that right with so many conditions and restrictions as to render it practically valueless. Again, British law recognizes no distinction between British subjects and foreigners, including Japanese, with regard to the ownership of shares in commercial and industrial enterprises; but Japanese law denies to foreigners, including, of course, British subjects, the right of owning shares in a large number of companies, such as the leading banks, that are regarded as having a more or less "national" character. The Nippon Yusen Kaisha and other Japanese steamship companies possess the same right as their British rivals to carry goods and passengers between London, Hong-kong, and Singapore, and generally to engage freely in the coasting trade of the British Empire; in Japan the right of British subjects and of other foreigners to participate in the coasting trade is subjected to considerable restrictions.

To most Englishmen these seem instances of anything but reciprocity, but they do not violate the principle as understood by the Japanese. Their view, and it applies equally to tariff matters, may be briefly summarized. Great Britain, like Japan, frames her laws to suit herself; differences in the circumstances of the two countries and differences in national character necessarily produce differences in their domestic legislation and, as in the case quoted, in their treatment of foreigners. That Japanese enjoy rights in England that are denied to Englishmen in Japan is of course very fortunate for them; but it is due simply to the fact the Great Britain thinks a more liberal policy suited to her interests. For Japan to confer the same rights upon British subjects would be to modify in their favour the policy that she thinks best suited to her particular circumstances; and, to satisfy the Japanese idea of reciprocity, such a concession would have to be balanced by some special concession to Japanese subjects on the part of Great Britain. As matters stand, although there is admittedly a considerable difference between the Japanese treatment of British subjects and goods and the British treatment of Japanese, the Japanese law imposes no disadvantage on British subjects and British goods that is not imposed on the subjects and goods of other foreign countries, and British law confers no advantage on Japanese subjects and Japanese goods that is not granted to those of other foreign countries; and the principle of reciprocity is thus duly observed.

In discussing the argument that the free admittance of Japanese goods into Great Britain should have disposed the Japanese to a more liberal treatment of British imports in the new tariff, it is pointed out here that Japanese exports consist almost exclusively of raw materials, on which even the most Protectionist countries are chary of imposing duties; thus France admits duty free 73 per cent. of her imports from Japan, Germany over 60 per cent., and America over 76 per cent.

SOME SOURCES OF MISUNDERSTANDING.

Although it was, of course, foreseen that there would be complaints on the part of the manufacturers and importers who will have to pay higher duties on their trade, the outburst of indignant protest with which the new tariff has been received was not anticipated in Japan. The Japanese really seem to have expected that the new rates would be compared, not with those of the conventional tariffs, which they regarded as a temporary scale imposed upon them by other Powers, but with those of the statutory tariff that was passed in 1906 to take full effect when, by the expiration of the present treaties, Japan recovered her complete tariff autonomy. Foreign traders, on the other hand, seem to have regarded the old statutory tariff which they have had in their hands for the past four years, as something that did not, and could not, concern them; and they, very naturally, compare the new duties with those they have been in the habit of paying, instead of with those they would be called upon to pay next year if the statutory tariff of 1906 had not been modified by that passed this year. This difference of standpoint has been the cause of much misunderstanding; the irritation of traders at the increased duties was aggravated by seeing them described officially and semi-officially as reductions.

But perhaps the most fruitful source of irritation was the neglect of the Japanese Government to provide the representatives of the foreign interests affected with any real opportunity of stating their case while the tariff was still under discussion. It is possible that the Japanese, sensitive, even perhaps unduly sensitive, on the subject of their tariff autonomy, disliked the idea of discussing the proposed rates with foreigners, out of a notion that any such discussion might be regarded as implying the recognition of some sort of a right to interfere. Whatever the explanation, the fact remains that the opportunity expected was not given; and the foreign traders feel with some soreness that the representations they are now making would have been at once easier to make and more likely to be effective had they been able to bring them forward before the 'Tariff Bill' was finally passed by the Diet. Perhaps even as things were, something might have been done in this direction; but the time was very short. The Bill became law within two months of its communication to the Foreign Missions, and much of the discussion was of the semi-private kind which is now characteristic of the Japanese Legislature; almost before those affected by the new tariff had had time to master its details it was too late to endeavour to get it modified during its passage through the Diet.

Whether any modification is now possible before the new rates come into force next year it is difficult to say. Certainly the conclusion of a "unilateral" conventional tariff agreement seems almost out of the question; and for many reasons, including considerations of domestic politics, it will be difficult for the Government to introduce a new Bill amending that so recently passed by the Diet. But the desire to conciliate English public opinion is so real that a way may possibly be found to remedy any cases of great hardship, and especially of anti-British discrimination, if such cases can be proved to exist.—The Times.

THE HEAVY RAINFALL.

FLOODS AND LANDSLIDES.

Owing to the heavy rains since Tuesday the rivers in Gumma and Chiba prefectures have risen to a considerable height. In Oraku district, Gumma prefecture, the embankment of the Sano River gave way to the extent of some 260 yards, so that five villages in the vicinity have inundated. The railway line near the iron bridge over the Tone was damaged and the traffic between Kawamata and Datebayashi has been suspended since Wednesday morning. In Chiba prefecture a tunnel on one of the prefectural roads in Chosei district collapsed on Wednesday evening and communication has been interrupted.

In Tokyo a landslide occurred early on Wednesday morning at Fujimi-cho, near Kudan-zaka, and the electric car line leading to Aoyama and Shinjuku was blocked. Many other slides have taken place in various parts of the city. In Azabu the Furukawa has risen, causing over 40 houses at Hiroo-cho to be submerged. The number of submerged houses in Koishikawa is over 3,000. In Shitaya, Asakusa, Honjo, Fukagawa, and other districts, where the floods of August last were experienced, a large number of houses are flooded up to the floors.

Several landslides are reported to have occurred at various parts of Yokosuka on Tuesday and Wednesday. A portion of Yoshikura Tunnel on the Yokosuka-Dzushi line collapsed on Wednesday evening causing an interruption of traffic for several hours.

Official reports reaching the Railway Board say that more or less serious damage has been sustained at Saijo-Akeshina and Toyono-Meure sections on the Central Eastern line, and at Yashiro-Sakagi section on the Shinyetsu line.

THOUGHTS IN A GARDEN.

O smile of the sea through the gap in the trees!
O glamour and gold of the pine-tufted shore!
The tea-rose has visions of tender June's kiss
But the "moksei's" sweet breath speaks of Autumn once more.

An azalea cheated to think it is Spring
Is awake on that bush on my lawn even now,
And has spread out her petals against the dark leaves
Like a slave-girl's pale hands on her swart lover's brow.

O moon that arises so full and so bright
O'er the silence of ships and the stir of the town,
You know it is Autumn—you note the dead leaves
The tears of wan trees for the days that are gone.

I think there's a wistfulness too in your light
On these radiant nights of the year's first decline
And the tears that your stern heart would shed if it could

Have something to do with the sad way you shine.

You have no tears to spare for the beauties of Spring,

So crude they must seem, to one that has stood
And silently witnessed the re-birth of years Since Infinite Goodness pronounced His worlds good.

Yes, good is this world though young hearts may break

And Love lie dethroned at the dull feet of Care.
And good are those music-swung regions of space
Whose song changes not with our joy or despair.

Yet, if to unlock those vague key-holes of light,
The keys of the angels to mortals were given,
I know that our hearts would yearn earthwards awhile

If the sob of the Autumn were not felt in Heaven.

THE YOKOHAMA KEIZAI KYOKAI.

The Yokohama Keizai Kyokai held a general meeting on Friday afternoon, Mayor Arakawa, Head-director of the Society, presiding at the meeting, when it was announced that a new station will be erected at Takashima-cho Sancho-me, covering over 10,000 tsubo, triangular in form. According to the definite plan of construction, the new station is to be built on the main line of the Tokaido railway, so that the present Yokohama and Hiranuma stations will cease to be used as passengers depots. These two stations, however, will be retained as electric tramway depots for the line between Tokyo and Kozu which is to be constructed by the Government. It is also planned to build a line for freight only, along the beach of Yokohama harbour on the reclaimed grounds, which will connect with the main line at Koyasu. The construction of the new station will be begun before the end of this fiscal year and be completed in two years at a cost of some 2,000,000 yen.

The subject of improving Yokohama harbour was also discussed at the same meeting and it was unanimously decided to present an application to the Government, asking for the necessary dredging of the harbour.

LOCAL NEWS.

Baron de Sandal, Portuguese Minister in Tokyo, left for home on the 8th inst. on board the steamer P. inz Eitel Friedrich.

With a view to preventing the spread of cholera to this locality, the Yokohama Municipal authorities, with the co-operation of the Harbour Police, will inspect all the lighters in the harbour. It is also reported that the cleaning of all the other vessels will be enforced in the course of a few days.

General Nogi, who has long been ill, is reported to be unable to join the autumn manoeuvres. He will be replaced by Prince Fushimi.

Mayor Arakawa of this city went to Tokyo on the 6th inst. and paid visits to the various foreign Ambassadors and Ministers in the capital.

The Russian Ambassador in Tokyo, with Mrs. Malewitch, left Shimbashi on Tuesday evening for Tsuruga, on a return trip to his country.

The British Ambassador in Tokyo, with Lady MacDonald, left Tokyo on Monday on a tour of sight-seeing in Kwansai and Shikoku districts.

Mr. Egi, Chief of the Second Department of the Colonization Office, started on the 8th inst. on a tour of inspection through Chosen and Manchuria.

Her Majesty the Empress will be pleased to visit the Shinjuku Imperial Garden to day, if the weather is fine, leaving the Palace at 10.30 a.m.

At a meeting of the Kanagawa Prefectural Council held on Monday, the bill for the construction of a new Hakone road was passed by a small majority.

It is reported that, General Nogi being desirous to retire from the office of Director of the Peers' School, Mr. Yamaguchi Einosuke, Chief of the Library Bureau, will be appointed his successor.

The branch line between Kozu and Yumoto of the Odawara Electric Tramway will be opened in a few days. It is now the best season to take an excursion to view the reddening maple-leaves.

Under the auspices of the Yokohama Water-colours Painters Association, an exhibition of paintings in this line will be held on the 16th and 17th instant at the Oimatsu Preliminary School in this city.

The Yokohama Chrysanthemum Garden near Tenjin-yama, will be opened on or about the 12th instant. Innumerable varieties of chrysanthemum flowers and figures will be exhibited in rows extending 360 yards in length.

The Fourth Art Exhibition of the Department of Education will be held from the 14th instant until the 23rd proximo at the Takenodai Gallery in Ueno Park, Tokyo. The Exhibition will be opened to the public from Saturday.

The railway cars which were being constructed for the Imperial use at the Shimbashi Works, have been completed. A trial run will be made in a week between Shimbashi and Okayama, and Kyoto and Shin-Maizuru, respectively.

Captain Tokuhisa, of the General Staff Office, and eight other military officers, have been ordered to proceed to China, Russia, Germany, England, and France, respectively, for the study of languages in these countries for one and a half years.

At a meeting of the Tokyo Municipal Council held on Tuesday it was decided to set up special telephone apparatus in the various water-supplying offices for the purpose of facilitating the supply of water at times of fire and other emergencies.

Lieutenant Gunji arrived at Yokohama on the 6th instant from Chishima on board the steamer Koko Maru. He came, it is reported, on the business of negotiating with foreign firms here with regard to the exportation of tinned cod-fish.

Some 100 students of the Tokyo Mercantile Marine School will start on a voyage round the world towards the end of this month on board the steamer Taisei Maru. The course of the vessel is 29,600 miles, which will be covered in 322 days.

On Monday night a fire occurred quite close to the Kokugi-kwan at Honjo, Tokyo. Two tea-house belonging to the wrestling amphitheatre were entirely destroyed and eight other houses of the same kind partly demolished. No casualties are reported.

The Prince Imperial returned to Tokyo on Wednesday morning from his tour in the Kwan-sai districts.

Mr. Yabe, an expert of the Customs Bureau in the Finance Department, will shortly be ordered to proceed to England. His mission, it is said, is to give minute explanations with regard to the new Japanese tariff.

The protest which the three judges in the Administrative Court presented to Premier Katsura, against the recent resolution of the judges' conference, has been rejected. These three judges were formally dismissed on Wednesday.

Prince Tsai Hsun being expected to arrive at Yokohama on the 24th instant, Vice-Admiral Fujii, Major-General Aoki, Commander Yoshida, Lieut.-Commander Horita, and Captain Arai of the Artillery, have been appointed to act as the reception committee.

At a committee meeting of the Yokohama City Assembly held on the 6th inst., the bill for the construction of municipal tramways was passed without dissent. An application will be presented to the Government through the Municipal Council.

On the evening of the 5th inst. fire broke out in a Chinese tailor's shop, at No. 31, Yamashita-cho, Yokohama. On hearing the cries of a Japanese girl in the house, a policeman and several rikisha-men ran to the spot and extinguished the fire before it took firm hold of the building.

On Monday evening Mayor Arakawa gave a dinner at the Chitose Restaurant to Governor Sufu, Judge Isotani, Chief of the Local Court, Mr. Yamasaki, Director of the Customs, and some 30 other high Government officials in this city. The Mayor made a brief address to which Mr. Isotani replied on behalf of the guests.

The 48 workmen of the Standard Oil Company at Aoki-cho, Yokohama, who made a demonstration on the 5th inst. against the Company, demanding an increase of wages, have failed in carrying out a strike, owing to six of their fellow-workers not consenting to do so. The same evening those 42 workmen who ceased from work were dismissed.

A pair of stone-lanterns to be offered to the late Prince Ito by the regular members of the Seiyun kai, have just been completed. The lanterns which are 25 feet high, are to be set up in front of the Prince's tomb at Tanidare, Tokyo-fu. The prefatory motto consisting of eight Chinese characters was selected by Viscount Suyematsu. The offering function will take place shortly.

The schooner Ryuko Maru (324 tons), which was sailing on Tuesday afternoon a short distance off Tokyo Bay on her way from Shizukawa in Rikuzen province to Tokyo, ran aground on a shoal. The vessel is laden with lumber valued at some 15,000 yen. The crew, 23 in number, were all saved by fishing boats which went to the rescue. The operation of refloating is now being undertaken.

On the 7th instant fire broke out in the house at No. 366, Sagiya, Yokohama, occupied by Mr. H. F. Brown, resulting in the entire destruction of the building. The fire is reported to have been due to a maid-servant dropping a kerosine lamp on the floor. The maid narrowly escaped being badly burned. Mr. Brown's loss is partly covered by insurance, but the loss of some of his personal effects is irreplaceable.

About 12.30 a.m. on Wednesday fire broke out in a gilding workshop owned by Mr. Kubota Kahei at Kitashinagawa, Tokyo. The fire raged so furiously that two buildings and a part of the manager's residence were destroyed in half an hour. The cause of the accident is still under investigation. The buildings of the workshop are insured with the Meiji and Okura Fire Insurance Companies at 12,600 yen, but the loss of articles placed in the shop to be gilded is not yet estimated.

The Court of Cassation has passed judgment in favour of a tobacco manufacturer in Fochigi prefecture, who had been sentenced in the Tokyo court of appeal to pay a fine of 10 yen in connection with the concealment of a leaf of tobacco valued at only one rin. The gist of the decision is that the concealment of an article of such small value cannot be deemed to injure public life, and that the punishment of such trifling offences is contradictory to the spirit of legislation.

On the 7th instant trial ascents were made by the Yamada dirigible at Osaki, near Shinagawa, Tokyo. Three ascents were tried. In the last trial the dirigible succeeded in ascending to a height of 350 metres, moving at first at the rate of six feet a minute against the wind and when the wind abated, at the speed of 24 feet a minute. The dirigible which was in the air about 40 minutes, sailed over a distance of about three miles and came down at the starting point without any accident.

The Yokohama City Assembly held a committee meeting on Monday afternoon to discuss the question of using the Doshigawa for the purpose of furnishing hydro-electric power. According to the opinion of the Chief Engineer of the Yokohama Waterworks, the use of the Doshigawa, which is the source of the water supply, for that purpose will be injurious to the city; and even if the plan be carried out without regard to the interests of the city, it is doubtful whether it can be done with profit or not. After deliberation it was decided that further investigation should be made by the Chief Engineer.

The Tachibada Savings Bank at Minami-inari-machi, Shitaya, Tokyo, was established ten years ago by Mr. Sakai Nissbin and a few other Buddhist priests of the Nichiren Sect with a capital of 50,000 yen at the outset, which was afterwards increased to 75,000 yen. Recently the directors of the Bank having failed in speculation, it is said that almost the whole of the deposits with that bank have been misappropriated. Many depositors have brought actions against the Bank and at length presented an application for an adjudication of bankruptcy. It is believed that the directors will after all be accused on a charge of fraud.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DEMAND UNDER ART. XIII. OF THE PRESS LAW.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Your editorial note in your issue of the 6th inst., referring to the anonymous attacks upon me in your columns, shows that you have suppressed my letter of the 5th inst. also. This on the plea that those attacks were "riposts."

Whatever that may mean, they certainly contained gross actionable libels, and falsehoods for which I shall hold you and their authors responsible. I now demand under Article XIII of the Press Law:

1. That you publish my letter of the 4th inst. in accordance with the provisions of that Article.
2. That you publish my letter of the 5th inst. which was written by me at your Yokohama office and which you refer to in your issue of the 6th inst.
3. That you publish the present letter. Unless these demands are complied with before the 12th inst. I shall be compelled to take action against you in the competent Court to compel you to do what the law requires you to do, and what you yourself admit as a just demand that you should do. I further demand:

- a. That you apologise to me in your paper for the insertion of the two libelous letters by "A German" and "Another German" in your issues of the 4th and 5th inst., and that you unreservedly withdraw your endorsement of the same.
- b. That the said two correspondents, in a prominent place in your paper, unreservedly retract the false and libelous statements referring to me and the "Eastern World" contained in their letters, and that they, over their own and true names and in the same place, unreservedly apologize to me for the insertion of those false and libelous statements in the Japan Mail in terms to be previously approved of by me, and that you communicate these demands to them.

Unless the fair, just and reasonable demands for the protection of my good name are also complied with before the 12th inst., I shall be compelled to enforce them by taking action against you and against you, so far, anonymous German correspondents in a competent Court of Law. Sincerely hoping that your sense of right, fairness and justice, which may momentarily have been misled, will prevail and that I shall not be put to that unpleasant necessity and to the attendant trouble and loss of time.

I am, Sir, yours truly, F. SCHROEDER.

Yokohama, Oct. 7, 1910.

[We publish Mr. Schroeder's letters since he appeals to the law.—ED. J.M.]

IN DEFENCE

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—In the letter which you refuse to publish I can find nothing injurious to the late Count Arco. I have however taken out 9 words which you may possibly have construed in that light, and now beg to request its insertion. I cannot allow myself to be made the object of venomous and anonymous attacks in your valuable paper, nor do I think you ought to allow such attacks to appear without giving me an opportunity for defence. I ask for no more than ordinary fair play.

I am Sir, Yours truly, F. SCHROEDER.

Yokohama, October 5, 1910.

"A SCURRILOUS ATTACK."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I am somewhat surprised that you should have opened your columns to what your correspondent "A German" has correctly named "A Scurrilous Attack" upon me, while you closed your columns to my not anonymous letter, which, it appears, has so deeply offended your "patriotic" but unfortunately anonymous correspondent. Since my letter in the Japan Times appeared over my own signature I think you should at least have refused to insert a libelous anonymous letter directed against me.

I now call upon your correspondent, if he is a man and not a venomous reptile that has to shun the light of the sun to disclose his identity in your columns, and in common fairness I call upon you, Sir, not to lend your columns to further anonymous communications on the subject. I shall not attempt to defend myself against them, but I shall always be ready to defend myself against any one who attacks me with open visor, that is, under, or over, his own name, and show him that I am his master. On the basis of facts, at all events, though not in cowardly anonymous slander.

But how is it that your "patriotic" German correspondent has nursed his wrath so long? And how is it that he has not the courage to put his name to what he evidently would have the public consider to be the defence of a dead friend? How is it, further, that none of the alleged "friends" of the late Count Arco—had the courage to say a word in his defence if they believed him to be the object of unjust attacks when those attacks were made?

Surely, that would have been a grateful task, if not, indeed, a duty. Or was that a duty that can only be fulfilled by anonymous slander, and is that the German way of fighting? If so it will only increase the old distrust in Japan against Germans generally, and if not, "A German's" letter, the letter in question, is a scurrilous attack upon the honour and good name of every German in Japan.

The most amusing part of "A German's" letter, however, are the last words "yours very sincerely." Surely sincerity makes use of strange guises and for strange purposes.

"Blut ist ein gaur besondrer Taft," and so is beer, to patriotic Germans of the stamp of "A German," I wonder how much of that fluid entered the composition of his very sincere letter. "Lieb Vaterland magst ruhig sein" as long as such patriots are ready to fire shots from behind the hedge of anonymity.

I am, Sir, Yours truly, F. SCHROEDER.

Yokohama, October 4, 1910.

RATIONALISM.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—I read "The Disintegration of thought in Japan" in your valuable paper of Oct. 4th, 1910. I was quite surprised that the writer of that article has so completely mistaken the meaning of Rationalism and regret that the religious sect on of the community usually raises the loudest out-cry against Rationalism without investigating its true idea.

Rationalism and its propaganda in this country are only to stimulate inquiry in reference to ethics, theology, philosophy, and to encourage popular interest in the sciences and the various branches of historical research and nothing else. And Rationalism has no connection with any Socialist ideas.

It is a great mistake of Christian apologists, though it was made in behalf of his religion, to destroy the true meaning of Rationalism according to his prejudices. The fact must be insisted upon, that the whole Christian religion, in its very nature, makes for persecution and oppression. We, at the present day, revolt from such inhuman idea. As they know, Jesus Christ was a great socialist—the first great socialist who preached a religion for the world of realities and not for another. We can see that Jesus was a socialist according to his attitude condemning the rich and violating the law of Roman Government. All Christians believe in the Jesus who uttered such "poisonous" doctrines. They all believe that He is a good and loving God for the poor. We Japanese, dislike such a socialist God. The following extract from the Monthly Summary of the Japanese Religious Press in the Japan Mail of March 30th last clearly shows that Christians regard socialism with much favour. It is translated from an article by Dr. Wada, a Buddhist scholar in 'The Trend of Modern Thought.'

"This product of France in the nineteenth century has made wonderful headway in various parts of Europe. Discontent with economic conditions being its origin, it is not a movement that is likely to die out in a hurry. One thing is very noticeable and that is that though in the West most Christians hold aloof from socialism Japanese Christians regard it with much favour." This Christian power, conscious that it can work no miracle to serve itself, does not and did not hesitate to disturb society by its intrigues against Government and seeks to accomplish its ends by alliance with superstition.

Rationalism then will be a good antidote to such vicious teaching as is contained in the Christian Religion.

Enclosing my card, I am, Sir, Yours truly,

"A JAPANESE RATIONAL."

THE PORTUGUESE COLONIES AND THE "BERLINER POST."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The Portuguese nation is (doubtless) under a debt of gratitude to the Berliner Post for its frank suggestion, as reported by Reuter that the Portuguese colonies should now be divided between Germany and England. The Bragança dynasty, which is related to the House of Saxe-Coburg Gotha, is no longer ruling over the country and therefore why not partition the colonies between the two greatest naval powers of Europe.

Austria annexed Bosnia and Herzegovina with the approval of Germany in spite of a solemn treaty guaranteeing the quasi-independence of these two States. Why should such powerful countries as Germany and England remain as mere observers and fold their arms before the feeble newly-born Republic, which in the Berliner Post's opinion, has no claim over the colonies? In these days of enlightenment, nothing is more natural than laying hands on other people's property. The Berliner Post partakes of the notion "la propriété, c'est le vol," in its inverted sense.

It would have been less forcible and perhaps a little more excusable had the Berlin journal said that, out of a desire to inflict revenge on the Republic, Germany and England should at present take possession of the Portuguese colonies. But the Post sees no necessity for going the round-about way and prefers to make brutally the open avowal of its opinion based on the principle of stat pro ratione voluntas; and in order to lessen the magnitude of its utterance, it associates the name of England with an idea born entirely of a German brain.

It would be useless to argue with an authoritative organ of the Post's calibre. Its voice is law in Germany and the world over, and forthwith Germany and England will concert to carry out that journal's views.

The doctrine of morality preached by the Berliner Post cannot but arouse the admiration of the civilized world, coming, as it does, after the repeated assurances made by Germany lately that the extension of her navy has not been effected out of bellicose motives or for purposes of territorial aggrandisement, but merely as "a guarantee of peace."

Being unable to understand German well I have not so far had the pleasure of perusing the Berliner Post, but now that its treasures have been unfolded to me, I must make it a rule to follow closely the sayings of this extremely interesting paper. I simply wonder why its editor has not yet been awarded the much coveted Nobel prize!

Thanking you for the insertion of this letter,

I remain, yours faithfully, X.X.

[We may be permitted to observe that Germany and the Berliner Post are two very different things.—Ed. J.M.]

a piece of luck on Mr. Atkin's part in his final game with Dr. Smith, would have tied for the championship itself. Mr. Blackburne has been playing Chess for fifty years.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

THE REVOLUTION.

DETAILS OF THE OUTBREAK.

London, October 6.

Lisbon.—On the 5th inst. at four in the afternoon, the Republican flag was flying everywhere. When hoisted on the Arsenal and the Town Hall, it was saluted with salvoes from the warships.

A provisional Government has been constituted, with Senor Braga as President, and was saluted with twenty guns.

It was at 1.30 a.m. on Tuesday that the signal for revolt was given. The bugles sounded the assembly and there were shouts of "To arms." The police mobilized, but were attacked and driven back with bombs. The troops were then summoned, but many of them joined the insurgents. A conflict of the most desperate description soon arose, the dead and wounded falling on all sides. The artillery and rifle fire were incessant all night, increasing towards dawn. The electric lighting failed and the fighting went on in the darkness, with the most desperate efforts on the part of the loyalists.

King Manuel during the night left the Palace with four attendants and proceeded to a place of safety. The Queen-mother Amelia is still at Cintra.

The Republican leader Lusebio Ledo on the cessation of the fighting, delivered a speech from the balcony of the Town Hall. He entrusted the policing of the city to the care of the citizens, exhorting them to respect life and property. It is asserted that not a single case of looting has occurred. The banks are guarded by blue-jackets.

PROCLAMATION FROM THE NEW PRESIDENT.

October 7.

Lisbon.—Senor Braga's Government has issued a proclamation to the people to the effect that "the eternal proscription of the maleficent Braganza dynasty is the redemption of an indomitable race whose valour is legendary." This, continues the document, must be the beginning of an epoch of austere morality and immaculate justice.

President Braga has notified the Powers of the proclamation of a Republic, and the establishment of a Provisional Government. He guarantees the public safety.

There are no disturbances in the provinces. Spanish official telegrams declare that provincial troops are marching on Lisbon to the support of the Loyalists.

A yacht with the Queen-Mother Amelie on board has put to sea, the Infante Alfonso embarking at Cascaes. It is believed that the other Royalties will embark at Peniche or Ericeira.

The Foreign Office has no further news. It does not believe that King Manuel is on board a British warship. Communication with Lisbon is cut off by land, and only cables favourable to the Republic are allowed to pass.

Later.

Senor Braga has had a long interview with the British Minister. He assured him of the deepest respect for Great Britain, with whom the Republic would continue a friendly policy.

The conduct of the people of Lisbon was heroic. In the face of the fire of the 3rd artillery regiment which arrived from the provinces in the morning, a column of 2000 men marched the whole width of Avenidad and Liberdade to the mouths of the guns. The artillerymen were intimidated and ceased firing.

THE LANCASHIRE LOCK OUT.

The Cotton lock-out is ended. The mills resume work on Monday.

SETTLEMENT OF GERMAN SHIP-BUILDER'S STRIKE.

London, October 7.

Hamburg shipbuilding workers have accepted the employers' compromise proposals.

PLAN TO MURDER PRINCE TSAI HSUN.

What is believed to have been an attempt to assassinate Prince Tsai Hsun was frustrated when detectives arrested a heavily-armed Chinaman on board the steamer Chiyo Maru, on which the Prince's party sailed for home.

Later.

Reuter's San Francisco correspondent reports that a Chinese named Fong, a member of a revolutionary society, was seized in the act of reaching for a revolver on board the Chiyo Maru, when Prince Tsai was on board. Fong confessed that he intended to kill Prince Tsai Hsun.

PORTUGAL ROYAL FAMILY AT GIBRALTAR.

Reuter's correspondent at Gibraltar reports that the Yacht Amelia, with Queen Amelie and the Infanta Alfonso on board has arrived there. It is reported that King Manuel is also on board.

The news from Lisbon is of the scantiest. The situation appears to be uncertain. Some of the troops have not adhered to the Republic.

The latest dispatches, received at noon to-day, say that the Republic has triumphed throughout the country. The General commanding the entrenched camp at Lisbon has adhered to the Republic.

KING MANUEL IS AT GIBRALTAR.

WELCOMED BY FORTS AND WARSHIPS.

London, October 8.

Reuter's Gibraltar correspondent reports that King Manuel on board the yacht Amelia has arrived there. The forts and warships fired royal salutes, and the Governor boarded the yacht and welcomed the King.

All is quiet at Lisbon. The new Ministers have effective possession of state affairs. The banks have been reopened and business generally resumed.

GERMAN PAPERS ON THE REVOLUTION.

The Berlin Deutsche Tages Zeitung suggests that Great Britain knew and approved of the Portuguese revolution.

The Berliner Post suggests the partition of Portuguese colonies between Germany and England.

The Vossische Zeitung believes England will exploit Portuguese debts as a means of cheaply obtaining the Portuguese colonies.

OFFICIAL REPORT FROM LISBON.

Lisbon.—Official accounts of the flight of Royalties is to the effect that the Republicans assured Their Majesties earliest personal safety and placed a yacht at their disposal, and that they did the same for the Duke Oporto, although he had been taken prisoner, after fighting heroically in the streets at the head of the Royalists.

THE KING'S FLIGHT.

Reuter's Lisbon correspondent states that King Manuel quitted the palace Tuesday at Midnight, by the back door, during the bombardment and proceeded to Cintra, thence to Mafra, where he joined his mother, and grandmother, and all together hastened to Criceira and boarded the yacht.

LEADER OF REVOLUTION COMMITTED SUICIDE.

Reuter reports from Lisbon that Admiral Reis, the leader of the revolution committed suicide, thinking he had failed. The Government is preparing for elections to the Constituent Chamber and has outlined a programme of development of education, decentralization, colonial autonomy, expulsion of monks, nuns and lay instruction, separation of church and state, and strengthening of finances.

The Daily Chronicle has a special telegram to the effect that the Infanta Alfonso at his Villa, at the beginning of the outbreak, telegraphed to England asking for a warship; the cable being cut, an Englishman took the message to the repairing ship which fished up the cable and sent the message.

[A number of words following, referring to appointment of officials, are obscure.—Ed. J.M.]

CHINESE MEAT AT LIVERPOOL.

London, October 9.

Permission has been refused to land at Liverpool, for immediate consumption, 10,000 pigs from China owing to the carcasses not being dressed according to regulations.

GERMAN VIEWS ON THE REVOLUTION.

Berlin.—The Reichsbote reaffirms that Great Britain was a party to the revolutionary plans, and states that the Royalties fled to Gibraltar under compulsion of Great Britain. It continues that the great lesson of the revolution is that every nation or dynasty lowering itself to become the tool of British policy thereby entrusts fate with incalculable machiavellianism.

PORTUGAL'S KING REMAINS AT GIBRALTAR.

London, October 10.

Gibraltar.—The yacht Amelia sails to Lisbon, being State property. King Manuel and the Queen mother Amelie remain as guests of the Governor.

Later.

Gibraltar.—At Mass yesterday the manner of the King of Portugal was calm though dejected, but Queen Amelie laid her head on her arm and sobbed bitterly. The congregation was greatly moved.

Few churches were open in Lisbon yesterday.

SITUATION IN PORTUGAL ON MONDAY.

The Lisbon Government is striving its hardest to end the increasing anti-clerical agitation. Priests appearing on the streets are attacked. Senor Braga occupies one of the Royal Palaces. Telegrams have been received from all colonies adhering to the Republic. Ambassadors have been appointed to Paris, Madrid and Rome. The Republic has formally notified most capitals.

DISTURBANCES IN PERSIA.

Teheran.—Disorder and brigandage are rife in the southern provinces.

THE REVOLUTION.

THE PORTUGUESE ROYALTIES.

London, October 10.

Queen Maria Pia and the Crown Prince Alfonso are guests of Real-Admiral Pelham.

King Manuel and Queen Amelie are expected to leave Gibraltar to-day for Vilamanrique, near Seville, the residence of Queen Amelie's mother, the Comtesse of Paris.

Later.

Gibraltar.—The Italian cruiser Regina Elena has arrived to embark Queen Maria Pia and the Infanta Alfonso for Italy.

King Manuel and Queen Amelie have decided to proceed to England.

THE SITUATION IN LISBON.

October 11.

Lisbon.—Yesterday the people were calm. Festivities were in progress everywhere. Republican flags and emblems were in evidence. Bands played the new Republican national anthem, and the guns used by the revolutionists were used to salute the Republic. Committees from the provinces have greeted the provisional Government.

THE RELIGIOUS ASSOCIATIONS.

At Lisbon the expulsion of monks and nuns is already beginning, children who are entrusted to their care being sent back to their parents.

Later.

A decree declares that the property of the Jesuits becomes State property. Other communions will be disposed of later, according to the eventual relations between Church and the State.

The Vatican has been informed that most of the Portuguese Jesuits will go to Brazil and some to England.

Later.

A decree based on an old law has been gazetted expelling the Jesuits and all the foreign members of their congregations. Portuguese Jesuits abandoning their orders will be allowed to return to their families.

GERMANY AND THE PORTUGUESE COLONIES.

The German press continues to be engrossed by the Portuguese topic. A statement in Berlin denies that Germany has any design on the Azores or the Cape Verde Islands, and declares that the Germans are well aware that these islands are obtainable only by war.

KING MANUEL'S MESSAGE.

Before leaving Portugal, King Manuel wrote a letter to Senor Braga, informing the people that his conscience was clear. He had always done his duty and would always remain a Portuguese at heart. His departure, he added, was in no way an act of abdication.

THE LANCASHIRE LOCK-OUT.

Nearly all the cotton mills have restarted in accordance with the settlement.

FINNISH DIET DISSOLVED.

London, October 10.

The Finnish Diet, which refused to discuss the Russian Ministerial proposals on the 26th ult., has been dissolved. The Tsar ordered the Bill which the Diet refused to discuss to be submitted to the Duma.

ROOSEVELT'S SOUTHERN TOUR.

Mr. Roosevelt, continuing his tour in the Southern States, is repeating the triumphs secured in the Western States.

BOILER MAKERS' LOCKOUT ENDED.

London, October 12.

The conference of employers and men ended in a unanimous agreement to put an end to the ship building and boiler makers' lockout.

DUKE OF CONNAUGHT SAILS FOR SOUTH AFRICA.

The Duke and Duchess of Connaught sailed for the Cape this afternoon on board the Balmoral Castle. They had an enthusiastic send-off.

DR. MORRISON'S ADDRESS IN LONDON.

Dr. Morrison, speaking at a dinner of the Author's Club, dwelt upon the marvellous vitality of China and her infinite possibilities of development. The action of Great Britain in opposing the extension of the Chinese railway westward of the Liao River was wholly unjustifiable and most regrettable, for it created the suspicion, that, in supporting the mistaken policy of Japan, we are failing to protect our immense interests in the continuance of China and maintaining the open door in Manchuria. Despite the great blots in the administration, he took a hopeful view of China's future. It was difficult to understand Great Britain's resenting the extension of China's authority in Tibet. There must, however, be rigid prevention of any interference in Nepal where China has no lawful right. Dr. Morrison concluded by eulogizing the missionaries, and commending British policy in China, except in the matter of the Manchurian railway.

RESEARCH INSTITUTION TO BE ESTABLISHED IN GERMANY.

Berlin.—At the University centenary celebration the Kaiser emphasized the fact that it seemed a sacred duty to establish a research institution. Thereupon, although there were comparatively few present, they subscribed 10,000,000 marks.

SERIOUS CONDITIONS ON FRENCH RAILWAYS.

London, October 12.

A strike has broken out on the French Northern Railway, forty thousand men being involved. Telegraphs and telephones are cut and the mails are transported by motor cars, with the assistance of the police and military, who will endeavour to work the traffic. The strikers demand increased wages and a weekly day of rest.

Later.

Eight thousand employes of the Western State Railway of France struck work last evening. The National Union of Railwaymen has decided to appeal to all lines for a general strike. The Cabinet Council held a meeting and has issued a decree placing all the striking railways on a military basis and ordering the strikers out for military service.

Later.

Paris.—The four main railways are now affected. The eastern railwaymen have struck, the men on the Paris-Lyons-Mediterranean voted a general strike to-night, and the western railway employees have also decided on a general strike. France is almost isolated.

FINLAND'S MILITARY CONTRIBUTION DEMANDED.

Helsingfors.—An Imperial order directs that the balance of Finland's military contribution for 1910, amounting to nine million marks, be paid immediately to the Imperial Treasury.

KING GEORGE SENDS FOR PORTUGAL'S KING.

King George has ordered that the yacht Victoria and Albert proceed to Gibraltar and embark King Manuel and Queen Amélie.

CHINESE LABOUR IN B.C.

London, October 13.

The British Columbian Government has refused the request of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to employ Chinese labourers in the construction of the western portion of the line.

TIENTSIN-PUKOW RAILWAY.

A supplementary loan for the Tientsin-Pukow railway will be issued shortly. It will consist of three million sterling in 5 per cent. (?) bonds, whereof one million will be offered in London.

ANGLO-GERMAN RELATIONS.

Berlin.—The Taegliche Rundschau says that if Britain really values a good understanding with Germany she can prove it by agreeing to give effect to an Anglo-German agreement for the partition of the colonial possessions of decayed Portugal.

PORTUGAL.

A PLAN THAT FAILED.

Later.

It transpires that the Portugal revolutionists intended to break out on the day of King Manuel's start for the northern provinces. The train was to proceed over the frontier without stopping, and then the King was not to be allowed to recross. Meanwhile all the Ministers and others who bade farewell to Manuel II. at Lisbon were to be arrested. A premature outbreak changed the course of events.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

CONSPIRACY AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

London, October 6.

Constantinople.—Seventeen persons have been arrested on a charge of conspiracy, but in default of incriminating evidence they were released.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

London, October 7.

Japanese securities of 1910 are lower, Russian four per cents' are demanded. It is practically arranged that the Chinese Imperial five per cent. Railway loan of three million pounds will be taken up, one million in London and the balance in Berlin.

MR. BALFOUR'S SPEECH.

Mr. Balfour opened the Autumn Campaigning to-day at Edinburgh. His speech was a disappointment to the Unionists who were expecting a fighting lead.

CHOLERA.

New York.—Steamers have brought two cholera cases.

Paris.—Two persons have died at Marseilles from Cholera.

RUSSIAN AERONAUT KILLED.

London, October 8.

St. Petersburg.—Captain Motsievitch fell a thousand meters, after breaking his aeroplane.

STOCK EXCHANGE.

London, October 8.

Japanese securities are dull.

PORTUGUESE SITUATION.

Cintra and Lisbon are normal, although street traffic is suspended and shops closed. Despite the fact that the populace is armed, wonderful order prevails. Senor Costa, Minister of Justice of the Republic telegraphs the Times that the provincial military has finally adhered. The Customs and Government Departments have resumed operations. The Republic intends to insure defences and to become a true serious ally to England. The colonies are to be allowed self-government, free universal suffrage established, the monks and nuns banished, church and state separated, the King and family exiled.

SITUATION IN LISBON.

London, October 10.

A special from Lisbon says that the new Foreign Minister states he embraced Republicanism because he despaired of Monarchism which had fallen through misgovernment. The populace attacked religious houses and troops interfered to protect them. The nuns have been removed.

The Republican organization is working very smoothly and the city has a festive appearance.

PORTUGAL.

London, October 11.

Lisbon.—The country apparently accepts the new situation. The Government has skilfully diverted public interest into the anti-clerical channel. It announces drastic measures proscribing Jesuits and confiscating all monastic properties. Hundreds of nuns have already been restored to their families.

RUMOURS OF REACTIONARY PLOT.

Later.

Lisbon.—There are rumours of a reactionary attempt to cause external complications by mining foreign warships. All the warships were kept under steam during Sunday night.

"THE TIMES" ON THE ANNEXATION.

The Times has a special telegram from Seoul which praises the manner in which Viscount Terauchi has performed the task of annexation. It criticizes the abruptness with which foreigners have been deprived of extra-territorial privileges, and doubts whether the international position of Japan has been strengthened by the annexation, which must create a fresh source of friction with China. It hopes that Japan will not attempt to make Korea a close preserve for developing subsidized industrial undertakings.

REPUBLICAN ORGANIZATION AT LISBON.

London, October 12.

Lisbon is preparing decrees dealing with domestic reform. The military service without exemption is to be extended to juvenile education. The Government is also debating the adjustment of finances. It is officially stated that the casualties in the recent fighting were 65 killed and 728 wounded.

THE RAILWAY STRIKES IN FRANCE.

Paris.—The Northern Railway strike is of a most serious character. It extends over the Western and Eastern state lines. The Premier considers the strike more political and revolutionary than economic. The organizers of the revolt chose the moment when many thousand of the army recruits had just been incorporated. It is a useless and serious task to quell the disorder, as the trikers threaten to disobey the mobilization order summoning reservists for railway duty.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

London, October 13.

On the Stock Exchange Japanese securities are dull.

PORTUGAL.

Lisbon.—The Government announces that, excepting heads of departments, the officials of the Government departments will remain unchanged. The northern districts are peaceful and the Republic is generally accepted. Disgust is felt at the abandonment of the King by pretended monarchical friends.

AUSTRIAN MILITARY ESTIMATES.

Vienna.—The naval and military estimates include a demand of 9,700,000 pounds for extraordinary armaments during the period of the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE IN FRANCE.

Paris.—Resentment against the railway strikers is spreading. Traffic in the northern and western state lines is at a stand still. The War Minister with commendable promptitude ordered 30,000 of the northern men to join the colours for three weeks, thus maintaining the normal working of the line. A further decree places the railway under the immediate control of the War Minister.

(PUBLISHED BY THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

REPUBLICAN OFFICIALS IN PORTUGAL.

October 10.

The following is the new Cabinet: Prime Minister, Senor Braga; Minister of Foreign Affairs, Senor Machado; Minister of Justice, Senor Gomez; Minister of the Army, Senor Baretto; Minister of Home Affairs, Senor Almeda; Minister of the Navy, Senor Asedo.

The Republican Government in Lisbon has declared an amnesty of political prisoners and has appointed Provincial Prefects.

The railway between Spain and Portugal is open. The Spanish Consul at Gibraltar telegraphs that the two Queens Dowager and the Prince Royal reached that place by the America on the 6th instant.

In answer to a question in the Spanish parliament the Prime Minister said that Spain recognizes the King's Government as still in power in Portugal. The Spanish Government has heard that a Republican Government has been established in Portugal but it is not the time to discuss whether that Government shall be recognized or not.

THE SHANGHAI PANIC.

Shanghai, October 10.

The Shanghai Taotai, having been unable to recover the official monies lodged by him in the local banks, was removed from office on the 30th of September, and an Imperial Ordinance directed that the sum deficient should be recovered in 15 or 16 months. The Taotai therefore pressed the banks to refund the amounts deposited with them, and this step caused the closing of 3 banks on the 9th instant, one of which had 25 millions of State deposits. It is feared that some 10 other banks will be dragged down, and there are symptoms of another panic.

PORTUGAL.

London, October 12.

The Republican Revolutionary Party in Portugal having immediately established order, the European money-markets were almost unaffected.

FRANCE.

Lyons, Japanese Consulate.

From the 11th instant the engine-drivers and workmen on the Northern French Railway went on strike, and the operating of the line was severely affected. The Government has sent troops to quell the disturbance.

("DEUTSCHE JAPAN-POST" SERVICE TO THE "JAPAN HERALD.")

PORTUGAL.

Berlin, October 6.

Senator Braga has been nominated President of the provisional Government of the new Republic of Portugal. The proclamation of the new Republic has been announced to the Powers, which have also been informed that the new provisional Government guarantees the maintenance of order. The provinces have declared themselves solidly with the capital. Great Britain will only support the safety of the Royal Family, but remain neutral in all other respects. Germany will only protect the lives and property of her subjects. It is most emphatically denied that the marriage of Princess Victoria Louise, the daughter of the Kaiser, to King Manuel has ever been planned on the German side; this marriage has only been the wish of the Portuguese monarchy. The Spanish Government is sending warships to Numantia and Lisbon and instituting military guards at the frontier. The Spanish Republicans are remaining quiet up to now. King Manuel is neither in the hands of the Republicans, nor at the head of the Monarchists, but probably in safety at a neutral place. The far greater part of the Army has gone over to the Republicans. The Republican flag has been saluted by the artillery troops and the warships in the harbour.

AUSTRIA.

M. Giers, the Russian Minister at Brussels, has been nominated Ambassador at Vienna.

GERMANY.

Professor von Leyden, the famous German bacteriologist, is dead at Berlin at the age of 78 years.

The German Colonial Congress has been opened at Berlin.

DOCK STRIKE AT HAMBURG SETTLED.

Berlin, October 7.

The strike of the dockyard workmen at Hamburg has been settled by mediation, so that the lock-out of the workmen of the metal industry, which had been fixed for October 10th, will not be carried out.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE CROWN PRINCE'S TOUR.

Dr. Georg Wegener, the well-known traveller in the Far East and correspondent of the Koelnische Zeitung, has been called to Berlin to give lectures to the Crown Prince on economic, political and colonial conditions in East Asia as a preparation for his tour to the Far East.

PORTUGAL.

Lisbon, the capital of Portugal, has become fully Republican. Order has been restored, however, after bloody fighting, in which more than a thousand persons were killed. The Republicans are gradually winning over the provinces, but there is still a possibility of a reaction. The port of Oporto has not yet declared itself in favour of the Republicans. All foreign Governments are awaiting the issue.

GERMANY.

Berlin, October 9.

The meeting between the Kaiser and the Tsar will take place at Potsdam in November.

Representatives of all Universities will attend the centenary celebrations of the Berlin University.

Workmen of the dockyards at Hamburg have again resumed regular work.

THE REFUGE ROYALITIES.

The report from England according to which Germany is said to intend to erect coaling stations at the Portuguese colonies of the Azores islands and Madeira is officially contradicted on the German side as a pure invention. The Portuguese colonies have declared themselves in favour of the Republic. King Manuel, the Queen-Dowager and Queen-Grandmother are staying at Gibraltar, where they have fled on board the Royal yacht Amelia, as guests of the Governor. The yacht has returned to Lisbon, being the property of the State.

SIBERIAN MAILS.

Siberian mails, with dates up to Sept. 22nd and 24th ex Yokohama, arrived at Berlin on Oct. 7th and 9th.

ANOTHER AVIATOR KILLED.

Berlin, October 8.

The Russian aviator Matsievitch has been killed by an accident to his aeroplane.

THE RECEPTION OF THE REPUBLIC.

All Powers have declared themselves willing to recognise the new Republic of Portugal after its consolidation has been confirmed. The Catholic Congregations have been dissolved, priests are no longer allowed to walk on the streets in pontifical dress. The Azores islands and Madeira have declared themselves Republican. The Parliament has been dissolved; the new elections are being ordered, after which the definitive election of a President will take place. The new Constitution will have a strong democratic tendency; State and Church will be separated and schools secularized.

GERMANY.

Berlin, October 10.

The Hamburg-America Line and the German Steamship Company Hansa at Bremen have concluded an agreement of union of mutual interest, placing the management of the East Asiatic traffic under the guidance of the former Company, and the Indian traffic under that of the latter.

PORTUGAL.

At Lisbon the expulsion of the monks and nuns has commenced. Attacks have been made by the military and the mob on the monasteries of the Jesuits.

CENTENNIAL OF THE BERLIN UNIVERSITY.

Berlin, October 11.

The centenary celebration of the University at Berlin has been honoured in a most enthusiastic manner in the presence of the Kaiser, Prince Rupprecht of Bayern, the Chancellor, and many high personages. A service, a ceremony in the hall of the University and a torch-light procession of students took place. The Kaiser made a speech, announcing the foundation of a society for the support and maintenance of independent scientific institutions, to the foundation of which noble-minded patrons had already subscribed 10 million marks. He said he trusted that the University of Berlin might always embody the national incorporation of the German spirit.

RECOGNITION BY POWERS.

It is probable that Great Britain will take the lead amongst the Powers in recognising the new Republic of Portugal. An edict of the new Government has been issued ordering the expulsion of the Jesuits and all other religious orders, except those of Portuguese origin. The motto on the new crest of the Republic will be: "Work and order."

FRANCE.

A strike has broken out amongst the minor officials and workmen of the French Northern Railway.

TURKEY.

The revolt of the Druses in Asia Minor has been suppressed by Turkey.

GERMANY.

Berlin, October 12.

The Chancellor, at the great banquet on the occasion of the centenary celebrations of the University at Berlin, made a speech, in which he said that men who are working on behalf of intellectual progress, are at the same time supporting the political construction of a nation. He further said that the University at Berlin had won its high place in the world not by mechanical teaching of the sciences of other nations, but by the free and independent investigations of its scholars.

Governor Truppel of Kiautschou has sent a telegram of congratulation from the German-Chinese High School at Tsingtau. Professors Harnack, Brunner, Schmoller, von Wilamowitz and the physician Fischer have been honoured with the title of Excellency. The Kaiser, Prince Ruprecht of Bayern, the Minister of Education, Herr Dernburg, the Chief Burgomaster of Berlin Kirschner have been created Hon. Doctors of the University.

PORTUGAL.

The total losses in the street fighting at Lisbon are officially stated to be only 65 killed and 728 wounded. The Government declares itself willing to acknowledge all financial liabilities incurred under the old régime.

FRANCE.

The strike on the Northern Railway in France has caused a general strike on all French railway lines.

STRANGE THINGS FROM AMERICA.

SELLING CHILDREN BY AUCTION.

Extraordinary scenes were enacted recently at Circleville, Pennsylvania, as the result of an attempt of the Rev. Thomas Boord, pastor of Wylie-avenue Church, Pittsburg, to sell two of his five children by public auction.

After he had flooded the streets with handbills announcing the weight, ages, and characters of his little son and daughter, the clergyman appeared at a street corner, where 1,000 people had assembled, and proclaimed that the sale was about to start. He informed the crowd that he was the father of five children, whom he was unable to support. He had therefore decided to sell two of them in order to provide them with good homes and himself with enough money to support the other three.

He was allowed, however, to go no further, as the crowd threatened to lynch him. Mr. Boord appeared at his church as usual the following evening to conduct Divine service, but the congregation hissed him out of the church. With tears in his eyes the clergyman subsequently explained to the reporters that the auction sale was merely intended as a striking illustration "to support his campaign for the prohibition of the sale of alcohol."

POISON AT A DINNER PARTY.

New York, September 20.

A tragic dinner party, which has resulted in the dangerous illness of twelve people, of whom one is dying, is occupying the attention of the New York police, who last evening arrested Pierre Heritier, a butler, and his wife, a chamber-maid, on charges of wholesale poisoning.

The prisoners were summarily dismissed a few days ago from the service of Mr. and Mrs. William Searles, wealthy residents of Darien, Connecticut. They accepted their discharge with a bad grace, and the police accuse them of having before leaving poisoned with arsenic a barrel of flour which the cook was using to make some small cakes.

The cakes were served at a dinner party given by Mr. and Mrs. Searles on the same evening. After eating them the entire party fell dangerously ill, and when the doctor arrived he found the cook, a laundry-woman, and six children also suffering from acute symptoms of poisoning. Heritier and his wife when arrested denied the charges.

A NONAGENARIAN AND HIS NURSE.

Mr. John S. Lyle, aged ninety-two, one of the wealthiest men of New Jersey, much surprised his expectant relatives one day last month by secretly marrying Miss Julia Hannon, a beautiful nurse, who is more than sixty years his junior.

The "elopement" of the nonagenarian, who is reputed to be worth between £6,000,000 and £10,000,000, has caused great excitement in New Jersey, where there was much gossip on the couple's clever concealment of their project from knowledge of relatives and neighbours.

Mr. Lyle, who became a widower two years ago, owns a vast and magnificent estate at Tenafly, adjoining which is the estate of the family of his late wife. After amassing a gigantic fortune as partner in one of the largest "department stores" of New York, he retired from business in the early sixties, and devoted himself to the acquisition of real estate which in the course of the succeeding decades has immensely increased in value.

After the death of his wife he retained the services of a pretty nurse who had attended her, declaring that a man who was ninety years of age needed a nurse himself. Under her care the aged millionaire seemed to rejuvenate himself. His bearing became once more erect, and he might be seen daily walking vigorously along the country roads.

One day he and the nurse went driving in his large touring motor-car. A few hours later they appeared before a magistrate at Yonkers, New York, and applied for a marriage licence. The hale old bridegroom asked if the licence could be used in New Jersey. The magistrate replied "No," adding that the licence was good only in New York.

A FATAL DUEL.

New York, September 24.

With their wives, seated in two carriages, as the sole spectators, Mr. Charles Tate and Mr. John Marchant, wealthy and prominent members of old families of Georgia, yesterday fought a duel to the death in a street of Pelham. After the exchange at short range of twelve shots, every one of which found its mark, both men fell dead.

Their bitter quarrel was of long standing, but was intensified by the marriage of Mr. Tate two months ago to the widow of Mr. Frank Marchant, brother of the man whom he killed yesterday and who killed him. Mr. John Marchant opposed the marriage, and on Monday the wives of the two men engaged in a fierce dispute, the result of which, it was freely predicted by the neighbours would be that their husbands would shoot one another at sight.

The encounter occurred while the couples were out driving. No sooner were the carriage abreast of one another than the women began to wrangle afresh, each husband siding with his wife. Finally Mr. Marchant leaped from his carriage to the road and challenged Mr. Tate to follow him.

The other accepted, and the next moment the men were facing each other, revolvers in hand. There was a rapid exchange of shots, and the two duellists sank to the ground. When the neighbours, attracted by the firing, arrived on the scene they found the two women bitterly weeping over the bodies of their husbands.

JUDGES ATTEND PRISON CONFERENCE IN N.Y.

The naval commissioners were not the only Chinese dignitaries on board the liner Manchuria when it arrived at San Francisco. The honourable K. T. King and A. L. Ahlo, judges of the supreme court of China, constituted an imperial commission all by themselves. They are going to Washington to attend the international prison conference which meets at the national capital October 2. Judge King left the Manchuria on the Slocum with the prince, but his brother commissioner remained on board to attend to the customs formalities for himself and Judge King.

Judge Ahlo is only 35 years of age, was educated at Cambridge university, England, and speaks faultless English, with the accent and precision of a college dean. His early life was passed in Honolulu, where his father was a wealthy merchant. He is very much interested in prison reform.

"We have four modern prisons in China," he said; "the newest, largest and best equipped being at Tientsin, where we have more than 800 prisoners. The other prisons are at Mukden, Hankow and Canton. We have made many reforms lately in our system of punishing crime. Among other things we have abolished torture."

The judge explained the object of torture in the past. He said:

"In China, you know, we never punish a man until he confesses the crime with which he has been charged. A little torture expedited matters in stubborn cases."

"How do you get your confessions now?" inquired an interested listener.

"Well," replied the judge, "we do it this way. We take the accused into a perfectly hygienic prison and ask him to confess. If he refuses we probably ask him to kneel."

"Does he confess then?"

"Usually," answered the judge, with a benevolent smile, "you see kneeling becomes very tiresome after the first month or so."

The judge said that he had watched with interest the progress of the local graft trials and said that he had heard all about Abe Ruef and the other defendants.

"How do you treat grafters in China?" he was asked.

"To tell you the truth, he said, and he looked as if he meant it, "we have very little of it in China. Of course, if it ever attained the magnitude that it has in the United States we should be compelled to take steps for its suppression."

"I was reading in one of your papers this afternoon, where a man who had stolen $8,000,000 was sentenced to eight months in prison. It's almost worth it, isn't it?"

"The guilds in China protect our people from much of the kind of graft from which you suffer in the United States. Shortly before I left many people were victimized by bogus rubber land schemes, but the guilds have taken the matter in hand and the next victim will walk into the trap with his eyes open."

AEROPLANE OR DIRIGIBLE IN WAR?

Hitherto, says the Literary Digest, Germany has favoured the dirigible balloon as the best aerial war craft, while France has favoured the aeroplane. Now, however, an expert Germany military authority comes out in favour of the French theory. "We have in the aeroplane a weapon of war which will be quite available in the near future," writes Colonel Gaedke in the Berliner Tageblatt. The Colonel is a military specialist on the staff of the Tageblatt and has contributed many illuminating articles to the columns of that paper. He recommends aeroplanes for their cheapness and gives us a picture of a lumbering dirigible attacked by a swarm of aeroplanes. But, first of all, he pays a gallant compliment to the French mechanicians, and says:

"It is easy to understand the proud joy of Frenchmen who in the domain of aeroplanes, as well as of dirigibles, have blazed a path for the rest of humanity; although this French pride sometimes assumes a form which oversteps the limits of modesty. This, however, must not blind us to the necessity of taking seriously the intentions of the French Army in this matter, for the Government at Paris seems resolved to utilize this new instrument for military purposes, and to create a new arm of the service of great power."

Presupposing that dirigibles and aeroplanes have at last reached practical perfection and technical completeness, he thus speaks of their employment in a military campaign:

"The dirigibles will be the better craft to cross seas, and to a certain point, serve as auxiliaries in naval warfare. They can be employed to drop bombs on the hostile forces and fortresses. The aeroplanes have the great advantage of costing less and can consequently be obtained in larger numbers. They are transported on land with little difficulty; they need not to be inflated with gas; they can be prepared for flight with dispatch and can rise or alight almost anywhere. They are specially adapted for rapid reconnoitering, and, if their number is sufficient, for permanent observation of the enemy. Already, at this present moment, they can do good service, and, if they do not take the place of cavalry, will eventually be enabled to supplement its activities."

He imagines, finally, an aerial battle between aeroplanes and dirigibles. The French, he says, are now taking measures to fit out a large number of such machines, and number counts as much as skill in such conflicts. This is the idea of a battle in the air:

"The dirigibles will be hemmed in by the aeroplanes as by a cloud of locusts. The brave pilots of the lighter machines will endeavour to rise above the dirigible in order to shower it with bombs and attack it with a fusillade of musketry. Staff officers of war will find great advantages in the use of the aeroplane. We hardly know whether aeroplanes will ever be found very efficacious on the field of battle. There are still difficulties to overcome in making them so. Even at a height of 600 yards the aeroplane can be reached by a bullet. Moreover, its shooting must be very uncertain, and the quantity of bombs and ammunition it carries necessarily limited. Nevertheless, one thing is absolutely plain. We have in the aeroplane a weapon of war which will be quite available in the near future. It would be folly to claim that it is already adapted for the transport of bodies of troops, but its military value is none the less to be reckoned with."

should it not be made the fashion for our young people to shoot, fish, and hunt there, to join in the winter sports of the Canadian cities, become acquainted with the leading men and women of the baby Empire which we aspire to keep within the circle of the Imperial domain when it has attained its maturity and felt its strength?

"Such a custom would benefit Canada and the Canadians, it would make for genuine unity by personal acquaintance and social fellowship, and it would be of immense value in training the youth of Britain, by combating snobbery and pettishness, by opening a great vista to the knowledge and imagination of how great results are accomplished and heroic lives are led in far away corners of the earth, with no gallery to play to and with the stern forces of Nature in perpetual competition."

VALUE OF A VISIT TO CANADA.

"A journey across Canada would cost the parents of a young person of the upper classes less than a London season, less than a term at 'Christ Church,'" writes Cecil Bottine in the Nineteenth Century (September). "It is fashionable to 'adore sport,' even when that support takes the virile form of chasing a small ball across a Surrey Common. Canada offers unparalleled opportunities for real sport. Why

BABY A MASS OF ANGRY ERUPTION

Started Like Little Pimples and Soon
Eczema Covered Head and Body —Condition was Really Pitiful—
Parents Got No Rest with Her.

EASILY CURED BY CUTICURA REMEDIES

"My little daughter broke out with eczema when only about three weeks old. Her head and body were one mass of sores. I took her to a chemist and got some ointment for her but it did her no good. I was advised to take her to the hospital but I did not like the thought of it so decided to send for a box of Cuticura Ointment. After using it I saw such an improvement that I decided to give the Cuticura Remedies a full trial. After about three or four days' dressing with the Cuticura Soap and Cuticura Ointment I could see a wonderful improvement with her and, after a treatment with the Cuticura Remedies for about six weeks, all the humour and sores were cleared away. I cannot speak highly enough of Cuticura and I will do all in my power to recommend it to any person suffering with that terrible affliction. I would not be without the Ointment in the house as I find it good for all kinds of sores. Mrs. H. Haynes, near Church, Crich, Derbyshire, England, Nov. 16, 1909."

In a later letter, Mrs. Haynes thus describes her baby's skin trouble: "I never saw anything like it. It came like little pimples on her face, head and hands. Then matter formed and pieces of flesh came out, leaving small holes all over her, and if I had not got the Cuticura Remedies I really believe her little finger nails would have come off. I was afraid to bathe her from the way she used to scream. We got no rest at night with her. Now she is nine months old and her skin is as clear as can be. My friends wonder why it is and I tell them Cuticura Soap and Ointment have done it."

Cuticura is the most economical treatment known for torturing, disfiguring affections of the skin, scalp and hair of infants, children and adults. A single tablet of Cuticura Soap and box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to cure.

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, OCT. 22ND, 1910.

BIRTHS.

TAVERNER.—"On the Sixteenth of October the wife of FRANCIS LACY TAVERNER, 435 A Bluff, of a Son. China papers please copy."

PARLETT.—At St. Peter's, Jersey, on the 27th of September, 1910, the wife of H. G. PARLETT Esq., H.M. Consul at Dairen, of a Son.

MARRIAGE.

CLEMENT.—On Thursday, the 22nd of September, 1910, at Rochester, New York, I NE, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. ERNEST WILSON CLEMENT, to Mr. HARRY EUGENE CLARKE.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

A HEAVY hailstorm was experienced on the 16th instant at Asahigawa, Hokkaido. The thermometer registered 2.9 degrees Cent.

A DAIREN despatch reports that the Mitsui Bussan Kaisha has established a branch office there, with a view to greatly increasing the bean trade.

It is reported that the negotiations between the Japanese Department of Communications and the Great Northern Telegraphic Company of the United States, in connection with purchasing the submarine cable between Tsushima and Fusan will shortly be concluded. The price is believed to have been fixed at 150,000 yen.

THE submarine cable between Tamsui and Nagasaki, extending for a distance of 655 miles, has been completed. Communication will be opened on the 1st proximo.

A MASS meeting of the Japan Sericultural Association was held at Mayebashi on the 14th inst., being attended by no fewer than 5,000 persons. Prince Fushimi, Patron of the Association, was present.

THE steamer Wakamiya Maru, which was reported to have been drifting off Kagoshima on account of the damage to her helm, arrived safely at Saseho on the 16th instant without aid from other vessels. The steamer did not meet the warship Izumo which was sent to her rescue.

GOVERNOR-GENERAL VISCOUNT TERAUCHI, who, with his family and suite, left Seoul on the 16th for home, is expected to return to Tokyo on the 20th instant. After arriving at Shimabashi the Governor-General will immediately repair to the Imperial Palace to report to the Throne on Korean affairs.

A HANKOW telegram says that a private belonging to the new army at Wu Chang fatally shot his battalion-commander on the parade ground. It is said that the private bore a grudge against the officer. It has recently become a common practice among Chinese soldiers to strike their officers or neglect to salute them.

A TELEGRAM from Guatemala, Central America, says a San Francisco despatch to the Kokumin, reports that the Commandant in Anapolpa has imprisoned American and British citizens on a charge of alleged revolution, and confiscated their property. Warships are landing marines. The Commandant threatens to kill foreigners in Anapolpa, if the marines advance.

THE trouble between the Konoike Bank and the Nippon Soy Company, was settled on the 13th instant at the residence of Mr. Harada, Manager of the Tokyo Branch of the Bank. Mr. Harada deducted 30,000 yen from the total amount of the claim, apologising for miscalculation and it was also agreed to reduce the rate of legal interest for delay to four per cent. per annum.

EARLY on the 16th instant over 1,000 people of Nijima and several other villages in Chiba prefecture congregated near Sawara Station to proceed to the Kencho. The disturbance was due to the discontent of these villagers in connection with the measures adopted by the local government to relieve the sufferers from the recent floods. They were carefully admonished by the police and finally dispersed.

ST. LUKE'S HOSPITAL, Tokyo, is very fortunate in having secured the services of Mr. Fenner, Ph. C., as Manager of the St. Luke's Pharmacy, Tsukiji. Mr. Fenner is a graduate in Chemistry and Pharmacy at Ann Arbor University, Michigan, and for several years has conducted a successful Pharmacy in that state. He will at once enter on his duties and the Prescription Department will be under his own personal care.

A VIOLENT storm has since the 9th instant raged in Okinawa prefecture. Investigations made up to the present show that 137 houses have been entirely destroyed and 114 partially demolished. According to an official report, the steamer

Miura Maru was wrecked on Tuesday morning off Nawa harbour. Of 46 passengers 18 landed, eight are missing and four were drowned. Much damage has been done to the crops.

OWING to recent floods in Chiba prefecture, the railway between Kori and Sahara on the Narita line is partly covered with muddy water and the neighbouring rice-fields are inundated. The cost of repairing and first-aid measures is estimated at fifty or sixty thousand yen.

IN connection with the recent trouble in the oil market, the Hochi says that the abolition of the import duty on crude oil is advocated in some quarters in order to increase the output of Japanese oil, so as to cover at least 60 per cent. of the oil consumed in this country.

ANOTHER theft of explosives is reported from Yubari, Hokkaido. During the 2nd and 3rd instant 850 pieces of dynamite and 2,500 percussion-caps were stolen from a storehouse belonging to the Yubari Mining Factory of the Ishikari Coal Company. It is learned that the offence was perpetrated by two men for the purpose of using these explosives in fishery. They are supposed to be well experienced in handling gunpowder.

REPORTS of floods are again received from various prefectures. In Shinano province, Kamisawa district was most seriously affected. The water in Lake Suwa is reported to have risen considerably, with the result that over 100 houses and some 300 cho of rice-fields in the neighbouring localities are inundated. In Saitama prefecture the Ara and Iruma rivers have risen to such considerable heights that the traffic on the Kawagoye Electric Railway has been interrupted since the 13th instant.

THE Standard Oil Company and the Rising Sun Petroleum Company are fighting desperately in the market, each endeavouring to deprive the other of its control. The lowest quotation for tank oil is now 3.20 yen and that for "tiger" brand varies from 3.10 to 3.12 yen; while of the domestic product, the "hat" brand is quoted at 3.24 yen and "blue gem" at 3.1 yen, and in addition a premium of 10 sen per case is offered. A further slump in prices is expected towards the end of this month.

THE jurors at the Brussels Exhibition have awarded 19 Grands Prix to British exhibitors in the classes concerned with books and their production—printing, paper, and binding; and of these the Oxford University Press has obtained no fewer than seven. No other exhibitor obtained more than one Grand Prix in these classes. The Oxford University Press has repeated the success gained at the Paris Exhibition (when three Grands Prix were awarded) in being the only British binding house to obtain the highest possible distinction.

THE Agent of the P. & O. S.N. Co. informs us that the steamer Oriental on her arrival in Shanghai on the 23rd instant will undergo her six-monthly docking and lay up for one voyage. The steamer Borneo will be despatched from this port for Marseilles, London and Antwerp, via ports, at daylight on Tuesday, 1st Nov., and will convey passengers, silk and valuable cargo for transshipment at Shanghai to the mail steamer Arcadia, due in Marseilles by the steamer Macedonia the 10th Dec., and London one week later.

THE TARIFF QUESTION.

Friday, October 14.

In the columns of the Asahi Shimbun we find a very emphatic statement attributed to an influential diplomatist (not a foreign diplomatist but a Japanese official). This gentleman is quoted as declaring that there is not an iota of truth in the rumours recently circulated as to the attitude of the British Government towards the new tariff or as to the intention of the Japanese Cabinet to change the schedule of duties and invite the Diet to endorse the changes. There has not been any formal communication whatever on the subject of the tariff from the British Government. Moreover, the scale of duties was fixed without any reference to the products or manufactures of any one Power, the attention of the drafters having been directed solely to the legitimate interests of Japan in the matters of State revenue and due encouragement of her nascent industries. There is at present no intention whatever on the Japanese Government's part of inviting the Diet to amend any special section of the tariff.

The Chuo Shimbun, which, as our readers are aware, is now the recognized organ of the Seiyukai, quotes an anonymous statesman who speaks in somewhat lugubrious terms of Japan's foreign policy. He alleges that the Minister of Foreign Affairs desired to shorten from 10 years to 8 the period of extended life given to the Korean Tariff, but that the Japanese Ambassador in London objected to be the mouth-piece of such a petty alteration. He was quite willing to negotiate for the immediate inclusion of Korea in the Japanese customs system, but he was reluctant to approach the British Government on any smaller issue. We use the term "negotiate" advisedly, for according to this authority, the Korean tariff question was not settled by Japan by her own fiat, but was solved in conference with Downing Street. The same statesman goes on to say that the Japanese Minister of Foreign Affairs was fain to fall in with the Ambassador's representation in this matter, but that there remains the problem of the new Japanese tariff. The manufacturing districts which will be mainly affected by the increased rates form the very centre of the Liberal Government's power, and if the interest of those districts be ignored, a death-blow will be given to the Asquith Ministry. That would deal a crushing blow to the Anglo-Japanese alliance, and therefore the Foreign Office in Kasumigaseki is in a evil plight. We (Japan Mail) have no hesitation in refusing to give any credence to the assertions attributed to our contemporary's anonymous statesman. We believe that his story is modelled on his own wishes.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun continues its strenuous attack upon the Cabinet in connection with this affair. It declares that if the Cabinet be willing to recognise its responsibility, the question can be easily solved. In other words, our contemporary would have the Ministry resign, whereafter its successors would be untrammelled in approaching the Diet with a new schedule of duties. The Nichi Nichi is also persuaded that it will be found impossible to conclude tariff conventions with other Powers in the face of British opposition. It concludes its article with something very like a menace, which has a strange sound in the columns of a journal generally so sober. That menace is an allusion to the case of Portugal, where a republican revolution was the outcome of the Government's neglect to pay attention to the wishes of parliament. We are curious to hear how the Nichi Nichi Shimbun will explain such an utterance.

Saturday, October 15.

The Kokumin Shimbun quotes a long statement emanating from the Statistical Secretary of the British Free-Trade Union, which statement has been compiled with the view of combating the arguments put forth by Fair-Traders, who make use of the new Japanese tariff as a weapon to support their cause. The Secretary points out that even though England were a protective Power, her protective policy would not assist her in this case. As a matter of fact, her imports from Japan are so very small, compared with her exports to Japan, that no tax imposed on the former could balance a high tariff on the latter. Besides, England's imports from Japan do not compete with any of her own products or manufactures, and therefore these articles could not properly be brought within the scope of a protective tariff. The Secretary goes on to point out that the greatly increased import duties of 1899 did not injuriously affect the sale of British products in Japan. On the contrary, Japan became a better market than ever, and there is no valid reason for expecting that the new tariff will prove more prohibitive than the last was.

Meanwhile the Kokumin, on its own account, flatly denies that the Japanese Government has any intention of seeking parliamentary sanction for a revision of the tariff. If the Government decided to change its fiscal policy radically, it might perhaps be induced to take the very exceptional step of seeking the Diet's consent to revision of a tariff which the same Diet had just duly debated and passed, and which had been officially promulgated; but the Cabinet does not contemplate any such course. Were it practically proved that British products or manufactures would suffer specially from the new tariff, then the Japanese Government, actuated as it is by every desire to consult British convenience, would probably apply itself to devising some remedy. But nothing of the kind has been demonstrated.

The Nichi Nichi quotes Count Okuma, the gist of whose views is that Japanese statesmen allowed themselves to be carried away by the satisfaction of recovering tariff autonomy. They proceeded to exercise the privilege without due regard to consequences, and they thus plunged themselves into a serious dilemma. Still, their fault was due to excess of patriotism, and if they now frankly confessed their error, the country would condone it for the sake of the underlying motive.

It must be confessed that although Count Okuma attributes such a long-suffering disposition to Japanese political parties, they have never given any practical proof of it hitherto. Onlookers can have no difficulty in predicting the fate of a ministry which should approach the Diet cap in hand saying, "Pardon, but we find that we have allowed ourselves to be carried away by a momentary ecstasy and we must beg of you to pardon and correct our error." The Diet's answer would certainly be "Get out," and the country would say "Served them right."

Japanese newspapers find boundless copy-making material in this problem. Day after day they parade some anonymous statesman or diplomatist as an assailant of the Government, and day after day they repeat the old story that the Cabinet is in a crucial dilemma between the necessity of saving its own reputation and the obligation of preserving British good-will. There must be a grain of truth in all the hubbub, but it is probably a small grain. The only thing quite certain is that the Cabinets in Tokyo and in London are equally anxious to find a satisfactory exit from the difficulty.

Sunday, October 16.

The Chuo Shimbun continues its agitation on the subject of the tariff. It devotes itself to creating something like a sensation. The public is informed that this problem has become crucial for both Downing Street and Kasumigaseki; that even the fate of the Anglo-Japanese Alliance hangs in the balance; that the negotiation of any convention between Japan and Great Britain has become extremely difficult, and that other Powers are keenly watching the situation, intending to shape their own policy in accordance with the issue of this crisis. Our contemporary speaks with great assurance, and gives chapter and verse to prove that the Foreign Office in Tokyo has been employing every possible resource, short of actually changing the tariff, to placate England. There is a great deal more to which we need not draw special attention, for, in the face of the explicit semi-official statement that no formal protest has yet been received from the British Government and in the face of the fact that not the least commotion is observable in official circles in Tokyo, we take the Chuo's writings to be an ebullition of party politics in the main, whatever grain of truth they may contain.

The Mainichi Dempo, writing on the same topic, urges the Government to lose no time in taking the nation into its confidence. Our contemporary's idea is that the officials at Kasumigaseki reposed too much faith in British complaisance. They drafted a tariff involving heavy increases of duties without obtaining the previous consent of the nations concerned, and the consequence was that in England's case the first knowledge which the public had of the change was conveyed in the form of a bitter outcry by British manufacturers. Thus the British nation was prejudiced against the arrangement, and nothing could subsequently influence it in the other direction. The Mainichi thinks that the only course now left for the Foreign Office in Tokyo is to take the nation into its confidence.

The Keizai Zasshi (Japan Economist) does not profess to have any special knowledge as to the facts of the dispute, but it has no hesitation in affirming that a free-trade country like England could not possibly have been expected to quietly accept a tariff involving such a large increase of rates. There is no doubt that Japan has the conventional right to impose her will upon Great Britain in this matter, but on the other hand it behoves her to remember that England is her ally. If she deems the alliance to be of less value than the revenue accruing from the amended tariff, well and good. But if not, there is nothing for it except to reduce the rates. The Keizai quotes Mr. Oishi Masami, the Progressist leader, as advising the frank adoption of this cause, and as saying that if the Government boldly approaches the Diet, the latter will show itself amenable. In fact both the Keisai and Mr. Oishi seem to take the extremely superficial view that Japan is free to show special favour to any one Power without incurring the umbrage of the others.

Monday, October 17.

From a statement attributed by the Asahi Shimbun to a certain Japanese diplomatist we learn at last that the newspaper responsible for the original mistranslation of Count Komura's speech in the Diet was the Japan Advertiser. Great care was taken not to betray the source of the error, but it is only just that the saddle should be put on the proper horse. Incorrect translations of Japanese documents and speeches are too common to be greatly censurable, but certainly the blunder in question was one of the most unfortunate that ever was perpetrated. The trouble was that the false translations had been telegraphed to Europe and had found a firm lodgment in the public's head before any contradiction could follow. It was here that the unfortunate delay made by the Yokohama Board of Trade proved so fateful. We ourselves think that Count Komura would have been better advised had he refrained from all reference to any one Power by name, but we frankly confess that no such reflection occurred to us at the time. The diplomat quoted by the Asahi rightly ridicules the notion of interpreting Count Komura's language as indicating in any sense a desire to discriminate against England. That is of course a preposterous notion. The diplomat goes on to explain that people are talking off the book who urge a special reduction of rates to suit the convenience of English manufacturers. Nothing could please Japan more than to make such a reduction. But it has to be remembered that all the Powers enjoying most-favoured nation rights would be entitled to the same reductions, and thus Japan's revenue-making object, which is the prime purpose of the tariff, would be wholly defeated. A remedy must be sought in some other direction, and the Authorities concerned are now engaged in seeking it.

We observe that the Asahi Shimbun marshals the old arguments against protection or free trade. It contends that the real sufferers by these systems are not foreign nations but the protected country itself, since it is upon the consumers that the tax ultimately falls. Yet in Japan, so infantile is the development of legislators' brains and of popular intelligence that the Diet placidly passes a protective tariff and the people accept it without a murmur. The Japanese, in the Asahi's opinion, are behind the times. But after all, according to this theory, all the world with the single exception of England is living outside the pale of pure reason.

The Hochi Shimbun very confidently alleges that the Seiyu-kai members will introduce in the next session of the Diet a bill for amending the tariff in the sense desired by British manufacturers. Our contemporary goes on to say that Count Komura's resignation is certain. His illness has become too severe to permit continued discharge of his onerous duties, and the occasion happens to be just convenient for his resignation. In reading this statement it is wise to remember that the Hochi Shimbun is the organ of the Kokuminto, and that the wish is probably father to the thought. Our own information is the direct opposite.

Tuesday, October 18.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun publishes some remarks which it attributes to Dr. Hatoyama, but we very greatly doubt whether that gentleman ever ventilated opinions so superficial and unpractical. The gist of the learned Professor's alleged idea is that the tariff convention need not be confined to the subject of which it treats, but that rates may be arranged by an interchange of entirely independent privileges. That would of course be quite feasible were two Powers alone concerned, but when a number of Powers have to be simultaneously consulted, it becomes a matter of extreme difficulty to discover a basis of negotiation in special and independent directions. We venture to assert that there is no idea whatever of Count Komura's resignation in connection with this question, nor yet that the Cabinet has any intention of asking the Diet to rescind or alter the bill passed by it last session. If there be any room for criticism of the Ministry's action, it seems to lie in the fact that the opinion of the Diet was taken last session instead of being deferred to the approaching one. Even here, however, we are met by the argument that the Government had to leave itself time for negotiating conventional tariffs with protectionist countries.

Thursday, October 20.

We take the following from the Kokumin Shimbun's English column in confirmation of statements which have already appeared in our own columns:—

The negotiations concerning the revision of Japan's commercial treaties with the Powers are expected to be opened during this autumn, but they have not yet been opened. The reports appearing in some Tokyo papers concerning the British criticisms in regard to the new Japanese tariff are regarded to be incorrect in well-informed circles here. It is next to impossible to revise the new tariff law, already duly passed by the Diet and promulgated, the Japanese authorities concerned do not appear to have any intention to do so. No official remonstrances have been received from London, and it is apparently untrue to say that some steps have been already taken in the Tokyo Ministry of Finance, who recently attended the International Exchange Conference, would have explained the new tariff in Europe. The despatch of Mr. Yabe, a Customs Inspector, to Europe is only to explain technical points, which are difficult to do so in writing, and was under contemplation from the time when the Government compiled the current Budget. It is hardly necessary to say that the return to London of Dr. Midzumachi, Financial Commissioner, is not connected with the tariff question.

With regard to this tariff question the Asahi Shimbun publishes a wonderful assertion. It is to the effect that the Japanese Ambassador in London has forwarded to Foreign Office in Tokyo a list of the articles which British manufacturers desire to have admitted at lower rates than those fixed by the new tariff. These articles are said to number over a thousand. That is the remarkable part of the story.

All kinds of rumours continue to be circulated about this matter. Thus the Mainichi Dempo and the Yorozu Choho both publish an item to the effect that the British Association of Yokohama has forwarded to the Home Government an application asking not only that there shall be no increase of rates, but also that the terms of the existing conventional tariff shall be modified in a sense favourable to imports from Great Britain. We have not heard of any such measure, but we would remind our Japanese contemporaries that this is a question of the utmost importance to resident British merchants. Some Japanese experts, arguing from the experiences of tariff revision in 1899, are persuaded that no diminution of imports will follow the operation of the new rates. But that is a view too sanguine to be readily adopted by the merchants directly concerned. They are bound not to be optimistic nor to take anything for granted. Common prudence compels them to fight for what they believe to be their vital interests, and in so fighting they are not to be for a moment construed as assuming an anti-Japanese attitude. There is no anti or pro in the matter. It is a pure question of economics and arithmetic.

The Yorozu is quite confident that the Japanese Government has definitely decided to yield to British remonstrances. Our Tokyo contemporary goes even so far as to say that the resulting loss of revenue to Japan will be 2 million yen, and that instead of collecting an increased income of 7 millions she will only collect 5. That these statements are altogether previous, if not wholly baseless, may be gathered by comparing them with the above extract from the incomparably better-informed Kokumin Shimbun.

MR. W. J. BRYAN ON PEACE.

Speaking in the Music Hall at Edinburgh on the occasion of the World's Missionary Conference, Mr. W. J. Bryan said, at the close of an eloquent address:—

Many people believed that the best way to bring peace was to make war so expensive that they could not afford to fight. (Laughter.)

"He believed there was a better plan. It was that a nation should trust to the righteousness of its cause and in the wisdom of doing right. By submitting the questions in dispute to investigation, time would be given for the peace sentiment to work and war would be prevented. Man when he was mad talked about what he could do; when he was calm he talked about what he ought to do. (Applause.) Their wars were generally commenced when people were talking about what they could do, and when they were mad they could not tell whether they had been insulted or not. (Laughter.) They should have time to cool down. What nation could afford to stop the commerce of the world while it fought without telling the world why it fought? A nation owed it to its neighbouring nations to come out into the light and let the world know what it was fighting for, and let public opinion get a chance of securing peace without bloodshed. He had faith in the Bible plan, and the nations that believed in peace should be willing to take God at His word and try the plan He had proposed. (Applause.)

"He would like to see his nation make the attempt. He would like to see America say to the world, 'We don't intend to do injustice to anybody, and we don't suspect anybody of an intention to do injustice to us. (Applause.) We are not going to burglarize the world, and we don't therefore expect to equip ourselves with burglars' tools. We are going to say that it is righteousness that exalts a nation, and we will see what the result is.' He believed if America announced to the world that it would not build another battleship, that it was not going to encourage war, but that it was going to stand for peace, he did not think his nation would be in the least danger of attack or trouble from any source if it decided to submit its disputes to investigation. If the nations were tied together by such bonds or treaties, then war would be practically impossible. (Applause.) In emphasizing what the world would gain when slaughter ceased and the era of brotherhood began, Mr. Bryan asked what the world would have lost if Shakespeare had been killed as a soldier boy and Burns had fallen on the battlefield. They could imagine what the world would have gained if war had not consumed so many of their best and bravest." (Applause.)

CHOSEN.

Friday, October 14

Telegrams from Seoul say that the momentary excitement connected with the recent coöperative union of missionary bodies in Seoul has nearly died out. At present the number of converts joining does not exceed 20 or 30 daily. We do not understand this news. If any concerted movement on the part of the missionaries is producing 20 or 30 converts daily, we should call it by a name very different from failure or loss of interest.

It is expected that Viscount Terauchi will leave Seoul for Japan on the 16th instant. His Excellency will of course be accompanied by all his family, and Count and Countess Kodama will also form part of his suite.

We are not surprised to learn that some difficulties are attending the organization of the body of peeresses whose visit to Japan has been so much spoken of during the past few days. Rumour says that the Governor-General has been interesting himself keenly to promote this plan, but that mistaken ideas prevail among several of the ladies concerned, and that if the tour is arranged at all, it will be on a smaller scale than was originally contemplated.

In the Chuo Shimbun we find a note of most perplexing character. Our contemporary says that the Authorities have decided to increase the number of conscripts enrolled yearly so that the 2 Divisions in Korea may become independent of the home army. We have always hitherto supposed that these Korean Divisions were already independent and that they went to make up the 18 Divisions of the regular forces. But the Chuo's note suggests that the Korean garrison has been formed up to the present by drafting detachments from various Divisions of the home army, so that the task of maintaining this garrison did not involve any increase in the number of troops with the colours. Our contemporary's idea is that in future Korea will have 2 Divisions of its own, and the Chuo adds that a similar course will be pursued with regard to the 1½ Divisions constituting the garrison of Formosa. The result of these changes, if they be carried out, would be to raise the strength of the standing army from 18 to 21½ Divisions (independently of the Guards), thus practically adding 3½ Divisions without materially increasing the cost. We reproduce this for the sake of its interest but we do not by any means allege its accuracy.

Saturday, October 15.

It was announced by the Governor-General on the 14th instant that a sum of 10,000 yen would be divided among the families of the late Kim Okkyun and 4 other Korean publicists; while a further sum of 5,000 yen each would be given to the families of 10 others with whose names or careers we are not familiar. This money will be handed over within the next two months in the shape of pension-bearing bonds.

It is stated that when Viscountess Terauchi repaired to the palace on the 13th instant to bid farewell to Princess Li, her Imperial Highness expressed a desire to visit Japan and make the acquaintance of the Empress, to effect which purpose she bespoke the good offices of Viscountess Terauchi. We take this news from the telephonic columns of the Mainichi Dempo.

Sunday, October 16.

It appears that General Viscount Terauchi is to travel via Fusan and that he will reach Tokyo at 11 a.m. on the 20th instant. He will be met by carriages from the Imperial Household and by a guard of honour, and will proceed at once to the palace to report the results of annexation.

We take the following from the Seoul Press, as it is well that the facts about the measure concerned should receive clearer enunciation than they have hitherto obtained from telegraphic notices:—

In addition to individual Koreans who have distinguished themselves by rendering service to the State, municipal and rural districts have had conferred on them special grants by His Majesty's Government. All such grants have been paid not in cash but in 5 per cent. securities. The total grant to each of the provinces stands as follows:—

	Yen.
Kyongki province	2,637,000
North Choongchong province...	794,000
South Choongchong province...	1,489,000
North Chonla province	1,312,000
South Chonla province	1,694,000
North Kyongsang province.....	2,013,000
South Kyongsang province.....	1,606,000
Whanghai province.....	1,094,000
Kangwon province	1,125,000
South Pyongan province.....	1,046,000
North Pyongan province.....	1,149,000
South Hamkyong province.....	883,000
North Hamkyong province ...	556,000

According to Regulations for management of the special grants gazetted here on Saturday, the grants are to be kept in charge of each provincial Governor. They will be founded, the use of the principal is prohibited, and the securities representing the grants are to be placed in the custody of such bank as may be nominated by the Governor-General. Interest on the fund shall be spent for purposes of giving work to people who are without proper means of livelihood, education and relief in bad years. In the disposal of the interest, however, the provincial Governor is required to obtain the approval of the Governor-General. He is also responsible for the production of an annual Budget concerning the fund and a full settlement of the account within three months of the end of each fiscal year.

At the same time Instructions were issued to Governors, Mayors and District Magistrates. After enjoining the exercise of good sense on the part of responsible local officials with a view to the best utilization of the fund the instructions proceed to set forth the objects of the Government in making such a large defrayment. The present special grants, they state, were not made merely in order to relieve present hardships but as a permanent fund so that Koreans might be assisted to recover from the distress long years of abuses and evils have brought upon them. The grants, therefore, are to be devoted towards the giving of employment, education and relief to those who are in need in bad years; and thus to make a fund by which people may perpetually benefit. As a guiding principle for distribution of the interest on the fund (which interest alone can be appropriated for immediate use), the Governor-General orders that three-fifths be devoted to work-giving purposes, one-fifth to education and one-tenth to relief in bad years. In providing work it is further given that the first consideration must be in favour of those belonging to the former official caste known as yangban and literati who are possessed of no adequate means of livelihood, and such enterprises as paper making and sericulture of which branches of industry Chosen already knows something, are recommended as being probably the most suitable for those Koreans. In respect to education, primary schools had better be established, but such schools must be those which promise long continuation being founded on solid ground. When circumstances are adverse to the creation of any new schools or a sufficient number of schools may already be in existence aid may be granted to existing private schools so that they may be gradually brought up to the level of a public primary school. Relief in bad years ought to be given only when the same is deemed unavoidable. The local authorities are warned against the evil of evil-indulgence of the people as such is likely to develop among them a dislike of work. The special grants made to administrative districts aggregate 17,398,000 yen, the districts numbering 12 municipal and 317 rural districts.

It is stated that no less than 50 of the new Korean nobles will set out for Tokyo on the 3rd proximo with the object of returning thanks to the Emperor and of seeing Japan.

Monday, October 17.

It appears to have been decided that on State occasions his Imperial Highness Prince Li O, the last Emperor of Korea, will rank immediately after the Prince Imperial of Japan, while Prince Li Dai-O, as well as the eldest son of Prince Li O, will follow immediately after the Imperial Princes of Japan. The other 2 Korean princes will rank next to the Princes of the Blood holding the rank of Shin-no in Japan.

Tuesday, October 18.

Viscount Terauchi arrived at Shimonoseki on the morning of the 17th instant, and is expected to reach Tokyo on the 20th. On entering the capital his Excellency will at once proceed to the Palace to make his report, and, according to present plans, he will return to Seoul before the close of the year. We need scarcely say that he was interviewed journalistically immediately on his arrival in Japan, but he delegated to Count Kodama the duty of answering questions. The information elicited is published by various Tokyo newspapers in identical terms, so we may presume that it was furnished by a news agency. It appears that everything has progressed satisfactorily in Korea since the act of annexation, and that the bestowal of titles and rewards produced an excellent effect. Their Imperial Highnesses Prince and Princess Li (junior) have determined to visit Japan and are looking forward to the event with much pleasure. The Princess has been studying the Japanese language for sometime under the instruction of Countess Kodama, and the Prince himself has now taken up the same study. Among the newly-created nobles a party of about 50, including several peeresses, have decided to proceed to Japan in time to be present at the Emperor's birthday fetes. They will be under the guidance of Mr. Cho, formerly Minister of Agriculture and Commerce. Count Kodama went on to explain that the recent grant of over 17 million yen for the purpose of encouraging provincial enterprises of production gives an average of about 50,000 yen per district; the interest of this will become available for the purpose indicated. The rapid construction of railways is a matter of prime importance, and endeavours will be made to expedite this work by abbreviating the 11 years' period of the present programme. There are many signs that the people are voluntarily accepting Japanese citizenship. Children may be seen playing with rising-sun flags; men are changing their names to Japanese forms, and the docking of the top knot is a common feature. According to present indications there will be an average of about 30,000 Japanese emigrants yearly, and in view of this fact an accurate land survey is much needed. Steps are being taken to carry out this work, but of course a long time will be required. As for the rumour diligently circulated to the effect that several Seoul newspapers had been bought up and suspended by the Governor-General, Count Kodama denies it emphatically. He alleges that the closing of certain newspaper offices was a natural consequence of amalgamation but that is all there is to be said.

It is stated that the display of Japanese flags at the national festival on the 17th instant was altogether exceptional.

It need hardly be said that great interest attaches to the projected visit of Korean peeresses to Japan. Korean ladies are particularly chary of showing themselves in public, and it was thought a great event when the present Countess Yi Chyong and Viscountess Pak Wipyong ventured to make the journey to Japan some time ago. Ever since then these 2 ladies have been regarded as luminaries in the international sky of the Far-East, and they have lived up to their reputation by diligently studying the Japanese language which they now speak fluently.

We read in the Seoul Press that according to official investigations, the total numbers of Yangpan and Literati in Chosen are 54,217 and 19,175, respectively. Of these no less than 15,758, chiefly Yangpan, are in official service.

The Seoul Press has the following:—

According to statistics compiled by the authorities the total number of Koreans sentenced to death during eleven months ending September this year at the Local Courts in Seoul, Kangju, Hambeung, Pyongyang, Anju, Taiku, Fusan and Kangju is 231 in all. Of the number 35 were convicted of insurrection, 33 of robbery, 9 of robbery and rape, 89 of robbery, killing and wounding, 48 of premeditated murder, 11 of manslaughter, and 7 of escape from prison. Since August this year not one has been sentenced to death in connection with insurrection throughout the country and the number of criminals has also greatly decreased.

Wednesday, October 19.

Tokyo newspapers publish a telegraphic account of the organization of the junior Prince Li's household, but this is a subject which does not possess much interest for our readers. It will be sufficient to note that the Japanese personnel of the staff remains unaltered, and that the household is placed to some extent under the control of the Japanese Kunaisho and of the Governor-General.

The party of Korean peers and peeresses who are about to visit Japan, have received a considerable accession to their numbers, and according to present appearances they will total about fifty, including nearly twenty ladies. One of the ladies, namely, the mother of Baron Cho, is said to be 70 years of age. This interesting party will leave Seoul on the 24th or 25th instant, so as to be in Tokyo in time for the Imperial birthday. Their objects in coming are to thank the Emperor for the titles of nobility bestowed on them and to see Japan. It is said that several of the ladies will have their first experience of railway travelling on this occasion.

Thursday, October 20.

It is said to have been decided officially that all persons belonging to the categories of Yangpan and literati who have not already received titles or other rewards and who are at least sixty years of age, shall have gratuities bestowed on them. Measures are now in progress to ascertain the persons eligible under this arrangement, and it is expected that the number will be very considerable.

THE TAOEL AFFAIR.

The Chinese local authorities have made restitution of all the goods and moneys confiscated in connection with the Taoel trouble. But the Japanese owners of the property allege that it is 7,000 yen short and claim compensation to that amount, as well as to be indemnified for other losses and inconvenience. Some doubts are said to be entertained as to the justice of the above demand, and it is not confidently expected that Japanese officials will assist to assert it.

The Fiji Shimpō publishes a translation from a "far Eastern Russian journal" but does not mention the name of the newspaper. The article contains an account of the Taoel Affair. We read that since the war 30 Japanese tradesmen have resided undisturbed in Taoel, all having shops and carrying on a more or less brisk commerce. Quite suddenly, at a recent date, they received a peremptory order to leave the place and transfer themselves and their belongings within the limits of a foreign settlement. Astonished at this precipitate course, the Japanese repaired to the local Yamen to ascertain the cause of the order and to obtain confirmation or contradiction. They were treated with the greatest rudeness by the Chinese officials, and one of the Japanese became so enraged that he stooped to pick up a stone. Immediately the party was surrounded by a detachment of soldiers, and the Japanese were hurried off to jail, all their valuables having first been taken from them, whether in the form of watches, purses or rings. They were severely beaten and incarcerated in a prison so inexpressibly filthy that the odour was quite unendurable. Twice a day food was served out, but it was of such a nature as to be quite uneatable, and there was nothing for the prisoners to do except to fast. So soon as news of this event reached the nearest Japanese settlement, Tieling, the Consul there dispatched a posse of constables with orders to travel at the utmost speed and to demand the release of their countrymen. The constables covered the distance, 60 miles, in less than a day and a night. But their journey proved futile. The Taoel officials refused to listen to them on the ground that the whole matter had already been reported to Mukden.

We suspect that the above is a somewhat garbled version. It makes too good a case for the Japanese.

This troublesome complication does not yet show any sign of adjustment. The Japanese Consul-General remains firm in his demands that the officials concerned shall be duly punished, and that proper reparation shall be made to the thirteen Japanese who were unlawfully arrested and held in durance for six days. The Chinese reply is that the Japanese were intoxicated when they repaired to the Chihhsien's Yamen and that they had recourse to violence, so that their arrest became a mere matter of self-defence. To this Mr. Koike has made answer by forwarding a full statement of the evidence obtained from the Japanese sufferers, and has accompanied it with an intimation that, failing redress, the five Japanese constables who have been stationed at Taoel for the protection of Japanese life and property will not be withdrawn. The Viceroy appears to be making a great deal of the establishment of a Japanese police station at Taoel. He claims that such a step is emphatically ultra vires.

Our readers remember doubtless that news was received a few days ago of the arrest of two Chinese subjects by the German police in Mukden and their transfer to the Chinese Authorities. The two men being employes of the Japanese Consulate, their surrender was demanded by the latter, but the Chinese declined to comply and are moreover said to be subjecting the two prisoners to a most cruel treatment. The affair is evidently causing some excitement, and the Japanese Consul has carried the question to Peking, thus making it an international issue.

THE CONSTITUTION IN CHINA.

There are somewhat conflicting accounts from Peking as to the prospects of parliamentary institutions in China. One account says that with exception of Mr. Chang, Viceroy of Liangkang, no official of any importance is opposed to shortening the period fixed prior to opening a national assembly, and therefore it is thought probable that the Prince Regent and his advisers will agree to shorten the time of probation to 5 years. Our readers will recall the fact that 9 years was the period of probation originally fixed, and that 3 years of that time have already passed. If then the Prince Regent contemplates substituting 5 years for 9, it would follow that the national assembly will be opened 2 years hence. The Senate has received a petition for shortening the period, but some of the leading members of that body are represented as arguing that before the results of the Senate's working have been in any way tested, it is altogether premature to talk of opening a national assembly. That conservative view is said to prevail with a majority of the Senate, and therefore the petition will not be seriously debated but will be merely accepted and submitted. The Senate meets to-day (18th instant) after an interval of 4 days, its last meeting having been held on the 14th instant. That interval is said to have been strenuously utilised for the purpose of winning Senators to adopt the short-period view.

In the Hochi Shimbun we find an interesting analysis of the situation given by a Japanese who has just returned from Peking. He says that the most keenly watched measure now in the hands of the Senate is the budget for next fiscal year. There is a deficit on the revenue side amounting to 36 million taels—not 50 millions as hitherto reported—and the Government invites the Senate to endorse a programme for making up this deficit by increased taxes on incomes, business and stamps. Such a programme is expected to encounter serious opposition, and the fate of the budget is therefore watched with much anxiety. As to the shortening of the pre-parliamentary period, our contemporary's informant adduces an argument which has hitherto received little notice. It is that the opening of a national assembly will prove little less than a catastrophe to the official class and to the candidates for officialdom. The sole aim of education in China is to equip men for official life. The inevitable consequence is that the ranks of the administration are packed to overflowing, and that there is a constant tendency to increase their occupants. It is certain that one of the first results of popular representation would be to bring about a sweeping reduction in the number of officials, and therefore the longer the opening of a national assembly can be deferred, the better for a large and influential Section of the population. After all only 6 years more have to run before the original programme is consummated, and it is not probable that the Regent and his advisers will consent to any change of a radical character.

THE PANIC IN SHANGHAI.

Friday, October 14.

No signs are yet apparent of any restoration of confidence in Shanghai, neither do later telegrams add much to previous intelligence. It is now stated, however, that the sum of State revenue lodged with the Yuanfeng-Jun was, not 20 million Taels nor yet 15 millions, but only 3 millions. But in addition to this amount we gather that the bank had 8 million Taels belonging to the Canton and Shanghai Customs. The number of banks large and small now said to have closed their door totals 27, and it is feared that the panic will spread to Tientsin. It is confirmed that the Shanghai Chamber of Commerce has asked the Treasury to instruct the Bank of China to give accommodation to the extent of 5 million taels, as the half million already granted for lessening the strain is quite inadequate. In Shanghai, however, foreigners are said to be looking askance even at the paper of the Bank of China, and if confidence in that institution disappears, it will be difficult to find any mechanism for relieving the distress. We learn that the Taotai who was removed from office at the close of last month was named Tsai, and it would seem that the censure of his superiors was evoked in connection with depositing State funds in the Yuanfeng-Jun, for no sooner had he been relieved of official duty than his successor called up the money. This precipitate course was directly responsible for the whole trouble and the general opinion certainly will be that, as the Taotai acted under instructions from the Central Government, the latter must take steps to relieve the crisis. It is curious that in all this complication nothing is heard of the Viceroy.

A telegram to the Mainichi Dempo from Peking says that several banks in the metropolis have closed their doors; that bank paper no longer circulates; that all commercial transactions ceased on the 11th instant, and that altogether the state of affairs is very disquieting. In Canton also, according to the Shogyo Shimpo, the closing of the Yuanfeng-Jun's branch on the 13th instant threw financial circles into a ferment. Here, however, the Viceroy is said to be taking strenuous steps for correcting the situation.

Saturday, October 15.

The new Taotai took over the duties of his office on the 13th instant. His arrival in Shanghai had been anxiously looked for, but as yet there is no intelligence as to the course he intends to pursue. It may be presumed that the action taken in calling up the Government's deposits was directed by the new Taotai, but that the immediate responsibility rested with his locum tenens. The latest analysis of the situation is that the remote causes of the trouble are to be sought in speculation on the share-market, in the depreciation of raw cotton and in unloading by holders of rubber securities. Owing to these various causes the banks had suffered a drain of some 16 million Taels, and were in a distinctly debilitated condition when the new Taotai suddenly called up the State deposits. Had the old Taotai remained in office, a crisis would probably have been averted. Meanwhile one steadying factor is reported, namely, the withdrawal of the foreign banks' refusal to receive Chinese papers. This is said to have had the effect of sensibly easing the situation, but no one yet undertakes to predict what the final outcome will be.

Sunday, October 16.

From the province of Szchuan comes news that the effect of the Shanghai panic have been felt even in that remote district. There was a run on the Kwansu Imperial Bank, and the bank would probably have gone under, had not confidence been restored by timely assistance from the Governor to the extent of 100,000 Taels.

In Nankin also 2 Chinese banks, each having a capital of half a million Taels, have suspended payment; and from Hangchow it is reported that 3 banks are in a very precarious situation.

All the above banks have been brought into trouble solely by the fall of the Yuanfeng-Jun institution.

Meanwhile the Viceroy of the Two Kiang has informed the Shanghai Taotai and the Chinese Chamber of Commerce there that he is under instructions from the Council of State in Peking to take steps for relieving the tension of the financial situation. His Excellency adds that he has opened negotiations with the proper quarters for the above purpose, and cautions the people not to be led away by idle rumours in the interval. Doubtless this step will produce a most wholesome effect.

A member of the Chinese Chamber of Commerce at Shanghai is quoted as saying that according to his information the Prince Regent has ordered the Bank of China (the Ta-Tsing Bank) to put up a sum of 3 million Taels and the Bank of Communications to find 2 million Taels, so that 5 millions will be at once available to check the spread of the panic.

The telegraph does not say what measure of relief has been afforded by the above steps. From Canton, however, comes intelligence that the efforts of Viceroy Yuan have been unsuccessful in restoring confidence and that a serious crisis is apprehended.

Monday, October 17.

The telegraph says that, so far as Peking is concerned, the effects of the monetary crisis in Shanghai show a tendency to abate, but in the meanwhile the strain upon numerous Chinese banks and exchanges throughout the Empire is very severe. It is apprehended that if this state of affairs assumes larger dimensions, foreign trade may be seriously affected, and the consuls in Shanghai are therefore urging the Taotai to take speedy steps for relaxing the tension. Another telegram from Shanghai says that the credit of the Chinese banks has been greatly impaired since the fall of the Yuanfeng-Jun, and the immediate consequence is that many Chinese are transferring their money to current account or fixed deposit in the Japanese Specie Bank and other foreign institutions. Meanwhile nothing is said as to the nature of the measures contemplated in Shanghai. Apparently the Peking Government's assignment of 5 million taels is thought sufficient to meet the emergency.

Tuesday, October 18.

It was expected that Mr. Chang, Viceroy of Liangkang, would arrive in Shanghai on the 18th instant in order to confer with the local Chamber of Commerce and other financial Authorities as to the best means of dealing with the monetary crisis. Meanwhile rumour says that the Hongkong Shanghai Bank has agreed to give accommodation to the extent of 2 million taels on the security of the Taotai. Whether this sum is to be supplementary to the 5 million taels which the Central Government is said to have authorised the Bank of China to advance, the telegraph does not state.

From Canton the intelligence is decidedly reassuring. Originally symptoms of panic made themselves very apparent, but owing to judicious and timely measures taken by the Authorities, a feeling of confidence has been restored, and the market shows signs of reverting to a normal condition.

Wednesday, October 19.

There is no special news this morning as to the progress of events in Shanghai. Viceroy Chang reached that place on the 18th instant and is expected to remain there for several days. Meanwhile various consultations are being held and strenuous efforts made to ease the monetary situation, and on the whole there seems to be fair hope of success.

From Canton comes confirmation of the news that, owing to adroit and timely measures on the part of the officials, anything like a panic there was successfully averted.

Thursday, October 20.

The Chinese Authorities in Shanghai are evidently taking vigorous steps to stem the panic. It is stated that through the intervention of the foreign Consuls the foreign banks have agreed to accept Chinese paper. The new Taotai appears to have exerted himself strenuously in this matter. As for the Viceroy, who arrived at Shanghai a few days ago, he has issued a proclamation warning the people against being misled by idle rumours, and declaring that any one spreading such rumours shall be dealt with according to law. A telegram from Shanghai states that the Department of Posts and Telegraphs has borrowed 1,200,000 yen from the Specie Bank to assist in meeting the emergency, and that the Central Bank of China, acting under instructions from Peking, has contributed 1,000,000 Taels in silver for the same purpose. It is therefore thought that the worst of the crisis is over.

From Canton the news is that the local officials have practically concluded negotiations with the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank for a loan of 3,000,000 Taels which will be applied to ease the situation.

In consequence of the loss of Customs revenue that has resulted from this panic, the Government in Peking is said to have issued instructions that in future the moneys collected by the Customs shall be deposited with the Bank of China only and shall not be entrusted to any private bank.

THE CHINESE SENATE.

On the 14th instant the Senate in Peking held its fourth meeting. It is evident that public interest in the proceedings is on the increase, for the visitors on the 14th instant totalled 150. The proceedings commenced with an announcement of measures to be hereafter submitted to the House, and it is noticeable that among them was a petition for the speedy opening of the national assembly.

The order of the day was then taken, and a representative of the popular party questioned the Government as to the time when the budget would be submitted to the House. He is said to have received in reply a verbal assurance that no time would be lost in taking that step.

The next measure on the list was a government bill for amending the local educational system. An explanation of the measure was given by Mr. Tang, president of the Board of Education, and the telegraph states that his venerable appearance, his lucid language and his enlightened views produced a profound impression on the Senate, and showed him to be a worthy occupant of his important post. Subsequently the Government delegates were subjected to a shower of questions from the representatives of the popular party, and a two-hours debate was required before agreement could be reached for handing the bill to a special committee. It was noted that in the course of this debate many references were made to the educational system of Japan. This proceeding was followed by the first reading of two official bills for the protection of copyright and the control of newspapers. With regard to these measures, also the explanations and arguments of the Government delegates are spoken of in the highest terms. The Senate rose at 5 p.m., having sat continuously for three hours. Prince Su was in his place as usual, and three other Presidents of Boards were also present. In fact it would appear that the unfavourable reports originally published with reference to this first step towards parliamentary institutions in China were very premature, if not wholly baseless.

The proceedings of this august body are becoming very interesting. It met for the fifth time on the 17th instant and in the absence of the President, Prince Pu Lun, the Vice-President took the chair. The first business to be transacted was to consider the draft of a bill for the commercial and industrial development of countries outside the Great Wall, that is to say Mongolia, Tibet and Ili. It appears to have been the Government's original idea that State assistance should be given on a large scale for this purpose, but, owing to the difficulty of finding money, the officials concerned finally decided that the measure should take the form of a bill providing for the establishment of private companies and banks which should devote themselves to the purpose in view. It would appear, however, that the project had not received adequate official consideration before being submitted to the Senate. Thus, while providing for the investigation of Mongolian conditions, it made no allusion to Tibet, and the Government delegate in charge of the bill seems to have been unable to explain this defect. The result was that the Senate became somewhat clamorous and was with difficulty induced to submit the measure to a special committee, the prevalent view being that the bill betrayed considerable carelessness on the part of the Government.

This discussion occupied the whole forenoon, and in the afternoon session still greater excitement was roused in connection with a bill for the enforcement of the stamp tax in the province of Hunan. The particulars of this measure are not telegraphed to Tokyo, but we gather that it caused much opposition. There being no party lines in the Senate, each speaker represents his own individual views, and the result is a veritable case of quot homines tot sententiae. One member, Mr. Lai, is said to have distinguished himself as emphatically leader of the people against the Government. The President proved quite unable to preserve order, and the ringing of his bell became a common feature of the debate. The meeting closed at half past six without having arrived at any decision, and altogether the experiences of this 18th of October were not of a nature to reconcile the Government to the programme of hastening the opening of a national assembly.

THE RAILWAY LOAN.

It will be remembered that Mr. Jui Cheng, Viceroy of Hukwang, and Mr. Shih Liang, Viceroy of Mukden, recently memorialised the Throne in the sense that the wisest plan to pursue with regard to the railway loan would be to have the Central Government negotiate the transaction on State credit with some one foreign Power, thereafter dividing the proceeds of the loan among the localities concerned. It is now stated that the Viceroys and Governors of the regions affected are favourable to this plan, but they show no disposition to shoulder the resulting responsibility, and the Central Government naturally declines to take the whole burden on its back. Of course it is very evident that to deal with one Power alone in such matters would not be without advantages from China's point of view. More especially is this true if the Power chosen were either the United States or Germany which are regarded for the moment as the one potential bulwark between the Middle Kingdom and the eventualities resulting from the Russo-Japanese alliance. But no one can suppose that the other Powers, which have at least as good a right as Germany or the United States, would consent to efface themselves at China's bidding. England's foreign policy must become very much more weakened than it is at present or than it is ever likely to become, before she tamely agrees to be set aside in matters connected with the development of the Yangtze Valley. It is not England's custom to bluster but her silence must not be interpreted as a complete abandonment of rights which if they have validity in any case, are valid in her's.

Rumours are again current to the effect that negotiations are in progress between the Viceroy of Manchuria and the syndicate of American capitalists represented by Mr. ex-Consul Cloud for a loan on account of the construction of railways in the Three Eastern Provinces. This is a very much smaller project than the Chinchow-Aigun scheme, the sum involved being only 20 million taels. What lines of railway are actually contemplated the telegram does not say, nor is it a matter of prime importance, for the real object of the loan is understood to be relief of the finances of Manchuria.

Another telegraphic message indicates that the above programme has very little chance of being carried out. The Central Government is understood to be seriously debating the expediency of itself becoming the channel for importing foreign money for purposes of railway construction. Better terms and greater uniformity could be secured thus than by allowing different localities to negotiate independent loans on their own account. Therefore it is not thought at all probable that the Peking authorities will endorse the Mukden Viceroy's idea of a separate loan for Manchuria.

BRITISH ASSOCIATION OF JAPAN.

The Tokyo correspondent of the New York Herald is said (Munichi Dempo's telegrams) to have wired to his newspaper that the British Association of Japan has formulated several requests for submission to the home Government in connection with the pending negotiation of commercial conventions. These requests go a great deal further in the direction of securing privileges than did the Revised Treaty of 1894. The first request is that all restrictions should be removed from ownership of land by British subjects. The second, that British subjects resident in Japan should be eligible for admission to membership of local assemblies. The third, that British subjects should enjoy the same rights as Japanese subjects in engaging in enterprises assisted by the Japanese Government. The fourth, that the coastwise carrying trade should be thrown open completely to vessels flying the British flag. The fifth, that assurances should be obtained from the Japanese Government of its intention to revise the tariff convention. The sixth, that all obstacles should be withdrawn to the practice of medicine by duly qualified British subjects. The seventh, that liberty of publication should be given to all English newspapers in Japan. The correspondent alleges that the Association concludes by claiming that the dignity of Great Britain is concerned in procuring for her subjects in Japan a status equal to that held by Japanese subjects.

This is the first we have heard of such a representation, and we greatly doubt its general accuracy, as some of the items are obviously incorrect.

MR. TANG SHAO-YI.

His Excellency Mr. Tang, President of the Board of Posts and Telegraphs, reached Peking on the 17th instant and had a brilliant reception. Mr. Tang is certainly one of the men of the hour. His career has been somewhat chequered but his connection with Communications has been a feature of his record. He has now to handle the difficult problem of railways in the Yangtze valley and of foreign loans connected with them. Public opinion therefore indicates him as likely to be appointed President of the Board of Foreign Affairs, in which case it is expected that he will be succeeded at the Board of Posts and Telegraphs by Mr. Tsou Chialai. Mr. Tang's first connection with foreign affairs was when he became junior Vice-President of that Board in 1905 and he continued to act in that capacity for 2 years, becoming, however, Vice-President in 1906. It was he that the Chinese Government selected in the year 1900 to proceed to Washington as Special Envoy in order to convey China's thanks to the United States for waiving a part of the Boxer indemnity. It was noticeable that among the numerous persons who assembled to greet Mr. Tang representatives of foreign capitalists were conspicuous by their total absence, and this remarkable feature was attributed to precautions adopted by Mr. Tang himself, he being desirous to avoid all public association with the agents of money-lending foreign syndicates.

Mr. D. S. del Deo has been appointed Chilean Consul-General at Yokohama, to succeed Mr. E. P. Vergera.

THE NEW FACTORY LAW.

It will be remembered that the draft of a factory law introduced by the Government in the last session of the Diet was thrown out as an invertebrate measure. We now read that the draft of an amended bill has been prepared, and that public opinion will soon be invited as to its provisions. Mr. Noda, Chief of the Epidemic Preventive Bureau in the Home Department, is quoted as explaining that the chief purpose of this new law is sanitation. The number of hands employed in factories having more than 10 workmen totals 700,000, and out of these 63 per-cent. are women. Last year's statistics show that there were 1,068 invalids among the women and 767 among the men. These figures are twice or three times as great as those of Germany, where the sanitary arrangements in factories are a model, and the Government thinks that its energies should be directed chiefly to this phase of the problem.

This important measure was published on the 18th instant in order to obtain the opinion of employers and experts before submitting the bill to the Diet. The chief provisions are that children under twelve years of age must not be employed at all; that girls of any age or youths under sixteen may not be kept at work for more than twelve hours daily, or made to work between 10 p.m. and 4 a.m. without special reason; or be given less than two days holidays per month, or less than 30 minutes recess during a day of six hours' work, or less than one hour's recess in a day of ten hours' work; and must not be employed in work that is dangerous or insanitary.

The above is the fourth bill of the kind which the Government has drafted. It is intended to apply to all factories employing ten hands or upwards, and its provisions have been brought into strict accord with Occidental legislation on this subject. It will be observed that night work in the case of lads under sixteen and females of any age is not absolutely interdicted: it is allowed in special cases. These cases are when the nature of the work renders night employment necessary and where proper shifts can be arranged. The main objection raised to the Government's last bill was that night-work was altogether abolished in the case of lads and women, but this veto is now modified by the inclusion of the saving clause "special reasons." Moreover the bill provides that, after three periods of five years each, night labour for such person shall cease altogether, the restrictions leading up to cessation being applied in part each term.

Mr. Wada, President of the Fuji Gassed Spinning Company, is quoted as saying that mill-owners will not object to the legislation now proposed. The quantity of yarn produced annually in Japan is 1,200,000 bales, of which two-thirds are consumed at home and one-third goes abroad. If night-labour were forbidden, as it was in the last session's bill, the export of the yarn would cease; many operatives would be thrown out of employ, and serious economic effects would result. But the bill as now modified is not open to that objection. Another improvement is that official interference has been conspicuously curtailed. The former bill provided for such interference on many occasions, but the present draft is not marked by this defect.

On the whole the opinion of employers seems to be favourable, but the Chuo Shimbun, which is now the organ of the Seiyu-kai, finds great fault with the discretionary power still reserved to officialdom, and is altogether opposed to the bill as premature. Our contemporary's argument, briefly stated, is that Japan has not yet grown up to a standard warranting such legislation. The fact is adduced that European manufacturers are setting up factories in China and India for the express purpose of being able to employ labour without any restrictions, and therefore cheaply. Japan has to compete with the products of these factories, and it is premature to subject her to the restrictions operative in Occidental countries where the conditions are very different.

There is a difference of opinion with regard to the expediency and sufficiency of the proposed factory law. Dr. Hatoyama is quoted as saying that such legislation is premature, and that there is not the slightest occasion for Japan to dress herself in ill-fitting garments merely for the sake of appearing pretty in foreign eyes. The distinguished publicist believes that the old time relations of benevolence and good-will still exist largely among employers and employed in Japan, and that there is no occasion yet to enact laws for the protection of workmen, especially since that course cannot be pursued without detriment to the nascent industries of the country. The Nichi Nichi Shimbun, on the other hand, maintains that a good thing cannot be done too soon, and points out that it will be too late to enact preventive measures after strikes and lock-outs have become common. In our last issue we quoted the Chuo as opposing the projected law, and we inferred that the trend of Seiyu-kai thought might be gathered from that paper's utterances. But we are now inclined to think that the Seiyu-kai are not so hostile to the bill as to reject it en bloc. They will probably pass it with some amendments.

The Hochi Shimbun approves on the whole, and protests against the idea of tinkering the law in deference to the views of divergent interests. Already the drafters of the bill have modified it in accordance with the objections raised by the Diet last session, and further modifications may easily deprive the measure of all backbone.

The same journal points out, however, that discretionary power to determine the nature of the factories to which the law is applicable should not be left in the hands of officialdom. The Mainichi Dempo also approves. It considers legislation to be inevitable, and the sooner the task is approached the easier it will be to accomplish.

We are inclined to think, however, that when the bill comes before the Diet strong opposition will develop itself towards the clause providing for the gradual abolition of night-work altogether. It will be remembered that the plan now in contemplation is to achieve this abolition by five yearly installments, which will terminate fifteen years after the date of the law going into operation. It is a very doubtful question whether night-work ought to be prohibited at all. If people are willing to work at night, in consideration of substantial pay, that they should be free to do so is the opinion of many economists. At any rate one great advantage possessed by Japanese manufacturers is that they can keep their machines going for the whole 24 hours, and

Mr. Tanabe, President of the Nisshin Spinning Company, will probably find many supporters when he points out that if this advantage is to be done away with, Japanese manufactures will receive a heavy blow.

We observe that there is likely to be some conflict between the educational authorities and the framers of the bill. The former insist that the earliest employable age should be made 13 instead of 12 in order to ensure the complete satisfaction of scholastic obligations. But the Department of Agriculture and Commerce does not seem disposed to entertain that view.

UNITED STATES AND JAPAN.

The Nippon is disposed to interpret President Taft's Panama project as directed against Japan. The President has failed in his attempt to obtain a substantial grant from Congress for the purpose of fortifying the canal and its zones, but he intends to repeat his requisition in a still more substantial form in the next session of Congress. Side by side with this intelligence comes news that at a banquet given in San Francisco a prominent officer of the U. S. Navy spoke of Pearl Island in the Hawaiian group as the Gibraltar of the Pacific, and clearly indicated that Japan is the potential enemy against whom America's preparations must be directed. He dwelt upon the unwisdom of breaking up a fleet into small squadrons, and said that had not Russia followed this fatal policy in her war with Japan, she would probably not have been defeated. We do not gather how this American officer proposed to obviate the evil of separation, nor does the question possess very great importance, for after the opening of the Panama Canal the Atlantic and the Pacific Squadrons of the United States will be able to act in concert. The regrettable point is that this talk of war between Japan and the United States should find its way into the columns of leading journals. Incalculable mischief has thus been done to the relations between England and Germany, and it would be infinitely regrettable were a similar state of affairs produced between the United States and Japan.

THE CONVERSION OF THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Our readers are aware that there is at present in progress a Treasury transaction for dealing with the second instalment of the 5-per cent. war bonds, as well as the Tobacco Monopoly bonds. This operation commenced at the close of last month. The total sum involved is 34 million yen, and holders of the bonds are invited either to receive payment in ready money or to convert their scrip on a 4-per cent. basis. It appears that up to the 13th instant the applications for repayment totalled 28,541,400 yen, out of which aggregate the application for ready-money payment amounted to 26,456,807 yen. Thus it appears probable that conversion on a 4 per cent. basis will not be effected to any appreciable degree in the case of these bonds. This is of course interpreted as evidence that the Treasury programme of conversion no longer suits the time. But it appears to us that there is another reason, namely, that just at the moment a much more profitable investment offers in the form of the debentures of the Steel Foundry and of the Hypothec Bank.

THE BUDGET FOR NEXT YEAR.

Saturday, October 15.

We read in the Shogyo Shimpō that the Budget for the fiscal year has been drawn up by the various departments and that the Prime Minister will probably make a declaration of the Cabinet's policy at the autumnal meeting of the Clearing Houses, which is expected to take place in Tokyo on the 23rd instant.

In connection with the Budget we find in the Niroku Shimpō a statement that the Prime Minister has decided to abolish his practice of privately communicating the contents of the Budget to the members of both Houses before the opening of the Diet. It will be remembered that a party in the House of Representatives condemned the holding of meetings (Naijikkwai) for this purpose, though the House of Peers approved of that course. The only way to satisfy both sides is to abandon any issue of formal invitations to the Houses, and merely to explain the Budget privately to any members who may desire information.

Sunday, October 16.

With regard to the above, we read in the Kokumin Shimbun that the Budget for 1911-12 is framed on precisely the same lines as last year's budget. In other words, all recourse to loans is strictly avoided; the expenditures are limited to the revenue; no new public works are undertaken; no periods are fixed for the completion of those already commenced, their progress being made to depend strictly on available funds; the grants in aid of sufferers by the inundations and of expenses incurred on account of the annexation of Korean are included in supplementary budgets, and the policy of liquidating a large block of the national debt is adhered to.

Monday, October 17.

The Government's appropriations and expenditures on account of public works and other extraordinary undertakings in the budget for next year are published by Tokyo journals. The following are the leading figures:—

INCOME	Yen.
1. Increase of ordinary income	12,698,000
2. Sum saved from the fiscal year 1908-9	20,000,000
3. Increment from taxation in the fiscal year 1911-12	10,000,000
4. Increased customs revenue	5,000,000
Total	47,698,000

As for the expenditures, they may be conveniently divided into 2 sections, namely, those incurred during the current year, which will have to receive the post-facto approval of the Diet, and those to be incurred during the next fiscal year. To the former category belong the following:—

	Yen.
1. On account of the floods	4,000,000
2. " " of Korea in 1910	3,000,000
3. " " " during the first 3 months of next year	2,000,000
4. Supplementary expenses during 1909-10	3,000,000
Total	12,000,000

This leaves 35 millions approximately to be carried to next year's revenue and this money will be applied as follows:—

	Yen.
1. Naval increment	15,000,000
2. Assistance on account of the floods ..	3,000,000
3. Increase of irrigation expenditures ...	2,000,000
4. On account of Korean administration...	3,000,000
5. " " " State bonds (interest)	500,000
6. Increase of the iron foundry	3,000,000
7. Redemption of National debts	7,000,000

Except the above no increased expenditures of any kind will be sanctioned, and further it will be observed that the Cabinet adheres to its policy of not making any appropriations on account of continuing works beyond the fiscal year immediately concerned.

THE GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL POLICY.

It is not to be denied that a strong movement is on foot to impair the popularity of the present Cabinet. We have noted from time to time the attacks which have now become fashionable to make on the Government's financial policy, and in this context we observe a new complaint formulated by the Mainichi Dempo, which has constituted itself a leader of the assault. It says that Japanese 4-per cents. have fallen to a lower price on foreign markets than they command in Japan, and that in consequence they are being exported to this country for sale from London, Paris, Berlin, and New York. This is adduced as a new proof of the Cabinet's bungling. We admire the faith that our contemporary reposes in official omnipotence.

The Nichi Nichi continues its crusade against the Cabinet and does not hesitate to describe Marquis Katsura's financial policy as nationally destructive. We cannot choose but note that all this onset bears a close resemblance to post-facto wisdom. When Marquis Katsura organized the meetings of bankers and business-men, whose advice and coöperation he sought, the Tokyo newspapers found nothing too good to say of his policy. Then, however, the money market seemed to be lit with a gleam of returning sunshine. But now that gloom has settled down upon the horizon, the steps which were greeted then with acclaim are to-day denounced as suicidal. We do not recognise the generally level-headed Nichi Nichi Shimbun in its present attitude. The Chuo Shimbun is in the same camp. Its great target of attack is the inconsistency of a policy which, while avowedly refraining from contracting any new debts, privately uses the money entrusted to it through the postal savings banks, and while with one hand paying back large blocks of the national debt, is, with the other, issuing debentures and forming costly plans for the development of the country's material resources. The Chuo's utterances have importance, as they may be assumed to represent the views of the Seiyukai, in part at any rate.

There is beginning to be talk about difficulties likely to attend the Treasury's operations next year in connection with the liquidation of the national debts. The total sum which has to be dealt with in 1911 is 280 million yen, and out of this aggregate the Government can easily contrive to convert on a 4-per-cent. basis 100 millions over which it has partial or complete control. As for the remaining 180 millions, the idea is to treat the operation in three installments, on the hypothesis that two-thirds of the bondholders will be willing to commute on a 4 per cent. basis, and the remaining one third alone will have to be paid in ready money. But the Mainichi Dempo now begins to doubt whether this programme will be feasible. A corresponding transaction on a smaller scale is now in operation, and has thus far produced applicants for conversion to the extent of 10 per cent. only. Of course this may, and is, probably due to the opportunity which offers of obtaining better terms elsewhere, but it is probable that similar opportunities will present themselves on a larger scale next year when big sums will have to be put up in connection with new enterprises. It does not appear to occur to our contemporary that should this forecast prove correct, the Government will merely have to tender more favourable terms.

CHINA.

There is said to be a new complication in the palace of Peking. It has its origin in an attempt to replace the old palace guard with troops drilled and equipped after the new system. This removal was not tamely suffered by the old guards. They made interest with the Empress Dowager to oppose the project, and her Majesty is alleged to have taken up their cause, so that a very uneasy feeling prevails in the palace. The Prince Regent is said to be unable to deal with the situation, and the relations between the Princess Regent and the Empress Dowager are again strained. It is between these two ladies that sharp rivalry is said to exist, and some onlookers think it very probable that a serious feud may break out at any moment.

A piece of intelligence somewhat difficult to credit is telegraphed from Canton. It is to the effect that a serious collision has occurred between the Viceroy and the Local Assembly. The latter body debated and adopted a representation addressed to the Senate in Peking, urging that drastic measures should be taken to put an end to gambling in all its forms. The routine of procedure required that this representation should be forwarded through the Viceroy of the Two Kwang. The document was duly transmitted to him, but for some unexplained reason, he declined to forward it. Thereupon the Local Assembly resigned en bloc. It is possible that this reluctance on the part of the Governor was dictated by financial motives, as the gambling houses in Canton constitute an important source of revenue to the Local Government. But it is hard to conceive that the Viceroy would deliberately assume an attitude of opposition to a great moral reform when pecuniary interests alone could be urged in his defence.

THE MUKDEN-ANTUNG RAILWAY.

The Shogyo Shimpō contains a note which would be interesting if it did not abound in contradictions. It says, for example, that the whole length of the Mukden-Antung railway is 191 miles, and then it proceeds to explain that the Mukden-Shihkiat-z section measures 135 miles, and the Antung Kee-kwan-shan section 68, which two figures added together make 203 miles. However, our contemporary alleges that the former section was opened to traffic last November and that the latter will be opened on the 3rd of next month, but it then enumerates six serious engineering obstacles which have still to be overcome; namely, the Fukinling pass (4,844 feet), the Keekwan-shan (3,254), the Fengshwiling (1,914), the Heikeng (1,505), the Luikia (1,482) and the Kiaotao bridge. How on earth these various works are to be completed by the 3rd of next month we are unable to conceive.

MANCHURIA.

It is confidently affirmed that the Viceroy of Manchuria has concluded with an American syndicate, represented by Mr. Straight, a loan of 1½ millions sterling. There is no question of railway building in this transaction. The money is to be applied to agricultural development and public works in Manchuria. Nothing is said about security, and as no foreign syndicate is at all likely to dispense with that essential, we venture to doubt the accuracy of the story.

The project of building a harbour in Lien-Shan Bay is again upon the tapis. It is stated that the Peking Government has definitely decided that the work shall be undertaken, and has nominated Mr. Ting as chief commissioner. It will be remembered that a survey for the purposes of this enterprise was recently made by an English expert. His report showed that if the work were undertaken on a small scale, it could be completed for the sum of 3 million yen, but if it were undertaken on a really adequate scale a sum of 7 millions would be required. Apparently a middle course is to be steered, for the telegraph says that Mr. Ting is busily engaged getting together a sum of 5 million yen in Tientsin. Lien-Shan Bay is on the north east coast of Pehchili, and the construction of a good harbour there would undoubtedly have the effect of deflecting a considerable portion of the merchandise now reaching or leaving Eastern China via Newchwang and Dairen. In fact it is specially against the latter place that the project is believed to be directed.

The Mainichi Dempo has a telegram from Antung containing a very pessimistic statement about the Yalu Lumber Company. It appears that two or three hundred of the timber-fellers employed by the Company recently attacked the offices on the upper reaches of the river, beat the officials, committed various other excesses and were barely restrained in the end by the exercise of considerable force on the part of the Japanese gendarmes and police and the Chinese military. What this incident may be taken as proving with regard to the financial prospects of the Company we are not told. In the immediate context of the story, however, our Tokyo contemporary publishes a statement to the effect that the affairs of the Company are in a most unprosperous condition, but that nevertheless arrangements are being made to pay a dividend of 10 per cent. so as to throw dust in the eyes of the public.

A Japanese subject who has just arrived at Nagasaki from Mukden gives an account of the recent arrest of two Chinese subjects employed at the Japanese Consulate-General in Mukden. From this account we learn that the two Chinese were sent from the Japanese Consulate with instructions to ascertain the itinerary and programme of the German Representative who was then stopping at the Consulate-General of his country in Mukden. Something in the conduct of the men suggested suspicions. They were therefore detained at the German Consulate, and a communication having been made to the Chinese police, the latter arrived and took the men into custody. One of them was found to be in possession of a pistol, and on this very slender evidence the two were arraigned on a charge of would-be assassination. The Japanese Consul-General strongly represented to the Chinese Authorities that such steps could not be taken with propriety in the case of men duly serving at a foreign consulate. But the Chinese refused to listen, and the vernacular newspapers took the extraordinary course of urging that the two should be executed. Accordingly the matter has been transferred to Peking. Such is the decidedly disjointed story sent across the wires from Nagasaki.

THE CABINET AND THE DIET.

It is predicted by the Yamato Shinbun, a journal to which credit now attaches in such matters, that 7 subjects are likely to become sources of friction between the Cabinet and the Diet next session. On the whole the Seiyu-kai will maintain its present attitude of general friendliness, but it will not be possible to avoid discussion altogether. The 7 subjects of probable debate are as follows:—

1.—The Budget, namely the portions of it referring to naval increment; encouragement of colonization and flood restoration.

2.—The reduction of taxes. As to this there can be no question that the Government is not less anxious than the people to effect something substantial, but difference of opinion is developed so soon as ever practical details come up for consideration. Nevertheless it is not likely that this subject will develop any unbridgeable gulf.

3.—The subject of river improvement. This is one of the most pressing problems of the time. All parties are equally interested in solving it, but there are of course differences of opinion as to methods. The Government has just provided for an Investigation Committee under the Presidency of the Minister of State for Home Affairs. The members will be 45, all chosen from among experts and specialists.

4.—Naval expenditures. On this subject there is likely to be some discussion. Stated briefly, the Government's plan is to allot a sum of 80 million yen spread over 5 years, for the purpose, not of actual naval increment but of improving the programme now in hand, which is to be completed by 1916. The amount required during next fiscal year is 15 million yen, and the Diet is sure to ask for very special information about this matter.

5.—The problem of the new tariff. There is a disposition on the part of the Seiyu-kai to approach this question in a very critical spirit and to condemn the attitude of the Japanese Foreign Office as calculated to impair the Anglo-Japanese alliance. This conception, however, is largely founded on ignorance, which will probably be dispelled before the Diet undertakes to discuss the matter, or at all events by information furnished in secret session.

6.—The steps to be taken for encouraging colonization. There is great anxiety on this subject, and the Cabinet is understood to be now preparing the draft of a law which will be made the basis of a budgetary appropriation.

7.—Constitutional questions. There are 3 constitutional problems which are likely to cause more or less excitement. One is the power delegated to the Governor-General of Chosen to issue Ordinances (Seirai) having the force of law. But as this has already been done in Formosa it is not likely to give rise to any acute controversy. Then there is the question of the three judges of the administrative Court. This is sure to be brought forward, but events have already shown that it cannot furnish material for a solid attack on the Cabinet. Finally, there is the question of extending the period of operation of Law No. 63, which relates to special powers in Formosa. The operation of this law has always provoked more or less condemnation, and as its period expires in 1911, the Diet will have to vote for its continuance or its abolition.

"THE JAPAN MAGAZINE."

We welcome the re-appearance of the "Japan Magazine" after a long period of suspension which by many people was expected to be permanent. The new number, October, differs from the former magazine in size, the page of the former being considerably larger, but the number of pages

(48) is the same. The resuscitated periodical is printed on a somewhat inferior kind of Japanese paper, and the consequence is that the photographed illustrations do not come out quite as clear as could be desired. But the most salient feature of difference is that the contributors to the new magazine are all Japanese, with one solitary exception, Mr. E. J. Harrison, who contributes an essay on "the art of Judo." In spite of this fact the English is excellent, and we infer that much labour of revision must have fallen to that lot of the editor. The contents are:—

Reproduction of colour print by Utamaro.....
Cover Design.
Entrance to Shimokamo Shrine, Kyoto...Frontspiece.
Torii	425
Higher Technological School (Tokyo), Sei chi
Tejima	432
Reminiscences of American Statesmen, Viscount
Kaneko	437
The New Tokyo, Benjiro Kusakabe, C.E.....	441
How Western Civilisation came to Japan, Prof.
Yaichi Haya.....	447
The Art of Judo, E. J. Harrison.....	450
An Ancient Industry, Sakio Tsurumi.....	455
The Remaking of Manchuria, Yozo Kubo	460
Fruit Culture in Japan, Yosaburo Sakuma	462
Art of Flower Arrangement, Bansui Kojima ...	467
Oni, or Japanese Devils, Fushinami Ishibashi...	470

It will be perceived that on this list of contributors there occur several names of more or less eminent men. Indeed that is a distinct feature. There will be diverse views as to the expediency of dispensing with foreign aid, except in the editorial department. For our part we are emphatically of the opinion that the special character of the magazine is better consulted by having a purely Japanese cast rather than a mixed one, but we are prepared to hear that judgment traversed. What can not be denied, however, is that a great economy will thus be effected, and there will be correspondingly better chance of financial success. We wish the periodical a large measure of public support and we congratulate the proprietor, Mr. S. Hirayasu, on his enterprise.

A VERY SUGGESTIVE INCIDENT.

A very interesting story reaches Tokyo from Seoul. In the year 1906, a Korean named Min Chhong-sik raised the standard of revolt at Kwangju in Korea, and succeeded in killing a number of Japanese subjects, among them being a police inspector named Hijikata. Thenceforth this man figured as the leader of the so-called Righteous Army (Wipyon), but ultimately he was arrested and condemned to death, which penalty was, however, commuted to banishment. On the occasion of the recent amnesty in connection with the annexation Min was released, and now comes the curious part of his story. A few days ago he accompanied Count Yi Wang-yong, ex-Prime-Minister, to the palaces of the junior and senior Princes Li. He there received a gracious welcome, and is said to have expressed himself as sincerely penitent for the part he took in disturbing the public peace and raising an ill-judged rebellion four years ago. He further asked to be allowed to accompany the party of Korean tourists who are about to visit Japan, in order that he may see with his own eyes the civilisation and progress of the Empire of which Korea has now become a part. Both of the Princes Li are said to have expressed strong approval of Min's changed mood, and the incident is naturally commented on by Tokyo newspapers as very significant.

THE LAUNCH OF THE "KAWACHI."

There is always something peculiarly impressive in the spectacle of a war-vessel leaving her cradle on land—where human hands with infinite toil and patience have built up her iron strength—to fling herself into her native element, where Fate and the Future alone know what of war or peace awaits her. Probably for this reason, that she is an engine of destruction—that the issues of life and death are in her keeping, the passing of a mighty ironclad down the inclined ways to "do business in the great waters," makes a stronger appeal to the imagination than the floating of the uncitadelled ship of peace. Nor can the wildest vagaries of wind and weather rob the spectacle of one jot of its impressiveness, for does it not accord with the nature of things that the ship of war should go down to the sea in storm rather than in sunshine? Such, at all events, was the case with the great Kawachi. Under leaden skies, and in rain driving almost horizontally across the surface of a troubled sea, the third of Japan's Dreadnoughts swept, but none the less majestically, into her native realms.

To an always interesting occasion additional éclat was given by the fact that the launch of this great battleship was to be performed in the august presence of his Majesty the Emperor of Japan. Not a few of the thousands of people who poured into the Portsmouth of Japan during the twenty-four hours preceding the launch were actuated by the desire to accord respectful welcome to their Sovereign, whose arrival in the forenoon of the appointed day was signalled by a thunderous salute from flag-decked warships in the picturesque, if topographically intricate, bay.

The ceremony had been fixed to take place at two o'clock; but long before that hour the stands alongside the launching-ways were crowded with invited guests, while the points of vantage open to the general public further down the bay were fully taken up, the dark masses of human beings dotted with the round white spots of numerous umbrellas raised to ward off the penetrating showers. Shortly after one o'clock the big N.Y.K. liner, Tango Maru, which the premier steamship company had placed at the disposal of a select number of guests, principally from Tokyo, forged slowly out of the mist into the harbour, and cast anchor not far from the spot which the liberated battleship was expected to reach.

A few minutes before two o'clock, the Emperor, accompanied by an Imperial party of Princes and Princesses, took up his position on the launching platform. When all was ready, the fact was communicated by the Admiral in charge of the Dockyard (Rear-Admiral Sakamoto) to the Minister for the Navy (Baron Saito), who, respectfully approaching his Imperial Majesty, tendered the information that the mighty vessel before them had been begun on April 1st, 1909, that it was proposed to name it "Kawachi," and that it was now ready to enter the water. This message having been graciously received, the Commander-in-Chief of the Naval Station gave the order to Admiral Sakamoto to carry out the launching. The workmen on the ways at once began to knock away the few remaining supports. The severing of the cord which caused the falling of the last supports—the "dog-shores" as they are called in an English dockyard—was done by the Admiral himself, at 7 minutes past two. It was immediately followed by a slight, almost imperceptible, movement of the great battleship. The Kawachi at last was free. Nothing bound her now to the uncongenial land; nothing was between her and the vasty deep. Slowly at first, but with gathering speed, and streamers flying, she glided down the slippery ways. A roar of cheering broke from the onlooking multitudes ashore and afloat; while scores of waiting tugs and launches blew boisterously on their sirens. Heeding them not, the hugh red mass of steel struck the water bravely, stern-first. A mighty wave was raised about her as she swept into the sea with increasing momentum—the speed at its greatest is officially given as 11 knots—but the impetus of her descent was soon overcome, and, at a distance of a quarter of a mile from her cradle, the Kawachi lay motionless upon the tide. A dozen black dock-yard tugs swarmed about her like herrings about a leviathan of the deep, and in a few minutes the first of Japan's super Dreadnoughts was moored, a seemingly live thing, in the teeth of the wind, to a buoy as red as herself.

The Kawachi, like her sister-ship the Settsu, which is expected shortly to take the water at Kure, may be described as an improved Dreadnought, for her predecessors, the Satsuna and Aki, though not exactly of the all-big gun type, are sufficiently so (with their armament of 4 12-inch and 12 10-inch guns) to rank as "capit 1 ships." The principal particulars of this latest addition to the Japanese navy are:—Displacement 20,800 tons; length over all, 526 ft.; beam 84 ft.; depth 44 ft.; draught 27 ft. Protection to the hull is afforded mainly by an armour-belt of 12-9 in. thickness, which extends amidships for a distance of about 300 feet, while the barbettes are protected with a similar thickness of steel. Her armament consists of twelve 12-in., ten 6-in. eight 4.7 in. and ten 3 in. guns; with five torpedo tubes. She is propelled by Curtiss turbine engines capable of developing 26,000 horse power, and is expected to attain a speed of 20½ knots.

THE ANTI-ASIATIC MOVEMENT IN CALIFORNIA.

On the 12th instant, according to telegrams received by the Mainichi Dempo from San Francisco, a meeting was held of the Anti-Asiatic League, when a unanimous resolution was adopted to prosecute the exclusionist campaign with even more vigour than had been the case in the past. If this were the whole story it would not be particularly interesting, for experience has showed that there is never any serious difficulty in getting together in San Francisco or Sacramento a body of men pledged to the White-Land Doctrine. But the meeting disclosed one very remarkable feature. Mr. Kent, who is a candidate for the House of Representatives, is said to have stated from the rostrum that he had long been in correspondence with Mr. Roosevelt by letter and had always found him opposed to any exclusionist programme. But in a recent letter from the ex-President the latter had frankly stated that he had completely changed his views about this question. He no longer regarded a liberal attitude as essential. Mr. Kent naturally invited his audience to draw their own conclusion from such a statement by Mr. Roosevelt. We entertain very little doubt that on the heels of this telegram will rapidly follow a disavowal from the ex-President.

THE JAPAN TRADE SOCIETY.

On the evening of the 14th instant the Japan Trade Society gave a banquet at which the new Chinese Representative was present. Mr. Wang made a speech, dwelling upon the necessity of intimate and cordial relations between the peoples of the two Empires if their commerce was to prosper and increase. His Excellency thought that this desideratum had been greatly promoted by the recent visit of Japanese business-men to China.

Mr. K. Nagai, of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha, made an interesting speech. He was a member of the business-men's party, and he seems to have been greatly struck by the number of social organizations that existed among the Chinese. He and his fellow-travellers had been invited from club to club, always finding spacious and comfortable chambers and new faces. Mr. Nagai thinks that the great problem of the hour is to bring into the same account the taxes collected in the localities and the income reaching the Treasury. The enormous discrepancy between these two must be remedied before any substantial steps of progress can be taken.

ANOTHER COMPLICATION.

In a recent issue we published a telegraphic rumour that 2 Chinese employés of the Japanese Consulate in Mukden had been apprehended by the German police and handed over to the Chinese local authorities. That intelligence is now supplemented. It appears that the Japanese Consul applied at once to the Chinese Authorities for the release of these men, but the application was refused on the ground that the prisoners had been guilty of a crime unconnected with their duties in the Consulate, and that they had already been sentenced to 10 years imprisonment with hard labour. It is manifestly contrary to treaty that Chinese subjects duly engaged for service at a Japanese Consulate should be seized by the Chinese police, tried and sentenced without any reference whatever to their employers. There may be some valid explanation of the incident, but in its telegraphed form it appears to be on a par with the recent detention of Japanese subjects for 6 days by the Taotai Authorities.

THE SIBERIAN RAILWAY.

Mr. Kunisawa, Vice-President of the South-Manchuria Railway, has just arrived at Moji, and in reply to a newspaper correspondent he has explained some facts with regard to the new agreement for linking the Japanese and Chinese services over the Trans-Asian Railway. One important point is that whereas the arrangement hitherto existing has been that a through train from Europe to Vladivostock made only a few minutes stay at Harbin before setting out for Vladivostock, passengers travelling by the South-Manchuria Railway had to spend a night at Harbin and could not get on until the following forenoon. This serious inconvenience will now be remedied. Passengers to Vladivostock and those going south from Harbin will have equal facilities as to time. The junction at Changchun will require only 40 minutes. The changes are to go into operation from the 28th instant. This will make a difference of 16 hours to persons travelling by the South Manchuria Railway.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

The newspapers of Tokyo are busily fomenting an agitation against the Tokyo railway. It seems to be regarded as quite a respectable and commendable feat to devise some means of robbing this Railway Company. The latest suggestion is that, in consideration of the rate of interest ruling in the open market, the terms of the Company's charter should be altered so as to make it liable for the payment of a yearly sum to the municipality when its proceeds exceed 6 per cent. instead of 7, the latter being the figure fixed by the present charter. It is observable that when the market rate of interest was very much higher than 7 per cent, and when the Company was seeking permission to raise its fares, no journalist ventured to refer to the market rate as a basis of argument.

Another suggestion is that the Company should be obliged to pay a 1,000 yen a mile to the city, irrespective of profit or loss. There is not very much interval between these proposals and the confiscation of the Company's property.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Japanese papers publish figures showing the gradual development of naval models during the past five years in Japan. At the bottom of the list stands the Mikasa, with a displacement of 15,200 tons and an armament of four 12-inch guns. Then follows the Kashima, with a displacement of 16,400 tons and the same armament. Then the Satsuma of 19,350 tons with the same armament; and now finally the Kawachi, displacing 20,800 tons and having an armament of twelve 12-inch guns. The Kawachi is a more powerful ship than the Dreadnought, but is still far behind the latest warship launched in England, namely the Orion, which has a displacement of 22,500 tons and an armament of twelve 13½ inch guns. The difference between a 12-inch gun and a 13½ inch is stated by our Tokyo contemporaries to be that whereas the former's projectile weighs only 850 lbs., the latter's weighs 1250 lbs., and the effective range of the 13½-inch is 30 per-cent. greater.

There is something like a panic among dealers in cotton-flannel in Osaka. No less than 8 have closed their doors, and some of them are said to have handled kanakin and mempu also. The number of bankrupts has been increased by one in Wakayama, so that the total reaches 9. All are said to have backed each other's bills, and for that reason the whole stand or fall together. The several sums involved are not large, none exceeding 180,000 yen; but the effect upon the market is considerable.

That hot-bed of disturbance, the province of Yunnan, is again the scene of an insurrection. The insurgents in this case are reported to be a body of 500 Chinese soldiers, acting at the instigation, and with the assistance, of the Mohammedan population. The rioters succeeded in getting possession of Shuntien, but it is not thought that the movement will develop any serious proportions.

It is stated that a new company has been practically formed in Tokyo, under the name of Kwangyo Kaisha, its object being a combination of the business done by the Industrial Bank and the Hypothec Bank. In other words, it will deal in stocks and shares, lend money on debentures and on the security of fixed property, and grant accommodation to public coöperations without tangible security. The capital is put at 20 million yen and the company is said to have the support of many leading figures in the Mitsubishi and Mitsui Companies. The name Kwangyo Kaisha signifies enterprise-encouraging company. The original idea was that Baron Megata should be President, but some difficulty has arisen in securing his services, and the post will be occupied by Mr. M. Kato. Marquis Matsukata is reported to be a warm advocate of the scheme.

Permission to erect a statue of Prince Ito on the spot where he fell has been obtained from the Vice-President of the East China Railway. This means that the monument will stand within the precincts of the station. Of course the permission will have to be confirmed by the President of the Railway on his return, which will take place shortly, but it is not expected that he will raise any difficulty. The statue is to be cast in Japan, and the ceremony of unveiling will probably take place on the next anniversary of the Prince's death.

One of the striking features of the time is a sudden increase in the number of insurance companies. Hitherto the totals have been thirty life companies and nine fire, but recently applications have been put in for six charters in connection with as many life insurance companies, each having a capital of 500,000 yen, and four applications on account of fire insurance companies having capitals of from one million to 3 million yen. Besides the above two other companies are understood to be in course of organization.

It was fixed originally that Prince Tsai-shun should reach Yokohama on the 24th, but there has been a change of programme, and he will now arrive on the 23rd.

The Ikoma, which left Singapore on the forenoon of the 16th, is to steam direct for Vladivostock, and should arrive there on the 29th inst.

Very pessimistic statements are published with reference to the rice harvest this year. Hopes were maintained up to the eve of the recent rains, but the extraordinarily inclement weather of the past fortnight has upset all calculations, and it is now believed that the crop will be nearly 20 per cent. below the average. In fact, it will be the worst yield since 1905. Vegetables and fruit also have suffered severely, and altogether the outlook is highly unfavourable. Naturally these conditions have deepened the feeling of depression which prevails. Rice, which not long ago was quoted at between 12 and 13 yen per koku, now stands at 15.95 yen and is expected to rise still higher. The Shogyo Shimpo remarks in this context that during the interval from January the 1st to October the 18th, there were no less than 170 wet days, being a good deal more than one-half of the whole 291.

The fight waxes warmer and warmer in the kerosene market. Prices have fallen from 2.50 to 2.60 yen. It is observed that importers of oil have to pay 96 sen customs duty on every ten gallons; 45 sen for carriage; 20 sen consumption tax and 20 sen for commission and business expenses, making a total of 1 yen 81 sen. At present rates the selling price of this quantity is from 2.68 to 2.75, so that there remains only a very small sum to represent the cost of the oil. In the case of domestic oil the margin after paying expenses is two yen, which represents the price of the oil. There is therefore room for competition on the part of the Hōden and the Nippon companies, if they make up their minds to dispense with a dividend.

The directors of the Chiyoda Gas Company have at length applied to the Tokyo Municipality for the sale of 13,000 tsubo of the newly reclaimed land at Shibaura. The price they offer is 25 or 26 yen per tsubo, but the Municipality are said to be unwilling to sell at less than 40 yen, inasmuch as if the Shibaura land be disposed of too cheaply, all the similar property of the Municipality will be injuriously affected. It is said that the programme of the Chiyoda Gas Company allots only 200,000 yen for the acquisition of a site, and evidently if the land costs 40 yen, the above appropriation will not be even half enough.

We noted in our last issue that an anonymous foreign diplomat was quoted by the Asahi Shimbun as attributing to the Japan Advertiser the erroneous translation of Count Komura's speech, which so greatly misled the Yokohama Board of Trade. There now appears in the columns of the Asahi Shimbun a letter from the proprietor and publisher of the Advertiser denying that that journal was in any way implicated in the matter. Thus the mystery remains as mysterious as ever.

The applications for the new debentures about to be issued by the Hypothec Bank have totalled only 25 million yen, in which aggregate the Red Cross Society figures for five millions. The amount of the loan is 15 million yen, and it was confidently expected that it would be subscribed two or three times over. The result therefore comes as a surprise to the money market, and shows that money is not really so plentiful as was supposed.

Various unpleasant rumours are beginning to be circulated about Lieut. Shirase's project of a rush for the South-Pole. There is talk of chicanery in connection with the purchase of a vessel, but we refrain from reproducing this story as its details seem very nebulous. The Asahi Shimbun has handed over the subscriptions raised by it, totalling 48 thousand odd yen, and has obtained a receipt from Count Okuma in his capacity of President of the Koyenkwaï, a society formed for the purpose of assisting Lieut. Shirase. In taking this step the Asahi was careful to ascertain the date fixed for the departure of the expedition and found it to be the 15th of November.

SIGNS OF THE TIMES.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 15.)

INDICATIONS are not wanting of troublous times ahead in the world of British politics. Circumstances which no man could have foreseen, and which no human agency could have controlled, imposed a necessary truce upon a nation divided, by a crisis of historic magnitude, into two hostile camps. Early in the spring of this year there seemed no possibility of averting a second General Election in which the time-honoured Constitution of the British Isles, and even the Crown itself, were to have been made the objects of the bitterest party strife. On the one hand, an organization actuated by the wildest Radical Socialist theories, and led on by a crew of windy demagogues, was bent upon a policy of disintegration and upheaval. An Upper Chamber, created as a constitutional safeguard against "hasty and ill-considered legislation," was to be swept out of existence for daring to fulfil the function for which it was designed. If no other agency could compass its destruction, then the Crown was to be called upon to descend into the miry arena of party strife and do the bloody deed. In other words, the mad demand was raised that the Head of the Body Politic should cut off its own Right Hand—in order that the other Members might the sooner effect the ruin of the whole. And the bribe held out to the undiscerning multitude, by whose will alone the pernicious policy could attain its consummation, was the imaginary boon of Socialism! To put the matter bluntly, the rich man was to be despoiled that the poor man might, for hope of gain, vote Liberal. Such, in effect, was the essence of the policy inaugurated by the ever-notorious LLOYD GEORGE Budget, which was the beginning of a strife the end of which no man can foresee.

On the other hand, there lay awaiting solution a number of questions of the profoundest importance, which the "wild men" declined even to consider. So congenial to these political Apollyons was the career of Constitution-wrecking and Empire-breaking upon which they had embarked, that insistent problems of national defence, of fiscal reform, of Imperial Federation were flung, like Jonahs, overboard. Home Rule received the preference to Imperial consolidation, Socialism to Tariff Reform, and the self governing Dominions knocked in vain at the slammed doors of Downing Street. True, the loss of a hundred seats in last January's appeal to the country acted as a restrainer in the over-rapid development of an iconoclastic record; but there are signs that the lesson has been lost on the headstrong spirits of the party, who, with their extremist followers—holding, as they do, the Ministry in the hollow of their hands—are "thirsting for the blood of the Lords." Thus, Mr. REDMOND has been asking how much longer he must wait before he and his separatist colleagues can begin their posturing in Nationalist garb on College Green? And the Radical Jacobins, with their Labourite allies, are clamouring for the dawn of that happy day when Peers shall be no more and "Merrie England" don her Socialist yoke. Unfortunately, the better elements in the Liberal Party—and we cheerfully admit that there are such—are not in a position to resist the precipitate schemes of the wreckers. A very simple arithmetical calculation reveals the fact that an Irish-Extremist combination, merely by withdrawing its support, can leave the Ministerialists hopelessly in the lurch. Here is the sorry circumstance which makes of Liberal policy to-day "confusion worse confounded." Out of this morass of conflicting aims and tyrannies, nothing can redeem Liberalism, as it was redeemed a few brief years ago, but some supreme miracle of disseverance and reassortment. On the day when the British people grasp the essential ephemerality, the selfishness, the inanity of the Radical-Irish-Socialist hotch-potch of legislation—if, indeed, it can be dignified with the term—then will come the crash. To quote the words of a Manchester Alderman who, in a stirring letter to a London journal, has called upon the County Palatine to lead the way in the coming campaign:—

History repeats itself in Radical Governments. The evils which made the Gladstonian régime stink in the nostrils of the nation are already in evidence. There is the same pandering to disloyalty at home and sedition abroad, the same criminal neglect of the national defences, the same embittering of creeds and classes against each other, the same legislative plundering of political opponents, the same attacks upon religious and civil liberty, the same preference for the foreigner over the Britisher. Five years of Radical administration would seem to be as much as the British Empire can ever stand at one spell. Lord Salisbury's "twenty years of resolute government" are always necessary to wipe out the hateful experience and strengthen the nation for its next time of tribulation.

This indictment, coming from a Lancashire man, is a strong one. We do not know that the present Radical Ministry has deserved better of its country than any of its predecessors—and this, we think, will soon appear. However, all that is wanted to usher in an era of sound government is a rallying, in no uncertain manner, of the Constructive Forces of the national life. The next few months of political history will, we believe, witness the flowing of that "tide in the affairs" of the Unionist party which, to lead them to victory, must be taken at the flood. Not even the meeting of the Veto Conference—nor, for the matter of that, the announcement of its success—can alter the fact that England, both in her national life and in her career as a World-Power, stands at the parting of the ways. She has to choose between Disruption and Degradation, on the one hand, Consolidation and Advancement, on the other. There is more than a fear that the continuance of a Radical Ministry in power will conduce to an irrevocably foolish choice: there is more than a hope that the advent of a Unionist administration will enable her, at this critical time, to choose aright.

THE OLD BUGBEAR.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 18.)

GENERAL KUROPATKIN has published a new book on an old topic. Copies of the work do not seem to have reached this part of the world yet, but from the writings of reviewers its gist may be easily gathered. The General is a believer in the Yellow Peril on a limited scale. He does not discuss, or, at any rate, he would seem to have refrained from discussing, the chimera of an invasion of the Occident by the Yellow Peril in combination. What troubles him is a possible hand-joining by China and Japan to check Russia's progress in East Asia and even to drive her back from thence. Did the two Occidental Powers act in unison for such a purpose, they could easily muster and maintain in the field an army of a million and a half of men, and it is for such a contingency that Russia must always be prepared. Hence General KUROPATKIN devotes much space to demonstrating the practical measures of preparation which he deems essential. They are easily conceived. Russia must be ready to concentrate in the East at least half, and, in the event of extreme emergency, the whole, of her military forces. To that end she must reconstruct and equip her Trans-Asian Railway so that 47 trains may be sent over it in every interval of 24 hours; she must supplement the purely land avenue by a system of riverine routes; she must have in Siberia a powerful basis of operations, and she must regard Far-Eastern Asia as the storm-centre of her dominions. It will at once strike the readers of the illustrious General's book that the policy he recommends is founded on a belated conception. Such a programme might have commended itself had it been enunciated a year, or only six months, ago. But to-day it sounds superannuated. A union between Russia and Japan certainly seemed, at one moment, among the most unlikely things in the range of immediate eventualities. Now, however, it is an accomplished fact, and its place in the rank of improbabilities has been taken by the contingency which General KUROPATKIN finds no difficulty in supposing, namely, an offensive and defensive alliance between China and Japan. Apparently among the factors making for such an alliance the General gives a prominent place to the presence of many Japanese drill-instructors in the Middle Kingdom. We do not know precisely how many of these there now are, but it may confidently be said that they do not outnumber the Germans similarly employed. Yet no one thinks of inferring a Germanico-Chinese alliance. That is a minor point, however. The main consideration is that in Chinese eyes at present Japan looms as the greatest menace of the century, and that to form an alliance with her would be like the lamb lying down with the lion. A very radical change must occur in the mood of the Chinese nation before such a step commends itself. And what of the Japanese on their side? A favourite saying of an eminent Japanese statesman—now, unhappily, deceased—used to be that for China and Japan to march abreast would be a case of an old man and a boy becoming fellow-travellers. If the conditions have changed since that was said, the change has been in the direction of accentuating the truth of the saying. China is not fitted to be the ally of any Power which lives the strenuous life of the 20th century. We do not speak reproachfully. When the world approaches more closely to the standards of the peace-preservation league, China will be found in the ranks of eligible allies. At present she is ahead of the times.

AVIATION AND THE ATLANTIC.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 19.)

THE announcement published in our issue of yesterday that Mr. WALTER WELLMAN, (whose attempts to reach the North Pole by aerial navigation are a household word), has left America with the heroic intent of crossing the Atlantic in an airship, will send a thrill through a world already accustomed to deeds of daring from "conquerors of the air." The vessel which, under the guidance of this experienced aviator, seems destined, in the event of success, to render itself and its owner immortal, is of the lighter-than-air variety known, briefly, as a "dirigible." If it is the same as that in which Mr. WELLMAN made his third polar attempt last year—as we presume it is, with minor structural alterations—its capacity may be gauged from the fact that it was designed to carry 6,000 pounds of gasoline, besides food and supplies for a year. In one important respect, however, this vessel differs from the ZEPPELIN type of airship, which, despite several disasters, has accomplished much towards the final end of aviation—that of safe and rapid transport. The ZEPPELIN airships are of the rigid-dirigible type, while Mr. WELLMAN's craft conforms more in design to that of the balloon proper, and on that account is regarded as a safer type of vessel, by reason of its superior lifting power, in proportion to size. On the other hand, of course, much of the advantage which the Wellman airship thus gains will in this case be neutralized by the additional supplies and equipment required for so long a voyage. We do not gather that any steamship accompanies the aeronaut in his bold enterprise, to be at hand in case of disaster. Indeed it is probable that, given a favourable wind, any accompanying vessel would be unable to keep pace with the balloon. We believe that a life-boat forms part of the equipment, to meet the eventuality of a mishap to the gas-filled envelope which forms the principal medium of support; and the aeronaut has had the forethought to provide himself with a small installation of wireless telegraphy with a range of a hundred miles, from which he should derive an additional sense of security. Little can be done, however, against the aerial navigator's two worst enemies—wind and temperature. The balloon is provided with a ballast-trailer to serve the same purpose as the balloonist's trail-rope on terra firma. Unfortunately, however, the trailer in a high wind is likely to become more of a danger than a safeguard, as the increasing resistance offered by the waves to its rapid motion, combined with the pressure of the wind, tends to precipitate the balloon into the sea. Again, the continual variations of temperature are likely to be a source of embarrassment. The noonday heat, if unobscured by clouds or fog, would have the effect of causing the gas in the envelope to expand, and so to raise the airship to inconvenient heights; while a severe or sudden fall in temperature would have the opposite effect and necessitate the jettisoning of much of the aviator's store of ballast. It will be seen, therefore, that the difficulties which beset Mr. WELLMAN in his heroic task are many and great. It has so often been the lot of the aeronaut to meet with disaster in the hour of victory—the pathetic end of M. CHAVEZ after his magnificent flight over the Alps is the latest instance of Fate's capricious ways—that the world will watch, with an eagerness not unmingled with anxiety, for news of the intrepid aviator.

As to the possibility of trans-oceanic flight by heavier-than-air machines, this would appear as yet to be beyond the range of accomplishment. In this type of machine, where the whole supporting and propelling power is provided by mechanical means, an accident to the motor or the failure of the supply of petrol renders an immediate descent imperative, and the aviator must congratulate himself if this is achieved without disaster. While the aeroplane so far bears the palm for speed, and has proved its ability to ascend to great heights—the records, we believe, are 77 miles an hour, in the one case, and some 9000 feet in the other—yet the longest single-stop flight hitherto accomplished does not exceed a hundred miles. The capacity of the aeroplane for long-distance flight is limited by the amount of petrol which it can carry; and this, again, is limited by the size of the aeroplane itself. While it is true that all the heavier-than-air machines hitherto built have been comparatively small, there seems no reason, except that of cost, why such should continue to be the case. It is merely a question of preserving a due proportion between the area of the planes and the horse-power of the motor. Thus, the Farman biplane has four times the area of the Bleriot monoplane, but it can carry 3 or 4 passengers to the latter's one, while the weight per horse-power developed in the two machines is practically the same. The largest aeroplane so far constructed is the Maxim, with a plane-area of 4000 square feet—nearly ten times greater than that of the Farman—and a motor capable of developing 360 horse-power, as against the Farman's 50. On theoretical grounds, therefore, the Maxim aeroplane ought to be able to carry as many as eight passengers, as well as a supply of petrol sufficient to enable it to cover a distance of 700 800 miles; but its capabilities in this direction remain to be proved. However, it is a far cry even from this to a trans-Atlantic voyage, so that the possibility of accomplishing such journeys must, for some time to come, remain with the gas-borne, wind-propelled dirigible. Meanwhile it may well be asked, if the flight of M. BLÉRIOT across the English Channel was hailed as imparting an immense impetus to the development of aerial navigation, how much more so the crossing of an ocean three thousand miles in extent? Whether Mr. WELLMAN sets foot after his long and perilous flight in Europe or in Africa, he will effectually have established his claim to a niche in the Temple of Fame.

GENERAL VISCOUNT TERAUCHI.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 20.)

GENERAL VISCOUNT TERAUCHI arrives in Tokyo at 11 a.m. to-day. The citizens of the Japanese capital will doubtless extend to him a welcome worthy of his achievement. It has been a great and notable achievement. To annex a country with 12 million inhabitants and to annex it with such tact and prevision that scarcely a voice of dissent is raised, must be regarded as one of the most signal feats in the history of the world. It is true that General TERAUCHI had the might of Japan at his call, but his greatest merit is that he kept that might altogether in the background, and by his adroit management has been able to consummate his purpose without any open appeal whatever to force. There is no reason to think that the Korean people are lacking in patriotism. On the contrary, during the last three years they have given evidence of readiness to sacrifice their lives in the cause of their country, and no reasonable person could have anticipated that the loss of Korea's independence would have been quietly accepted by them as inevitable. So far as we can judge, however, they have acquiesced in the fact, not because of its inevitable aspect solely, but because they recognize its expediency, and it is to the skill which gave convincing prominence to this

THE NEW UNION CHURCH.

DEDICATION CEREMONY.

Notwithstanding the steady downpour of rain a fairly large congregation attended the dedication service of the new Union Church, a number of former workers and old-time friends of the church having come from Tokyo and elsewhere outside of Yokohama. The congregation met in Van Schaick Hall, where the meeting and greetings of friends formed a little informal reception, which, while not a part of the programme, was still one of its enjoyable features.

A procession was organized at the door of Van Schack hall and proceeded to the new building in the following order:—

1. The Architect and Building Committee.
2. The Board of Trustees.
3. The Consistory.
4. The Choir.
5. The Pastor.
6. The Invited Guests and General Congregation.

The pretty little service planned to take place at the Church door had to be abandoned on account of the rain, so the outside ceremony consisted only in the transfer of the keys, which was done in the following form.

The Architect handed the keys to the chairman of the Building Committee, who presented them to the chairman of the Board of Trustees with the following words:—

"On behalf of the Building Committee appointed by the Yokohama Union Church Congregation, I transfer the custody of this Church Building to you, as the representative of the Board of Trustees of the Union Church."

The Chairman of the Board of Trustees, on receiving the keys, responded:—

"On behalf of the Trustees of the Yokohama Union Church, I accept the custody of this building, for the uses of the Union Church Congregation."

The Congregation then entered the church and remained standing while the Te Deum was sung. A short service ensued, the building being dedicated by the whole Congregation joining in the words:—

"This Building, which we have been permitted to build through the gracious favour of our Heavenly Father, we now reverently dedicate to His worship and service, for the glory of His Holy Name, for the advancement of our His Kingdom, and for the blessing of our fellow men, in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. Amen."

The public service was followed by a short informal meeting below the auditorium in the Church parlours.

THE BUILDING.

The new edifice, which occupies a prominent site on Lot No. 49 on the main Bluff Road, and within a stone's-throw of the Van Schaick Hall, forms a notable addition to the architectural features of the town. Built of nearly white jinzo-seki stone, in the Gothic style, with a suggestion of the Early Decorated period, the general effect, especially when the building is viewed from a distance, is both pleasing and harmonious. Near at hand, however, the tower is seen to be of too slender proportions to harmonize with the building, when its lower story, allotted to the Sunday School, is taken into consideration. Doubtless, however, the desire to avoid any interior supports, and, at the same time, the necessity of keeping down the weight of superstructure in an earthquake-ridden land have dictated this weakness in exterior design. Nevertheless, it must be admitted that the approach to the church from the east—its west end is blocked by the manse—constitutes a most effective piece of work. The boldly conceived flight of steps leading to the entrance, and the very graceful apse, with its five-light window and shapely buttresses, complete, with the general aspect of the building (in which the disproportionate lower story is hidden from view) a highly pleasing and harmonious whole.

The general plan of the building is cruciform, with dimensions, in the extreme, of 100 feet by 72. The transepts and nave, being thrown together, give an interior whose width apparently exceeds its length, as its prolongation under the apse is too narrow to militate against the impression. In making this criticism, it must of course be remembered that any such design, in the vast majority of cases (amongst which the present one may safely be included), represents a compromise on a number of frequently conflicting conditions, over which the architect, in many cases, has no control. Mr. Ward has nevertheless produced a most pleasing interior, in which the claims of beauty and utility are equally met. The effect is enhanced by the delicate tints from the numerous Gothic windows, in which the rectangular lights are of six different colours, and by the arrangement and design of the pews, which lie along semi-circular lines concentric from the rostrum. This, like the pews, the choir-stalls, and the swing-doors at the several entrances,—as also the greater part of the tower—are of solid keyaki, a wood which combines the hardness and durability of oak with the fine-grained texture of teak. A disposition of the choir-stalls at a slight angle towards the congregation, instead of directly opposite each other, would, however, be an improvement not only commendable from the acoustic point of view, but more in keeping with the arrangement of the seating accommodation in the body of the church.

Behind the elegant semi circular rostrum lies the Organ chamber, whence by means of a ladder, communication may be made with the at present bell less Tower, 95 feet in height, which, however, plays an important part in the ventilation of the church. The Organ, which has been moved from the old church in the Settlement and rebuilt at a considerable cost, has two manuals and 23 stops, with radiating pedal key-board. It is now a very good instrument—as organs go in this part of the world—and, in the hands of a competent manipulator, should prove a source of much satisfaction to the audience.

Below the church proper, occupying the ground-floor of the edifice, is the Sunday School Room, and the scholars of that hitherto successfully conducted institution may congratulate themselves on the excellence of the quarters provided for them. This lower room, which will also be available for social gatherings, has practically the same seating accommodation as the Church itself, namely, for 300-400 persons, capable of being increased to 500 if required. At the west end of this lower story are the Vestry, Kitchen, and Lavatories; at the east end, the Church Parlour, a beautifully-shaped room in the apse, which, by the removal of folding doors, can be thrown into the Sunday School Room.

The lighting and heating arrangements are all that they should be. Both electric and gas fittings have been supplied—these being arranged about the projecting supports at the junction of the transepts with the main body of the building. Gas also forms the heating medium and each of the numerous radiators are independently heated by this means. As the roof of the church is double, and is covered with asbestos slates, the building as a whole should be cool in summer and warm in winter.

The new Church, which was begun in October 1908, has been just two years in course of construction, and with the various fittings and furniture, when these are complete, will have cost about yen 85,000. The congregation will ever remain under a debt of obligation to Mr. J. T. Griffin, who, as Chairman of the Building Committee, has personally supervised the work of construction from start to finish.

At 11.57 p.m. on the 13th instant a slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama, lasting four and a half minutes. The oscillations were principally in a north-westerly and south-easterly direction.

RATIONALISM IN EUROPE.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

From notice taken of the articles on Rationalism recently appearing in the Japan Mail, it is evident that the adherents of the rationalistic propaganda in Japan, feel rather uncertain of the situation. This must be especially so in the case of Japanese subjects; for no Japanese can subscribe to the rationalistic creed, or no creed, as it may be called, without forfeiting his loyalty to national faith in the Imperial House. According to the faith of all loyal subjects of Japan, His Majesty the Emperor is the Son of Heaven, his ancestry divine, and the authority vested in the ruler, higher than human. In other words, the faith of the Imperial House of Japan is the same as that of the Imperial House of Germany or the Royal House of Great Britain; namely, that the Ruler is sovereign by the Grace of Heaven, exercising, in the place of Heaven, a moral and civil power for the benefit of the people. Now Rationalism denies the existence of any authority higher than the human, and therefore denies the faith on which Japanese loyalty and patriotism rest. Consequently Rationalism cannot flourish among the Japanese without destroying loyalty and endangering the security of the Imperial House.

Notwithstanding this patent fact, a Japanese subject has the temerity to write a letter (of somewhat disconnected ideas) to the Japan Mail, the purport of which is to support Rationalism and denounce Christianity. How little such persons know of the influence of human thought in history or even of history itself! It is sufficient to demand of such an apologist of Rationalism, that he show from any authoritative document of Christianity, or from any bona-fide case in history, that the religion of Jesus Christ has been other than the loyal supporter and promoter of civilized government. In fact the most enlightened governments that the world has seen, are admittedly the outcome of Christian influence. I emphatically deny that the same can be said of Rationalism. It has constantly been the disturber, and even the destroyer, of governments and also of Kings and Emperors, and always exercises a disintegrating influence on the civil and moral forces of the countries where it has had any encouragement. This Japanese citizen further says that Rationalism has no connection with Socialism. Well, prostitution has no connection with robbery, but when the police want to catch criminals they usually expect to find them in the licensed quarters. There is no professed connection between Rationalism and Socialism, but the socialists of a virulent type are the children of the rationalistic creed, or negation of creed. Socialism, as such, is most respectable compared with Rationalism. For Socialism simply aims at the greatest good of the greatest number. So far, its methods of enforcing its ideas have been fanciful and impracticable; and so far as it has been influenced by Rationalism, dangerous and sometimes criminal. But Socialism, per se, is not an evil; it is only as it drifts into Rationalism that it becomes inimical to human progress. The assertion that Christ was a socialist or did anything to pervert the government of his day, is purely gratuitous and without foundation in history. The same cannot be said of Rationalism, for which this Japanese citizen claims support, in spite of its denying the fundamental faith of the Imperial House of Japan. This I may be permitted to show by reference to the results of Rationalism in Europe, where its detrimental inroads have left France, Spain and Portugal on the verge of reversion to arrested progress.

The history of Rationalism in Europe amply justifies the contention of those who maintain that any system of thought which destroys respect for religion and faith in God will equally result in disrespect for government authority and finally the overthrow of the sovereign. As soon as the French began to make light of religion and laugh at spiritual teaching, they placed their king and government on a level with the lowest and finally murdered the royal family of France. The beautiful Queen Marie Antoinette, they dragged through the streets of their capital in a cart, bound like a common criminal, hurling at her indecent and vulgar insults, and then cut off her head like savages. This be it remembered was the work, not of Christians but of rationalists. The entire reign of terror in France was managed and controlled by creatures of the rationalistic movement. The Reign of Terror was the reign of Rationalism. These bloodthirsty forces knew no difference between innocent and guilty, young or old, men or women; all, they hurried to the guillotine. The scenes in France during the reign of Rationalism exceeded, for violence and cruelty, anything recorded against the cruellest and most infamous of the Roman Emperors. All suspected of being hostile to the reign of terror were cast into prison. The trials were farcical and the executions swift. The principal towns and cities of France daily ran red with blood. Savage men and lewd women daily thronged the churches jeering at religion and insulting priests; while a harlot was actually set up in the cathedral of Notre Dame as "the Goddess of Reason," the genius of the rationalistic movement. Every representative of Christianity that appeared in public was followed by crowds of rationalists, howling like savages, and heaping insults and inflicting wounds upon the priests and nuns. Has Christianity ever been guilty of any such conduct as this? Christians have fought in self-defence, as most sane people do when forced; but Christianity has never been known to engage in cruel and infamous deeds in self-defence. The only cruelties ever connected with the Christian name were the results of giving way to Rationalistic ideas when some argued that if people avowed themselves enemies of God, they should, according to reason, be destroyed as such. Thus it was evident, as in the days of the Inquisition, that Rationalism, even in the church, would become heathenism once it became divorced from the religion and spirit of Christ. But these Rationalists of the Reign of Terror in France were not fighting in self-defence; no one had attacked them. They started the row themselves. In the belief that they were just as good as their rulers and wiser than all the governments of Europe, they raised a mob, and under the direction of their atheistic captains of crime, carried out the bloody programme. It was a time when atheism and unbounded licentiousness went hand in hand. M. Taine, one of the most reliable of French historians and literary men, thinks that the number deliberately slain and those whose deaths were indirectly due to the reign of Terror, would exceed even a million men, women, and infants. Religion was thus put down after the Rationalistic method, and Rationalism was set up in its place. And what has France gained by the change. Is she better off than Great Britain where religion is to-day stronger and more progressive than it has ever been before? Who that has any respect of truth will contend that France and her civilization are to-day superior to Great Britain? Is not France in almost every direction on the decline? Her only hope is in the few believers in God still left her. But her chief officials and her government are yet Rationalistic in spirit. Witness the recent declaration of one of her leading statesmen that the chief aim of the government must be the destruction of religion. In Madagascar recently a man and his wife were punished by law for singing a Christian hymn in their own home. This is the Rationalistic view of toleration and human brotherhood. Where is the liberality, equality, and fraternity of Rationalism? It does not exist.

This spirit of disintegration which has succeeded in taking hold upon the Latin peoples, chiefly on account of the weakness of religion through formalism, is still causing great ravages in Spain and Portugal. In Spain religion is intensely hated by increasing numbers of the lower classes; while many of the rich are Atheists in reality, though professedly adherents of the Church. The Italian King has staved off the evil day by turning Socialist himself. Portugal a few weeks ago carried the Rationalistic theory to its logical conclusion. The King of the country was obliged to flee for his life and throw himself on the protection of foreigners. At once the churches were suppressed and the religious orders, as in France, put to flight. The Editor of the Japan Herald, in commenting on a former article on this subject, asserts that the revolution in Portugal was respectable and orderly. Whether this was the case may be seen from the following telegram appearing in the Tokyo press:

"London, Oct. 9.—No discipline has been maintained by the revolutionary troops in Lisbon; they are pillaging churches and nunneries, while drunken sailors are dancing on the broken pulpits and singing revolutionary songs. Mobs armed with iron bars and hammers are pursuing the priests and nuns about the streets, even women supporting the rabble. The monks have been banished and the Jesuit priests who fought for the king were killed by the soldiers. King Manuel is reported to have reached Gibraltar."

The priest pursued by the sword, and the drunken sailor in the pulpit of the dismantled church: is this the Rationalistic idea of the ideal condition of things? A system of thought leading to such a state of affairs must be extremely dangerous to any nation giving it shelter or encouragement. The danger is doubly increased when we remember that Rationalism has already taken a strong hold upon certain classes in Japan. One notices with regret how many Japanese papers, in commenting on the dethronement of the Royal House of Portugal, absolutely ignore the infamy and treason of the affair and try to find excuses for the rule of the revolutionists. There is even a free discussion of the faults of the monarchy, as though that were an excuse for the reign of disloyalty and treason that has been set up. This is surely a strange attitude to be taken by citizens that are supposed to be loyal enough to die for their own Emperor. Is it not only reasonable to suppose that a citizen who has proper respect for his own ruler, will be generous enough to show similar respect for the sovereign of another country? One looks back to the days when men fought for the Shogun against the Emperor, and tries to believe that those who took the side of the Shogun have completely vanished from the list of Japanese citizens. But the attitude of some towards the revolution in Portugal, as well as their adherence to Rationalism, shows that the schools and the Government of Japan have still plenty to do if a proper idea of loyalty and patriotism is to be promoted in this country.

To sympathize with those who talk about the faults of the Portuguese monarch, is ungenerous in the extreme. Think of who these Portuguese agitators are. Are they not the persons who a year or two ago assassinated the King of Portugal and the Crown Prince; and then not content with having stained their hands and souls with the blood of their Sovereign, now not only complain that the innocent lad left to take the crown, is too young and inexperienced, but rise up in rebellion and make a treasonable attack upon him also? Is not this conduct fit for central African savages rather than citizens of an enlightened state? Yet it is talked of as a thing that one must take as a matter of course. It is indeed a sad day for any nation when the voice of Heaven becomes more audible in the jeers of the mob than in the government of the ruler. It is impossible to believe that affairs in Portugal had reached so low a degree of degeneration as that. Much more reasonable is it to say that the whole process of disintegration is the outcome of giving up religion for Rationalism. When men are content to become their own God it is but a short step to becoming their own Kings and Emperors. If Japan is to maintain her high ideal of loyalty and carry the nation to its glorious destiny as a progressive country, it must not lend countenance to pernicious doctrines of this kind.

The Government, as the voice of the Emperor, must not only maintain but command the respect of the nation; and the nation must be so intelligently educated along moral and spiritual lines, that it will be capable of according to its Ruler and his representatives, that respect and obedience that is due them. Close attention should be given to the wrongs of the people; for unhappiness and injustice have much influence in unsettling the faith of people. Let the system of justice and education give all citizens, independently of rank, the fullest opportunity for enlightenment and prosperity. Ample accommodation should be provided for the education of all the youth that desire it; no one should feel excluded or unjustly treated in this respect. Let the teachers be encouraged to have faith in the great principles of religion and morality, that the children at school may be educated and started on life's way in a moral and healthy atmosphere. There must, moreover, be no habit of unjustly assigning privileges or monopolies to one class above another, thus creating discontent among the population. In this way the ground will be kept sown with good thoughts and will bring forth good deeds; and then there will be no room for the thistles and weeds of Rationalism and virulent forms of Socialism, to take root among the people of Japan. For Rationalism, like all other blood diseases, can affect only those too weak to throw it off. If a nation keeps its body politic in a reasonably healthy condition, neither Rationalism nor its side issue, aggressive Socialism, will find an opening for attack.

INFLUENCE OF THE NEW TARIFF UPON THE TRADE WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

The following, from the pen of Mr. Masuda (Takashi), the well known commercial expert, has been placed at our disposal. It is now being published in Japanese by the Shogyo Shimpo.

The impending revision of the Japanese Tariff Law, be it to secure increase of revenue or to carry out Protectionist principle it will at any rate have the effect of stimulating the enterprising spirit of the nation towards the further development of industrial undertaking and also of inducing foreigners to establish manufacturing concerns in this country.

Many branches of industry, other than those already established, can be profitably operated in Japan, and their products can find a ready market in this country as well as in other parts of the Orient. An instance may be cited of the recent co-operation of a certain Japanese firm with a foreign company for machine building on a large scale. The object of this co-operation is to avoid the heavy expense of importing such apparatus or parts of machines as can be made far more cheaply in this country. It is needless to point out that the establishment of new industries in this country by Japanese, as well as joint undertakings by Japanese and foreigners, will give a considerable impetus for the time being to the import of machinery and material required for such undertakings.

The development of our industries means the prosperity of our foreign trade, and if such development is carried out on careful and sound lines we have no reason to fear for the future of our foreign trade.

We must say that a minute investigation of the New Tariff discloses certain cases in which a reconsideration of the rates would appear advisable. This seems due to the fact that in determining the rates the Government have taken as a standard the three divisions of finished goods, half finished goods and raw materials, and a modification of the individual rates was made only on such articles as were thought deserving of special consideration. It is advisable for all concerned to study the tariff very closely in order to find out which rates require modification, and to appeal to the Government or to the Imperial Diet for an amendment of the law.

The following are some comments on a few of the revised rates.

(1) Duty on Condensed Milk is raised from 5 per cent. to 20 per cent. ad valorem, and the American product will be the chief sufferer under the revised rate. Now we cannot approve of the Government's policy of imposing such high duties on provisions especially on an article chiefly used as a food for infants where fresh milk is unobtainable. It has been however a long cherished wish of the Government to develop the stock farming industry in order that the population may be enabled to live more extensively on animal food. In spite of repeated failures in attaining this purpose, the Government seems determined to protect the milk industry by raising the import duty on foreign products in the hopes that the prospects of good profits will induce more people to take up farming. But at present at any rate the hopes of the Government is far from being realized for the reason that grasses in this country are considered unsatisfactory for feeding purposes and although we have repeatedly tried the cultivation of foreign grasses the result is equally unsatisfactory. The consequence is that during the winter time we have to feed the animals principally on wheat and this naturally increases the expenditure of stock farming to a comparatively high scale. We are therefore convinced that our stock farming industry will not in any appreciable degree develop in spite of this high protective tariff, and the nation will for long be compelled to use condensed milk at high prices. The new tariff rate on this article should therefore be amended.

(2) The Cotton Spinning industry has now reached the exporting stage and the output is increasing every year. The average output during the five years preceding 1903 was 310,000,000 lbs. per annum, and in the subsequent five years it amounted to 350,000,000 lbs. per annum. The import of this article is gradually decreasing. The average of the second 5 years is 3,000,000 lbs. as against 7,200,000 for the first 5 years. In 1908, the domestic production amounted to 357,000,000 lbs., while the import in the same year was only 1,800,000 lbs., or about 1/2 per cent. of the domestic production. The import decreased still more in 1909, and totaled 1,281,971 lbs. only. Only yarns exceeding 80s. (English counts) were imported and the Japanese Mills are now able to produce much finer counts than formerly. There is a plentiful supply of cheap and skilful labourers, who can operate the most modern machinery imported from Great Britain.

The old uniform rate of yen 4.18 per 100 catties corresponding to 8 per cent. ad valorem, will be raised under the new tariff to a specific duty corresponding to 10 per cent. ad valorem. Yarns are also classified in several grades, the lowest rate of duty being yen 5.80 per 100 catties and the highest yen 11.30. There is no need to discuss the effect of the higher duty, however, as there is practically no more demand for foreign yarn for domestic consumption.

The following is the comparative table showing the home production and import of cotton yarn during the ten years up to 1908:—

Year.	Domestic production Lbs.	Import Lbs.
1899	358,770,017	10,947,129
1900	270,163,675	12,067,984
1901	275,965,242	7,992,828
1902	320,491,225	3,597,243
1903	326,006,433	1,415,517
Average	310,279,318	7,204,220
1904	288,075,583	716,949
1905	367,815,483	2,980,033
1906	384,898,708	7,537,332
1907	394,356,567	2,380,715
1908	357,202,183	1,820,493
Average	358,470,305	3,087,094

(3) The Cotton Weaving Industry of Japan is making good progress, especially in the manufacture of plain goods, and it is certain that this industry is capable of further development as is the case with the Cotton Spinning. The import of Cotton Textiles will gradually decrease as the industry is extended in this country irrespective of any change in the tariff, which under the Law will be increased from 10 per cent. to 20 per cent.

Great Britain produces fine grade goods with American and Egyptian Cotton, while ours are of lower grade, using Indian and Chinese cotton, chiefly (as well as American cotton for mixing).

The demand of the Oriental markets for cheap articles, the facilities of importation of the raw materials, places Japan in more advantageous position than the European countries. We may here add in passing that the reason why the finer goods are not much in demand in the East is that we are accustomed to use silk stuffs where fine cotton goods are used in the Occident. Silk is produced at a comparatively low cost in the Orient.

For the reasons above stated and also for the fact that the new tariff rate is raised comparatively high, we must come to the conclusion that the import of cotton textiles are doomed in this country. But in compensation Great Britain will receive considerable orders for weaving machinery in proportion to the increase of cotton textile industry in Japan.

The following table shows the development of the domestic industry and the value of imported textiles during last ten years.

Year.	Domestic Production.			Import.
	Yen.	Shrings.	Others.	Yen.	Shrings.	Total.
1899	45,577,384	4,547,084	4,326,673	8,873,757
1900	57,745,068	7,646,947	10,493,225	18,140,172
1901	45,607,486	3,806,382	4,961,857	8,768,239
1902	53,030,661	7,698,043	8,359,180	15,057,223
1903	45,945,375	4,782,096	2,559,539	7,341,635
Average	49,581,195	5,496,110	6,140,095	11,636,205
1904	50,651,331	3,021,839	6,156,393	9,178,232
1905	67,776,499	8,238,636	10,194,520	18,433,156
1906	80,386,382	8,871,168	10,553,916	19,425,084
1907	98,742,341	8,364,670	9,134,479	17,499,149
1908	88,105,814	9,204,164	8,695,346	17,899,510
Average	77,132,473	7,540,095	8,946,931	16,487,62

From this table it will be seen that the domestic production in the second five years shows an average increase of yen 28,000,000 against the average for the first five years, whilst the imports of foreign goods show a trifling increase of yen 5,000,000. Moreover, the highest mark of imports was in 1906 and since then the tendency is in decline.

(4) The duty on Woollen Yarn under the old tariff, viz. yen 8.00 and yen 9.16 per 100 catties, (corresponding to 8 per cent. ad valorem) will be raised to 15 per cent. ad valorem under the new tariff. This industry is comparatively simple and should prove successful if established in this country. Japan is situated not very far from Australia and can import wool free of duty. The development of this industry will chiefly affect the import of woollen yarn from Europe, especially from Germany.

(5) Duty on Woollen Goods and mixed tissues of wool and cotton, such as woollen cloths and serges, which was generally at the rate of 10 per cent ad valorem or a specific duty corresponding thereto in the old tariff, is now raised to a specific duty corresponding to 25 per cent ad valorem in the new tariff.

Considering how near we are to such wool producing countries as Australia, New Zealand and Mongolia, it seems feasible to expect the establishment of the Woollen Goods Industry in Japan on a large scale and thus enable the people to use woollen cloth more extensively as an everyday article of clothing. The possibility of the development of this industry, on the same lines as the cotton & silk industries, is proved by the fact that there are already a good many mills established in this country, and those especially engaged in this manufacture of muslins, flannels, blankets, rugs &c. have successfully emerged from their infant stage though they are not yet able to realize a fair profit, mainly due to keen competition among themselves.

The domestic production of woollen goods in 1908 is as follows:—

	Yen.
Muslins	6,500,000
Serges	870,000
Rugs and Shawls	320,000
Flannels	370,000
Blankets	600,000
Woollen Cloth	2,420,000
Others	480,000
Total	11,590,000

The import of foreign products during the last three years is as follows:—

	Yen.
1907	12,300,000
1908	8,560,000
1909	9,080,000

The decline in the import of foreign products as shown in the above table is simply a reflection of the expansion of the domestic industry.

Out of the above figures the import of woollen cloth alone during these three years was as follows:—

	Yen
1907	8,674,000
1908	4,396,000
1909	5,866,000

This gives an average of yen 6,312,000 for the three years, as compared with the domestic production of yen 2,420,000, which is not at all a satisfactory state of things for our woollen cloth industry. Although the increase of duty from 10 ad valorem to 25 will no doubt hit hard the customers of higher classes (the higher class people of this country mostly wear imported woollen cloth, as we cannot at present manufacture goods of finer qualities) the demand for woollen goods in general will increase all the same. The increased cost of imported goods consequent upon the higher duty will give impetus to the domestic industry which has long suffered from keen competition with foreign products. The future of this industry is very promising and it is even desirable for the welfare of the country that foreign woollen mills should come and engage in this line of industry. They are sure to reap fair remuneration.

(6) Duties on tissues of flax, ramie, hemp and jute, which were generally 10 per cent. ad valorem under the old schedule, are now raised to specific duties corresponding to 20 per cent. ad valorem. The only exception is fine grade jute yarn, and the rate of duty on this article is reduced from 30 per cent. ad valorem to 20 per cent. ad valorem.

We can produce hemp tissues in our country, but as for linen tissues we have to rely upon the imported goods from Ireland, and the value of imports in 1909 amounted to yen 796,000. If it is found necessary to import all linens for domestic use, the tariff on this article is surely one that requires serious consideration.

(7) Duty on all kinds of hats was 10 per cent. ad valorem under the old tariff. Under the new tariff a specific duty of yen 28.80 per doz or 50 per cent. ad valorem, will be imposed on silk hats, yen 7.50 per doz. or 40 per cent. ad valorem on felt hats, and 20 per cent. ad valorem on hat bodies. The imports of silk hats being very limited are not worth commenting. The development of the felt hat industry has, however, nearly checked the importation of foreign goods. The domestic production was 37,000 doz. in 1905, 53,000 doz. in 1906 and 1907, and 66,000 doz. in 1908, whilst the imports declined as follows; 51,000 doz. in 1907, 37,000 doz. in 1908 and 31,000 doz. in 1909. These figures shows that the imports in this line are decreasing every year and only maintain some place by the importation of fur hats. We may safely predict a considerable stride in this industry sooner or later especially when the domestic factories turn their attention to the manufacture of hats made from fur. The import of felt hats from Great Britain in 1909 was 16,000 doz. valued at yen 390,000.

(8) Duties on printing and writing papers which were at a uniform rate under the old tariff of 10 per cent. ad valorem will be subject to specific duties under the new tariff corresponding to from 15 to 20 per cent. ad valorem. No change however will be made in the rate on news printing papers, i.e. those weighing not more than 58 grammes per sq. metre.

The paper mills in Japan are in a fairly prosperous condition. Rags, straw, wood pulp, and other materials are abundant and we are justified in saying that the paper trade will be one of Japan's most prosperous industries.

The increase of import duty under the new tariff is limited to certain fine grade papers, for the supply of which we shall have to rely on foreign products at least for some time to come.

(9) In the iron schedule the rate of duty on crude material such as pig iron &c. is sen 10 per 100 catties against sen 8.3 under the existing conventional tariff but this difference is due to the increased cost of the articles and the fundamental rate of 5 per cent. ad valorem is therefore unchanged. The same may be said in the case of tinned iron sheets. The rate of 10 per cent. ad valorem is the same; only the importers will have to pay about 20 sen more per 100 catties now on account of the increased original cost. The duties on iron bars and rods of not exceeding quarter of an inch diameter are fixed under the new tariff at 15 per cent. or 60 sen per 100 catties. According to the old tariff iron & steel bars were rated at 26.1 sen per 100 catties (corresponding 7 per cent. for iron and yen 1.812 (7 per cent.) for steel. This was now revised to 60 sen for both iron & steel. This shows that in some instances the rates may be said to have been materially reduced under the new tariff.

The total value of iron imported in 1909 was yen 26,328,000. Out of this total, yen 19,140,000, represents articles which will be subjected to increased duties, and out of this amount yen 273,000 is of Britain origin. The following table shows the important changes which will be made in the duties under the new tariff.

Articles.	New tariff.	Conventional tariff.
Yen.
Bars & rods including joists, angles &c.	0.60 per 100 catties.	26.1 sen (those exceeding $\frac{1}{2}$ inch in diam.) 5.03 sen (those exceeding $\frac{1}{4}$ inch diam.) Or corresponding to $7\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.
Wire Rods, in coils.	0.90	do.
Plates and Sheets, not exceeding 0.7 m/m. in thickness.	0.40 (7½ per cent.)	0.296 yen (7½ per cent.)
Plates and Sheets, other than the above.	0.60-0.75 (15 per cent.)	Of steel, at 7½ per cent.
Galvanized sheets.	2.00 (20 per cent.)	0.74 yen (10 per cent.) Of steel, at 10 per cent.
Galvanized wire, not exceeding 1.5 millimeters in diameter.	1.35 (20 per cent.)	0.256 yen (5 per cent.)
Galvanized wire, other than the above.	1.20.	Of steel, at 5 per cent.
Rails.	0.80. (20 per cent.)	0.129 yen (5 per cent.) Of steel, at 5 per cent.

To raise the duty on iron, irrespective of the infancy of our iron industry, is in our opinion, inimical to the welfare of Japan, and we are of opinion that the Government's intention was not for protective policy but for the increase of revenue. We have at present only one iron mill, located at Edamitsu, and more than half of the domestic consumption must be obtained from abroad, whether the duty is raised or not. The high duty to be imposed on galvanized sheets and wire is surely the one to be subjected to further investigation. The hasty increase of the rate of duty on rails, however, is understood to be the outcome of the development attained by the Edamitsu Iron Works in the line of rail making. The works have now a sufficient capacity to meet the demand, so that the tariff question on this article need not be considered under these circumstances.

(10) The increase of duty on insulated copper wire to 25 per centum ad valorem from 5 per centum ad valorem is rather extraordinary, but it seems that the standard rate of 25 per centum ad valorem is to be uniformly applied to similar articles. Submarine cables, however, are made free of duty, and that on ordinary copper wire is reduced to yen 9.50 per 100 catties from yen 11.20, copper being our native produce, the industry will be ultimately developed to the exclusion of foreign articles.

(11) The increase of duty on plate glass is also extraordinary. In the existing conventional tariff it is only yen 0.302 per 100 sq. feet, or 8 per centum ad valorem, but, under the new tariff, it is brought up to the 25 per centum standard, and the duty was raised to yen 18.40 per 100 sq. metres (that is, yen 1.71 per 100 sq. ft.) on those exceeding one square metre each. We consider this increase of duty inadvisable under the present circumstances, as there is but little hope for the development of the glass industry in this country, and we must depend upon the foreign products, to meet all the domestic demand.

(12) Duty on Locomotives and tenders, which was 5 per cent. ad valorem in the old tariff, is now raised to 20 per cent. ad valorem, particularly to a specific duty of yen 7.60 per 100 catties on steam locomotives, and of yen 9.20 per 100 catties on others. This hasty increase of rates seems to be adherence to the general policy of imposing 20 per cent. rate on machines and vehicles. We can build locomotives in our country, but our production is limited and we are importing a good many from foreign countries. It should, however, be remembered that the greater part of our railway system being state owned, the change in duty will have no financial effect on the finance of the Government. The mining and logging engines, however, want a low tariff, and we are of opinion, that it is unreasonable to impose the duty to 20 per cent. ad valorem and that a special rate ought to be fixed for these engines.

(13) The old rate of 15 per centum ad valorem on machinery and the parts thereof was increased to a specific duty corresponding to 20 per centum ad valorem. Printing machines are also brought up to the 20 per centum level from a conventional tariff rate of 5 per centum ad valorem. The general increase of rates on machinery may be the result of revenue policy, the uniform standard rate of these articles being fixed at 20 per centum ad valorem. Duties on certain special machines, however, are left unchanged in the new tariff.

The domestic industry of machine-building is still in a primitive stage, and we are unable to produce those which need skilled workmanship. The increase of the duty, therefore, will result in larger imports of fine machines of light weight on account of specific duty being imposed, while coarse and heavy machines will largely be built at home. We have few skilled labourers, and we must necessarily rely on the supply from abroad for fine machines. The duty on certain machines, such as we mention hereafter is left unchanged, to encourage the general development of our industry.

Spinning machines, preparatory machines for spinning and weaving, yarn finishing or twisting machines, weaving looms and tissue finishing machines.

Yarn or tissue dyeing machines including yarn or tissue printing machines, and yarn or tissue bleaching or mercerizing machines.

Paper making machinery and preparatory machines for paper making.

Machines and accessories for sugar manufacture. Air compressors, ammonia compressors and other gas compressors.

Pneumatic tools.

Metal or wood working machinery, such as rolling machines, drawing machines, nail making machines, moulding machines, flanging machines, bending machines, rivetting machines, &c.

Parts of machinery, such as, saws for machinery, iron spindles and flyers for spinning or yarn twisting, card clothing, shuttles, reeds of metal, endless metal webs for paper making.

All the above machines maintain their old rates of import duty in the new tariff law, except the standard is changed from ad valorem to specific.

As aforesaid, we can build heavy machines, such as steam boilers and, consequently, the import duty on such articles is raised in the new tariff, excepting some parts of boilers, such as, flanged boiler plates, corrugated boiler furnish tubes and others, where the import duty was reduced from 20 per centum ad valorem to a specific duty corresponding to 15 per centum ad valorem. As we have stated above, we will build coarse and heavy machines in our country, while fine machines of light weight will be supplied from abroad. The consequence will be that increased orders will be placed abroad for those parts of machinery which need skilled workmanship, and taking it as a whole, as the duty on these articles will be imposed on the specific basis, it will practically result in a reduction of rate under the New Tariff Law.

(14) Nothing will check the general trend of the increasing demand on rubber, and the increase of duty from 10 per centum ad valorem to 20 per centum ad valorem will have no effect upon the importation of the articles.

(15) The increase of duty on superfine soap to 50 per cent. ad valorem from 10 per cent. ad valorem is a heavy blow to the consumers, though the amount to import will not in any appreciable degree be affected the increase of the rate, however, will have the effect of inducing the foreign manufacturers to set up soap factories in this country.

(16) In conclusion, we would say that out of total imports of yen 393,000,000 (in 1909), principal British products (of items of more than yen 100,000 in value) amounted to yen 86,000,000, and the articles represented by yen 37,500,000 in value, especially those articles, such as, condensed milk (yen 463,000), woollen yarns (yen 483,000), cotton yarns (yen 818,000), flannels (yen 283,000), blankets (yen 30,000), hats (yen 492,000), rails (yen 447,000), engines (yen 841,000), and soap (yen 102,000), totaling yen 3,959,000, will mostly be affected by the increase of import duty under the new tariff law. Then there will come cotton piece goods (yen 12,172,000) with more or less decrease in import. In contradiction to the above, there will be an increase in the import of spinning machines, looms, machine tools and no immediate decrease in the lines of woollen tissues (yen 4,584,000) and of iron (yen 7,681,000) will take place. In the case of machinery (yen 6,655,000), imports of fine machines will increase, while heavy machines will decrease.

We are intending to enquire into the New Tariff question more minutely and more thoroughly. Although for the purpose of increase of state revenue and also for protection of various industries we consider the general increase of the tariff rates as necessary, yet we are convinced that there may be some articles of which the proposed increase of rates neither benefit the state nor foster our industries. Such must be modified.

The above are our answer to your questions respecting the trade relations between the United Kingdom and our country. To cite another instance not affecting the former country we should say that we see no reason why the duty for artificial indigo—an article not produced in Japan—should be raised. Other instances of such an error of judgment will be found besides those we have cited.

Raw materials intended for manufacturing purpose were transferred generally to the free list, and also there are a good many articles, of which the duties were materially reduced in the New Tariff. It is needless to say that we fully endorse such revisions for the promotion of our foreign trade.

SOME RECENT BOOKS.

(WRITTEN FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

A writer in the Times begins his review of M. Lucien Daudet's latest volume as follows:

"Sometimes when a great man disappears, there remains in the school or coterie that surrounded him a last reflection of his genius, a broken incoherent likeness, like an image, often interrupted, mirrored in the fragments of a shattered looking glass. Never was this truer than of Alphonse Daudet; for Madame Alphonse Daudet preserves the grace of style, the delicate observation which we associate with her husband's later works, and Leon Daudet the turbulent fancy, the realism touched with extravagance and gaiety that were his native gift; and here in Lucien Daudet's latest book is an echo of the late novelist's sensibility so tender in its humour with its droppings of warm tears. "Brisacier" the second story is really akin to the histories of Tach, or Déirée Delobelle."

Mr. Lucien Daudet's book possesses the whimsical title of Le Prince des Cravates, and contains four tales or studies of moderate length. These stories are curiously unequal in quality. The first which gives the title to the book is neither very interesting nor very entertaining. It is a rather disagreeable study of modern French young manhood. The adventures of Albert Salvage and his visit to an English country house are described in a manner which to English minds at least, is in very bad taste. One can only hope that the story gives as inaccurate a picture of French manners and ideas as it certainly does of life in this country.

Neither is the third story of M. Daudet's volume in any way remarkable. It is called "Muanie," and is a reminiscence of childhood. Decidedly, French writers possess the trick of this type of writing. Anatole France and Pierre Loti have done exquisite things in this manner, interpreting with a firm and delicate touch the glamour and the humour, the sudden tears and smiles of childhood. But "Muanie," as a whole, is unsuccessful. It is at once vague and laboured. It is too long, worse, it is long-winded and amongst a multitude of words the magic that should be there has somehow escaped.

One vivid little incident stands out from the story. Upon a tedious railway journey, a lady waves her pocket handkerchief out of the carriage window in order to amuse her sensitive and fidgety little boy.

"Oh, ce mouchoir, je le vois encore, si fin, si blanc, qui faisait drapeau et claquet au vent de l'express, en embaumant le wagon! Une étroite dentelle noire le bordait que je pourrais vous dessiner exactement. Lorsque maman en eut assez, jela suppliai d'elle de donner pour renouveler moi même la folle expérience; j'empoigne le mouchoir dans mes petites mains febriles et sales, je le brandis dehors et je le lache! Nous traversons la plaine de Ga'n a toute vitesse. Me voila pris d'une sorte de crise nerveuse, pleurant, gémissant suppliant mes parents du tirer la sonnette d'alarme! Le mouchoir, le petit mouchoir de maman! Il me semblait qu'un peu de maman venait de s'en voler pour toujours. Je pensais avec navrement à la tristesse du mouchoir habitué à ses sachets à son existence régulière parfumée, et abandonné tout-à coup sur le talus du chemin de fer, au milieu de cette grande plaine qui n'en finissait pas.

"La joie de revoir Fresville ne diminuait ni mon chagrin ni mon remords, et le lendemain, maman dut m'affirmer qu'un chef de gare lui avait envoyé "le pauvre petit mouchoir." En effet elle m'en montrait un tout pareil. L'idée ne m'en vint pas que c'en était une autre et je ne sus la vérité que des années plus tard, apprenant ainsi en même temps qu'il y a des choses toutes pareilles qui ne sont pourtant pas les memes choses."

The real value of the book is to be found in the two remaining stories, "Brisacier" and the sad story without a name.

"Brisacier, or Mademoiselle Brisacier, is an old music mistress, and her character is drawn by M. Daudet with a faithfulness and insight that are almost alarming. The achievement is only saved from relentlessness by a sympathy which is never failing, a charming delicacy and a darting dancing humour which lightens up the thick veil of tragedy hanging over the tale. Poor Brisacier with her pride and her ingratiating ways, her pitiful labours, her melancholy pupils concerts, her birds and her ghastly mausoleum of a home; inexact, untidy, improvident, reserved, shy, difficult to move, hard to help—not one of us but has seen her like with wonder and with pity. But Mademoiselle Brisacier has a cousin Jacques grand'homme, a painter of Menus, old, unsuccessful, simple, brave and gay, a dear respectable old Bohemian, a most lovable soul and the pleasantest figure of the story. We are sorry M. Daudet found it necessary that Jacques grand'homme should die. Die he does however, and Mademoiselle Brisacier dies too, and so the tale ends sadly.

So we come to the last story in the book, the story without a name. It is a little masterpiece. Sad as night, touched with poetry and with mystery; delicate, wistful, vague and tender, it arrests the imagination and haunts the memory.

This web of magic is woven out of the simplest materials. A young man living in voluntary exile upon the banks of the Loire, becomes acquainted with the curé of his parish. In the personality of this man, the Abbé Reure, his appearance, his scholarship, his exquisite tastes, his passion for flowers, his reserve, his sorrow, the mystery of his life and his death; in these things lies the elusive charm of the story.

Upon a summer afternoon he who tells the tale met the Abbé Reure for the last time, and discoursed of many things.

"L'Abbé Reure ne repondit rien. Je m'étais asis sur une touffe d'herbes, contre un bouquet d'épines blanches et de petits sapins et le curé restait debout, les yeux tournés vers la forêt, ses mains robustes croisées derrière le dos. . . . Sans me regarder comme s'il poursuivait un rêve, il me dit:

"Excusez-moi, je suis pressé. . . . venez me voir bientôt, n'est-ce pas?"

La soutane noire fit une ombre derrière les épines blanches et disparut."

There is the episode described in a single phrase. The story of the Abbé Reure is like a passing shadow, seen behind the white and flowering thorn.

As far as the choice of materials is concerned and in the matter of what may be called the bones of a book, a strict simplicity would appear to be the fashion. The French are, of course, past masters in the elaboration of the slightest theme, and English novelists with some notable exceptions tend to follow more and more in their footsteps. The result is a complete change in the characteristics of English fiction. What is called a novel to-day is scarcely comparable to the novel of thirty, or even twenty years ago. The ideals, the aims and the methods of the novelist have entirely changed. The novel has lost its epic quality, its grand length, its many episodes, its well arranged groups. It has become short, concentrated, introspective. The theme is comparatively unimportant; the development is everything. Mr. Percy White's new book "The Lost Halo" fulfils the conditions demanded by the modern novel; it is the careful development of a situation. Besides this, it is a very clever, able and convincing piece of work, by far the most serious and reasoned of its author's many comedies of manners.

"The Lost Halo" is concerned with the adventures of a brother and sister, Alfred and Delia Allington, who are the children of a Notting Hill boot-maker. The children are both remarkable, both destined to make some stir in the world and to rise far above the paternal establishment in Blair Street, Notting Hill. Mr. White faithfully depicts the manners and customs of a large though obscure section of the population of London. He shews opinions and prejudices, class differences and political differences, and the ins and outs of lower middle-class existence. This is not all. The main interest of the book lies in the development of the two central characters, with the resulting comparisons and contrasts which are afforded. Delia Alfred Allington is a genius, an artist in religion; he is the saint of the "Lost Halo" of the title. The upward social progress of the pair must be left to the reader, it will well repay study. Mr. White has created two very real young people with well rounded characters. They are a relief from many book personalities of the day which give the impression of having been drawn on the flat, with no more solidity than the page on which they are described. The minor characters of the book are merely sketched in, and comprise the paternal boot-maker and his wife, Mr. Clark, the family benefactor, two aristocratic children, rather cleverly done, and a young man of the classes, who is somehow not so pleasant or satisfactory as he might have been, the public school type, but disappointing.

The conclusion of the story is rather melancholy, if it escapes cynicism; nevertheless, it is artistic, and it is too probably just.

The book is written in a very pleasant and refined style of which a single example must suffice.

Delia Allington about to become the governess of Lady Revel's children, suppressed the fact of her humble birth.

"Brutal honesty," she decides, "is to be avoided as the clumsiest form of diplomacy. If the Revels are to track you to the repellent boot shop, let it be after you've made yourself invaluable."

But although tempted to practise the evasive arts she looked outwardly, as frank as an April sky! Her eyes, her voice, her smile, all sunshine and tenderness, invited confidence. And she knew her power because she had tested it. To this, aided by a sense of humour, her influence was due. So charming was she that it seemed almost impossible for her to look ridiculous, a gift of supreme value to all who teach."

In these last days the world of letters mourns the departure hence of two of its members. Both with great minds, bright intelligences, energies and powers, they can very ill be spared from the spheres of their labours. The first of these is Professor William James the great American writer on psychology, philosophy and kindred subjects. He was the author of "Talks to Teachers," "Varieties of Religious Experience," "Pragmatism" and many another valuable work. In a region where confusion and doubt and surmise and vagueness of thought abound he has done inestimable service by his clear enunciation of the manly and practical doctrine of Pragmatism. "Pragmatism says that truth is utility, and that the truth of a principle can therefore be estimated only by its consequences." Professor James has accomplished the task of "making philosophy readable." The young generation both in England and America have deep cause for gratitude. His delightful manner, the charm and the beautiful lucid quality of his style cannot fail to interest and to attract even where his matter is most abstruse and difficult. He has never overlooked the romantic or the human side of his subject; he has known how to make text books enthralling. In his last published writing, the paper on "The Moral Equivalent of War" which appeared in MacClure's Magazine for August, Professor James put forward a proposal to divert the military spirit to new uses, which is enticing if unattainable. He writes:

"If now, and this is my idea, there were, instead of military conscription, a conscription of the whole youthful population to form for a certain number of years a part of the army enlisted against nature, the injustice would tend to be evened out, and numerous other benefits to the commonwealth would follow. The military ideals of hardihood and discipline would be wrought into the growing fibre of the people, no one would remain blind, as the luxurious classes now are blind, to man's real relations to the globe he lives on, and to the permanently solid and hard foundations of his higher life. To coal and iron mines, to freight trains, to fishing fleets in December, to dish washing, clothes washing and to window washing, to road building and tunnel making, to foundries and stoke-holes and to the frames of sky scrapers, would our gilded youths be drafted off, according to their choice, to get the childishness knocked out of them and to come into society with healthier sympathies and soberer ideas."

The second writer lately dead is Mr. Frank Podmore whose departure in the fulness of his powers has robbed Psychical Research of one of its most powerful aids.

It will be remembered that Mr. F. W. Myers' book on Human Personality appeared just after its author's death and from that fact gained an added interest and a stranger significance, and now here is Mr. Podmore's book on "The Newer Spiritualism" published in similar circumstances; but his point of view differs widely from that of Mr. Myers. Mr. Podmore is highly practical, severely critical; he attacks his subject in a spirit of sturdy scepticism which does it invaluable service. For when he has lopped and shorn away from Spiritualism all its ugly excrescences of fraud and foolishness, trickery and charlatanism, there yet remains a dignified and purified residuum, mysterious and entralling. A writer in the Times thus concludes his review of "The Newer Spiritualism":—"There is a certain irony in the notion that Mr. Podmore, whose energies have been so long spent in questioning the reality of messages purporting to come from the little band of pioneers beyond, has now joined the band himself. What will they make of him there? And what will be made of them?"

TOKYO NOTES.

Despite the inclemency of the weather a large number of Tokyo citizens attended the launch of the battleship Kawachi at Yokosuka on Saturday last. Leaving Shimbashi on a special train at 9.05 a.m., the guests arrived at the Naval Station at 11 o'clock, just five minutes before the Imperial train. The route between Tokyo and Yokosuka was veritably lined with school children and citizens ready to do honour to their Emperor, and the national flag floated over almost every house in sight.

The scene of upturned faces at Yokosuka was a sight not to be forgotten. It was estimated by the Department that at least 50,000 spectators would witness the launching and raise a banzai for the Emperor; and the estimate could not have been far out. The rain fell in clouds of fine mist and the wind blew a hurricane, but weather had little effect on the mood and general expectancy of the multitude. The route between the station and the place where His Majesty waited the appointed hour for the event, a distance of about a mile, was lined with a mass of people packed more tightly together than anything usually witnessed in dense crowds.

We at last were able to work our way through the crowd and reach the entrance to the Navy Yard. There we found stands erected for guests, a special balcony for the Imperial Family and a still higher one for the Emperor. The colour decorations were in excellent taste and order, and the scene presented, as the hour of chief interest drew nigh, was imposing in the extreme. Walking around the huge structure of the new battleship one could take in her magnificent lines, feel duly impressed with the magnitude of the effort resulting in her construction, and be assured of the consummation of a really great achievement. It was noticeable that the ship, though some 2,000 tons greater than the Satsuma, is built much on the same model.

At five minutes to 2 o'clock the band began the strains of the Kimigayo as a warning that his Majesty had left the place where he was in waiting and was approaching the throne erected for him on the balcony immediately before the bow of the great ship. As the Emperor reached the dais the national anthem again began. The rain was pouring down on the multitudes below but all at once stood with uncovered heads, as His Majesty became seated. It was a matter for satisfaction that the guests were not asked to lower their umbrellas, due account being taken of heavy rain. It was now exactly 2 o'clock, the hour appointed for the event, and the Emperor immediately gave the word to proceed with the launching.

Opposite the Imperial balcony, but in view of the guests, was a stand displaying numbers; and as each stage of the operation was completed one of these numbers disappeared; so that one could tell just when to expect the leviathan to move. The men with their mallets acted as accurately as automatons, performing each operation to perfection. At last number 6, out of the 8 numbers contemplated, was reached, and then the great hydraulic press at the bow began to make things creak; there was a loud noise of huge iron dogs falling out of place, and the monster ship began slowly to glide into the water. Though more than 30 barrels of grease smeared the launchways, clouds of smoke began to rise about the keel amidships, but a hose kept playing on it and in a moment the ship had completed her journey from the stocks, and was floating as primly on the surface of the water as though she had always been there. As she took the water, needless to say, the shouts of banzai were deafening.

The Emperor then left the balcony and the guests at once retired to the immense dining tent erected for the occasion, where a cold collation was found ready for them. As most of them had been standing for some three hours in the rain, they were quite ready for something warm; and when Vice Admiral Sakamoto, as host, finished his speech and called upon the crowd to drink to the health of the Emperor, the draught was long and hearty. In his speech the host said that the event was a most auspicious one, in that Japan had just launched her greatest battleship, built in her own yards and by her own workmen, and that it would take nearly a year longer to complete the ornamental equipment and fittings of the "Kawachi," concluding with an expression of thanks to those who had braved the elements to be present at the launching.

In the evening about 4 o'clock the crowd of returning spectators was so great at the Yokosuka railway station that the crush was indescribable. It is a marvel that some were not squeezed to death. The people simply took possession, pushing the railway hands out of the way and crowding out on the platform, filling up every available car to overflowing. In the midst of the rush a train came into the station, and no sooner was it empty, than it was at once full again, the crowd in their excitement not stopping to find out whether it would go out again or not. As a matter of fact that was not the next train to go out; so that those who were excluded from the cars of the mistaken train, got into the train timed for the next departure, and left the rushers behind, to the only too evident disgust of the latter. In most of the trains there seemed to be more people standing than sitting. Fortunately for themselves there were very few ladies present, as both the crowd and the weather made things far too uncomfortable for the pleasure of the fair sex.

The Department of Railways has just completed its new building at Yaesu-bashi, Tokyo, known as the Tetsudo in, for the department of accounts. The structure is in wood and plaster, rectangular in form, and covering an extensive space. The style of architecture is far too spectacular to be in keeping with the magnificent new Department of Communications building at Shimbashi; but it is nevertheless an immense improvement upon the old department-of-accounts building near Shimbashi station. The site is a convenient one, near the new Tokyo Central Station now under construction. The middle fronts of the new building are (supposedly) ornamented with towers and spires, the taste of which may be questioned, as these projections give the impression of an American exhibition building. The inside furnishing and appointment, however, are admirably adapted to the work of the department, the latest models of convenience being everywhere adopted.

* * *

Tokyo is experiencing some degree of excitement over the increasing number of crimes that have been marking the progress of events lately. If one asks a Japanese friend what the latest news is, the invariable answer now is: "Oh, nothing special, only there seems to be a large number of thefts and burglaries during the last few weeks." Personally, however, we have heard of very few, though the newspapers report numerous cases of housebreaking and assault or robbery. The police are displaying an unusual measure of vigilance and each day sees additional criminals hunted down and secured. One is often mystified by the police reports of confessions made, especially in regard to grave crimes. The police frequently announce that a certain criminal has confessed to so many murders. Then the report goes out that the same criminal has denied the alleged confession. If the Japanese criminal confesses grave crimes as freely and readily as the police reports would suggest, he is certainly a different type of criminal from anything in the annals of crime in foreign countries. In Europe or America there are very few criminals that will freely confess to murder, unless taken in the act. And from the fact that reported confessions in Japan are so often afterwards denied, one may assume that crime in all countries is the result of a similar mental and moral condition. Those who contend that a criminal is more or less insane, have at least some ground for their opinions. Not that confession implies insanity; for it often, if sincere, implies sorrow and repentance, in which case the authorities may be at fault in not giving the accused another chance. It is a very general opinion that life and property in Tokyo would be much safer if the police were given beats and obliged to walk over them so often during their watch at night, rather than as at present remaining cooped up in their little boxes. In most cases a robber could have his way completely before a policeman could be summoned.

THE VISIT OF DR. WHITE'S PARTY TO JAPAN.

(CONTRIBUTED)

Between August 15th and October 5th, during two different periods, Dr. White and three of his Associates from the Bible Teachers' Training School in New York gave in Japan 69 Lectures, with a total attendance of 8,941 Foreigners and Japanese. The Lectures were opened on August 15th at Arima by Dr. Rogers, and continued by him in Gotemba and Tokyo. He gave a total of 33 Lectures. On August 29th Dr. White, Dr. Sweet, and Miss Palmer arrived in Kobe. Dr. White spoke twice at Arima, and ten times at Karuizawa, and returned to Shanghai for an important Conference at the latter place regarding the establishment of a Bible School in China. Dr. Sweet spoke six times at Arima and Gotemba, Miss Palmer 7 times at the two places. On the 30th of September Dr. White arrived in Nagasaki on his return, and spoke there before two audiences, then came on to Kobe, when he spoke four times and at Osaka twice. He took the night train to Tokyo, where he spoke twice on the 4th, and on the 5th once in Yokohama.

The impression left in Japan by these four leaders in the Bible Study Movement has been that of a great privilege given to all who were able to hear these speakers. The wonderful oratory and cleverness of Dr. Rogers, the ability in the presentation of Theological subjects shown by Dr. Sweet, the richness and graciousness of Miss Palmer's teaching, and the wonderful inspiration given out by Dr. White have been the dominating impression left by these four speakers. Especially did Dr. White show great tact and ability in meeting the Japanese audiences during his last trip. Although his time was so short and he was able to speak only while his steamer—the Tenyo Maru —was passing from port to port, yet he made a deep impression on his Japanese audiences. He proved to many a Japanese Christian Worker that the way to understand the Bible is to study the Bible, and the best way to be an able Christian Preacher and Teacher is to be a faithful Bible Student. Many were the resolves made by his hearers to go home and study the whole Bible more carefully. It is hoped that these experts in Bible study will return again to spend a longer time in Japan at no distant date.

To all friends of Dr. White it will be interesting news that at a Conference called in Shanghai September 24th to 26th, by the Committee for the promotion of Bible Study appointed by the Conference of 1907, some very striking resolutions were passed. After a preamble which mentions the importance of raising up Christian Leaders in China who shall be well grounded in the Bible, who shall be developed in sufficient numbers to go throughout the Empire and teach the Bible to every Chinese, and after mentioning the importance of comity and co operation in Christian work, and stating full approval of the methods and spirit of Bible teaching illustrated by Dr. White and his Associates, the following resolutions were passed, viz:—

1.—“That we heartily endorse the action of the Kuling and Mokanshan Conventions in saying that the time is ripe for the establishing of a Bible Teachers' Training School for the Chinese in China, on lines similar to those of the Training School in New York. We believe that such a School would be of the greatest value in building up the Christian Church in China, and we trust that one School will lead to the establishment of several like Schools, and we ask Dr. White to be so good as to render us any assistance in his power in connection with the initiation and possible development of such a school or Schools.

2.—“We greatly rejoice in the experience of Christian fellowship which we have had in the study of the Bible together at these Conventions, and are constrained to adopt the words of Mr. Mott, used by him at the late Missionary Convention at Edinburgh: “The Conference have created an atmosphere, an attitude, a tendency in spirit, a Christian disposition, a great willingness and determination to discover the will of God and do it together.”

3.—“We earnestly recommend prompt action in every way possible, in line with the words of Bishop Banister at the Kuling Convention, when he accepted Membership of the Committee;—

“That the proposal to establish a School for the study of the Bible, along the lines illustrated at the Convention, is a real step forward in the direction of Christian Unity, because based upon the one common platform upon which we all agree, viz:—the Bible, from which we all draw our inspiration. We pledge ourselves to prayer and an affectionate endeavour to promote the same.”

4.—“We ask that God's people in the Home lands will unite with us in prayer that this movement for the teaching of the Bible may be promptly launched.

5.—“We earnestly request persons of large means to whom our desires may be made known, that they prayerfully consider the urgent needs of China and the large possibilities of a prompt and liberal support for such a comprehensive and effective plan as we believe this proposal to be for the teaching of the Bible in this great Empire.

“And lastly our Watchword shall be, ‘The Bible open for China.’”

These resolutions are very striking for two reasons viz:—

1.—They were passed at a large Conference made by all representative Missionaries and all leading denominations from nearly all parts of China.

2.—They show a desire on the part of these Missionaries of many denominations to unite in establishing one Bible School or a series of Union Bible Schools for the training of Christian Workers, who shall labour in all denominations. It is a remarkable step toward Christian Unity.

When Dr. White came to the East he had no dream of any such development, and as the call for the opening of such a School came entirely unasked, he is now returning to America feeling that it is a distinct leading of God.

TOKYO LITERARY AND MUSICAL SOCIETY.

On the evening of Monday the 10th, the second meeting, for the session, of the Tokyo Literary and Musical Society was held at the usual place. Miss Strout was the lecturer of the evening and her subject, ‘The Silver Tongue,’ dealt with oratory and its powers, especially its persuasive power. With considerable gift of this power in her own person, the lecturer illustrated from history the ability of the orator to induce people to endorse his views and to adopt his opinions; for the art she claimed the highest place among classics, alike in its power and its results.

That oratory began very early in the human race is shown by the fact that peoples without a written language, the American Indian for example, have been noted for their rude but picturesque fluency.

Illustrating the studied perfection of oratory among the Greeks and Romans, Miss Strout naturally referred to such names as Themistocles, Pericles, Demosthenes; she gave a characteristic story of the effect of the oratory of Demosthenes on an arch-opponent Aeschines—an effect which years could not eliminate.

To the golden age of Oratory, as it existed in England in the 18th, century, adorned with the names of Chatham, Fox, Burke, Pitt, attention was directed by an apt quotation from Burke. From this golden age has come decline—among the causes, books too numerous, life too strenuous, people too jaded and fagged, to listen to rhetorical periods and picturesque flights of fancy.

The essentials of a public speaker were well exemplified. The part which may on occasion be played by Emotion, and also by Humour were illustrated by apt anecdotes.

Two well defined divisions of Oratory were traced out, viz:—‘the determinate’ with its call for immediate action, and the demonstrative with its striving towards that which is patriotic and honourable. Savanarola, Luther, Wesley, Spurgeon, Moody, were held out as conspicuous examples of the former of these two divisions; while for the latter stood Susan B. Anthony, and her pleading, in the face of opposition and persecution, the cause of Woman; also John B. Gough, the Temperance reformer who drew crowded audiences for 90 nights in succession, to Exeter Hall, London.

Oratory among the negro race was next illustrated, some telling sentences from a sermon by Booker T. Washington being quoted for the purpose.

Miss Strout has great belief in woman's power in the possession and use of “the silver tongue;” she gave instances from the work carried out by Lady Henry Somerset, Frances Willard, and the Rev. Anna Shaw.

The power of the individual to cultivate eloquence—at least within certain limits—was dwelt on in an emphatic manner. While to a certain extent Eloquence is a gift, it is one that often lies dormant until some great occasion brings it to light. To render it effective, however, there are essentials which cannot be acquired; they must be a part of the orator's being; among them a deep sincerity, a terrible earnest, a conviction of a message to be delivered, a work to be effected.

In expressing the Society's indebtedness to Miss Strout for her most interesting lecture, the President regretted that this was the last occasion on which it could be her audience; next week her duties recall her home. Among those in Tokyo to whom her departure will be a signal loss, are the members of the Tokyo Literary and Musical Society.

On the next night of meeting, 2nd November, the subject of the lecture was announced as Pit-Life in Northumbria, the lecturer being the Right Rev. Bishop Cecil.

LAST OF SERIES OF INTERNATIONAL BASEBALL GAMES.

The last of the regular series of baseball games between Chicago university and the Japanese colleges was played on Wednesday, between Chicago and Keio, on the Waseda grounds at Edogawa-bashi. Chicago was again victor, defeating Keio in a well-contested ten-inning by a score of 5 to 2.

This gives the American team a record of six straight victories—the entire series—and the Chicago men are elated accordingly. At the same time one of the Chicago men, when interviewed at the Imperial Hotel after the game, expressed their appreciation of the very kindly way they have been treated by the Japanese students, when he said:

“Of course we naturally feel glad to carry away the complete series of games, and yet they have treated us so well, and been such true sportsmen, that one almost wishes they could have won this last game.” This expression brought forth a hearty “that's right,” from the whole group of American players.”

The Chicago team is directed by Prof. G. A. Bliss of the Department of Mathematics of Chicago university, who is himself a graduate of that institution, in the class of 1897. The men have certainly had a good time in Japan. They arrived in Yokohama on the 26th of September and were met, at the landing, by a party of Tokyo students, who greeted them with Chicago's own college yell, and made up, in the heartiness of their reception, for the rainy, dreary day.

In this connection it may well be said that the Americans have seen Japan at its worst—not even old-timers ever having seen such continuous rainy weather at this time of the year. Still, they say they have had a “royal good time, and are delighted with Japan.” Waseda and Keio men have called, on every fit day, and taken them about Tokyo, singly or in small parties. The American Ambassador, Mr. O'Brien, gave them a very handsome reception; one of the large theatres extended a special invitation; Count Okuma gave them a garden-party, which, although the rain prevented the full enjoyment of his beautiful gardens, was still a very enjoyable occasion. A number of the men were taken on a special excursion to Nikko,—and, generally they have had a very happy visit.

THE SERIES OF GAMES.

Six games have been played, in the presence of crowds ranging from 6,000 to 15,000. Some of these games have been very close at times, but the Americans evidently outclass the local teams, and the games have all fallen to the strangers.

The results of the series are.—

	Chicago.	Locals.
Waseda	Score 9	— 2
Keio.....	3	— 2
Waseda	5	— 0
Keio (10 innings)	2	— 1
Waseda	15	— 4
Keio (10 in. ings)	5	— 2

YESTERDAY'S GAME.

Keio has an excellent team and put up a very good game indeed. Individual players gave splendid exhibitions of ball-playing, but at critical moments the team as a whole betrayed nervousness, showing a lack of team-training. Chicago, on the contrary, played the steady game one might expect from the veterans they are. Undoubtedly, their best work was done at the most critical moments. The game was noisy, and characterized by the Keio yells and songs, and by some real American rooting. Page, in particular, when down on the side-lines, gave exhibitions of “verbal base-ball” that made one's heart glad, and took many an old college man back to his own college-days.

Disputed decisions and noisy protests occurred on both sides, but were characterized by the genial good humoured give-and-take which mean real sportmanship among gentlemen, and the feeling of kindness expressed by the Chicago men at the close of the game is certainly reciprocated by the Japanese students of the whole country.

The official results follow:

It will be seen that at the end of the ninth inning the score stood even, and had the local team not become nervous at that critical point, they had an excellent chance of winning, but the superior team-training of the Americans enabled them to pile up three runs in the first half of the 10th, and to shut the Keio men out with a blank in their half, giving a total score of 5 to 2.

FUTURE GAMES.

Waseda is to play at Chicago next year, but it is improbable that they will face many of the men they met this year. The Chicago team are the men which represented that college this present school year, and Ehrhorn, Cleary, Pegues, G. Roberts and Page were of the 1910 class and will not be in the school next. Boyle also graduates before the next base-ball season.

Collins will be Captain of next year's team, and Steinberger, O. Roberts and Baird are playing their first year of college baseball and will be available for next year's team.

The Chicago team is to spend 8 days in the Philippines and will play 4 or 5 games with local teams. Three of the men are to leave at Hong-kong and return home via Europe the others returning via this port about December 1st, and may play a further short series at that time.

The Chicago men have given the best exhibition of ball playing yet witnessed in Japan.

AN EXPERT ON JAPAN.

The Pittsburg Gazette-Times is one of America's conservative newspapers and its publishing the following article may be taken as a serious expression of the general American sentiment toward Japan.

There are a few "Jingos" in every land, but the average American goodnaturedly tolerates them, and their utterances, just as he does Socialism, Spiritualism, Rationalism and any one of a dozen other "isms," which splutter and orate and end by the average citizen going smilingly on his accustomed way.

A writer in October Taiyo expressed a good manner of dealing with all such matters when he asked if the Japanese people are so weak that they are to be led by a small number who may rant on Socialism, and suggested that the Socialists be left to tire themselves out.

So the average American feels about the Jingoes,—let them talk—"talk is cheap."

Expressions by such men as Bishop Harris, who know what they are talking about, are the views which really lead the people of any nationality.

The Gazette-Times interview is as follows:—
The testimony of Bishop H. C. Harris of the Methodist Episcopal Church regarding the friendly feeling of the Japanese toward America, is particularly opportune at this time when a Chicago newspaper is publishing correspondence in an endeavour to show that the little brown men are preparing to seize the Philippines. Every week or two, also, some American publicist or other is inspired to prophesy war between the United States and Japan. It is the cheapest way to obtain notoriety on a dull day, and to its shame, be it said, there is a section of the American press which is not above making a sensation out of such silly prophecies. Bishop Harris, who has just arrived in this country after five years in Korea, previously spent 30 years in Japan, where he enjoyed exceptional opportunities for learning the sentiments of the people. Here is his conclusion:

Japan is bound to Great Britain by the close and definite terms of an alliance, but good feeling toward America is inherent among the people; it is traditional. I would not be going too far in saying that the good will toward this country which you encounter everywhere among the people, as well as among those in official life, is more than a matter of mere friendly sentiment. It has been in evidence in Japan for the past 50 years, and as I said, is something which the young generations of Japanese are taught to accept as a part almost of national feeling.

It would be strange indeed if the people of Japan did not entertain a peculiarly friendly feeling for those from whom they received their first stimulus to emerge from their hermit seclusion and join the procession of progress. It is this nation which has ever exerted the profoundest influence upon Japanese thought and customs. Commercial enterprise in Japan is founded upon American ideas. The highest compliment that can be paid a Japanese business man is to compare his methods to those of the up-to-date Yankees. The officers and sailors who participated in the record breaking round-the-world cruise of the United States battleships have not yet ceased talking of the boundless and unquestionably sincere hospitality which was extended to them by all classes of persons in Japan. The historic friendship has gained strength through the years. It is inevitable, of course, that there should be jingoes in Japan, fellows who are continually spoiling for a fight and who, if there were a real war, would probably be found occupying extremely inconspicuous positions in the rear guard. We have a few of these gentry ourselves. We have learned to appraise them at their real value and should extend the same process to the jingo element in Japan. Who can point to a single hostile move on the part of Japan against the United States? Bishop Harris is a good deal more of an authority on the opinions of the Japanese people than the gentlemen in this country who are engaged in the manufacture of war scares. Until somebody comes along who seems to know more about the question than he does, let us be guided by Bishop Harris' emphatic statement and put a quietus on the individuals who seem bent on stirring up trouble.

THE "STAR" FIRE EXTINGUISHER.

Yet another invention for dealing with outbreaks of fire in their early stages has made its appearance on the market. Mr. J. H. Baring, the travelling agent of the Standard Fire Appliance Company, is at present in Yokohama with a view to making known the remarkable qualities of the "Star" Fire Extinguisher, and is expected shortly to give a public demonstration of the same.

For this patent hand extinguisher, which is proving a successful commercial investment throughout the East, it is claimed that any outbreak of fire can be instantly suppressed. The tube is twenty inches long by two inches wide, and contains a charge of dry reddish-brown chemical powder which has only to be sprinkled over the flames to produce the desired effect.

Mr. Baring's demonstrations of the efficacy of this appliance have usually taken the following form. A large wooden box, some 14 feet in height and about 6 feet wide, open at one end, is put up, and its interior sides covered with coal tar or other inflammable substance. Within the box are arranged fragments of wood, bundles of cotton, old newspapers etc., and the whole is saturated with kerosene. When this inflammable mass has been set on fire, and is in full blaze, Mr. Baring, on receiving assent from some impartial person among the spectators, has proved his ability with the aid of his extinguisher, to reduce the flaming mass in less than a minute to a few sparks and smouldering embers.

Among the most recent of the many testimonials which Mr. Baring holds, are two from the Kobe Chief of Police and Mr. N. Morgan, Superintendent of the Satsuma-cho Fire Brigade at this port. "The effectiveness of this dry powder," says Mr. Morgan, "was more powerful than any other hand-extinguisher I have yet seen." Mr. Baring, we understand, is making arrangements to give a public demonstration of the capabilities of the "Star" Extinguisher in this locality, and an announcement as to time and place will shortly appear in these columns.

COMPETITION IN THE OIL MARKET.

The recent competition in the oil market, says the Chugai Shogyo, was due to the frustration of the convention between the Japanese (Hoden and Nippon) and foreign (Standard and Rising Sun) oil companies, which was the natural effect of the severe competition between the Standard, of the United States, and the Asiatic, of Great Britain. It will be most interesting to watch the future developments of the market. As the result of this competition, the market price has declined greatly and a further slump is expected. In the meantime the result may prove beneficial on the ground that the very decline of price will benefit consumers in general, especially the lower classes in Japan. On the other hand, if the competition ran to the extreme, it is feared in some quarters that Japanese companies would become bankrupt and the oil business in Japan be brought to a standstill. This is, however, not more than an imaginary fear, for should Japanese companies meet with such fate, foreign rivals would have to sustain even greater losses which would be unbearable. The Japanese product is always in more advantageous position than the foreign inasmuch as the former is under the protection of a customs tariff. The foreign oil has to pay an import duty of 96 sen per 10 gallons and also some 30 sen for freight and insurance, so that the foreign product labours under a disadvantage to the extent of 1.26 yen, some 40 per cent. of the total price. Thus a great difference exists between the effect on the imported oil and that on the domestic product.

NOTICE TO MARINERS.

Notice is hereby given that the work of alteration of the illuminating apparatus at Osaka South Breakwater Lighthouse and at Osaka North Breakwater Lighthouse in Osaka-chiku ko, has been commenced. Both the permanent lights will shortly be discontinued, and the following temporary lights will be shown from the pillars of the lighthouses:—

expediency that history will accord fullest praise. General TERAUCHI has long been recognized as a man of profound ability, but, being absolutely free from self-assertiveness, he might never have reached the pinnacle on which he now stands had not his Sovereign and his fellow-statesmen appreciated his great gifts and seen in him a man thoroughly fitted to deal with a momentous situation. There can be no hesitation in affirming that his name will be bracketed for all time with those of the Meiji heroes.

STANDARDS OF INTERNATIONAL CONDUCT.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 21.)

THE difficulty under which some minds labour in the matter of expansion is proverbial, but not frequently are such striking illustrations afforded as those recently witnessed in this settlement. For example, in the Japan Gazette's leading columns we find the following:—

For other reasons that are not clear, Japan has also apparently decided that in annexing Korea she is under no obligation to fulfil Korea's international relations (sic) and that in extending that country's existing tariff for ten years she was voluntarily performing an act of grace. According to telegrams from London received to-day, however, Japan's opinion on those matters is not shared by British subjects in Japan and abroad. As to the Chosen tariff, the London Chamber of Commerce is reported to have urged the British Government to require that the rates now prevailing shall be maintained permanently, and not for an arbitrary period of ten years, and whatever the result of that proposal by the central commercial body of the world its advancement argues a realization of the arbitrary character of Japan's action in the matter. Similarly might be considered her action in regard to the proposed abolition of extra-territoriality in Chosen, as to which the occurrence of preliminary negotiations leading to the required "amicable settlement" has not yet been admitted by Tokyo.

The remarkable feature of such writing as the above is the curious inability it displays to apply to an Oriental country the standards universally accepted and obeyed in the Occident. It seems to be beyond the perception of the writer that while crying out against discrimination he is flagrantly exercising it himself to Japan's disadvantage. He apparently finds it quite right and just that Japan should be placed in shackles which no Western State would endure for a moment. Much confirmation will be needed before any sober-minded person can be persuaded to believe that the London Chamber of Commerce has taken the extraordinary step attributed to it. No great perspicacity is required to understand that if the Chamber approached the British Government with a suggestion that Japan should be required to guarantee the permanency of existing Customs-rates in Korea, and if the Government adopted the suggestion, England would place herself in the position of arbiter of Korea's destiny. For if Downing Street has a right to dictate the permanency of Korea's tariff convention, then it obviously has a right to dictate the permanency of the treaty of which the tariff is a part; in other words, to dictate the permanency of Korea's independence. Is there the remotest chance of the British Government committing itself to such action? Yet the Japan Gazette appears to see nothing abnormal or incongruous in such a course. It applauds the procedure of "the central commercial-body of the central commercial city of the world," and it finds that such procedure "argues a realization of the arbitrary character of Japan's action in the matter." Where is the "arbitrariness"? Would it not be wholly on the part of any Western Power assuming the position said to have been urged on the British Government by the London Chamber? For what did the United States of America do when it annexed the Philippines? Did it consult any other State before deciding what kind of tariff should be applied to the new territory? And what did France do when she annexed Madagascar? She simply declared the extension of all her own treaties to the annexed territory without any preliminary reference whatever to other States. But Japan is Japan. That is what obsesses the mind of a publicist like the editor of the journal quoted above. He can not rise to the level of appreciating that Japan is to be judged by Occidental Powers as they judge themselves. She remains in his mind always an Oriental State. His bias it not less flagrant in the matter of extraterritorial jurisdiction. He talks of "preliminary negotiations" as essential to an amicable settlement. But just conceive with what a shout of derision such a pronouncement would be received if Russia, or England, or France, or Germany were in Japan's place. Imagine any one of those States being gravely required to permit the administration of justice by foreign consuls within a part of its dominions. Of course since such patent considerations are not apparent to this class of critic, we need not shrink from the proposition that he imagines them to be invisible to the Japanese also. It is all very curious.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, October 14.

Yesterday witnessed a decided improvement of tone. Buying was the order of the day.

Saturday, October 15.

The gloomy weather again produced an evil effect on the market on Saturday.

Tuesday, October 18

People appear to have made up their minds to a radically bad rice-harvest and every one shrinks from investing money. Thus the applications for 5-per-cent. debentures of the Hypothec Bank and the Seikoshō are much smaller than was expected, and the feeling on the Exchange is most depressed.

Wednesday, October 19.

Things remain dull. A heavy drop in Formosa sugars gave a downward tendency all round and this was augmented by the ill success of the Government's conversion scheme.

Thursday, October 20.

All kinds of silly rumours filled the air yesterday, and the bears had the field to themselves. Prices were forced down sharply and no sign of reaction was apparent. We append the quotations for December delivery:—

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF JAPANESE CURRENT LITERATURE.

The great superiority of Formosa to Korea as a source of revenue to the Japanese Government has been clearly demonstrated by a number of Japanese writers within the past few months. In the July number of the Chūō Kōron we find two articles on Formosa, the gist of which we propose to give here. The first is an editorial entitled "Our Colonial Record," which maintains that Japan has great cause for congratulation on account of the success of her administration in Formosa. The second article, from the pen of Mr. Takekoshi Yosaburō, consists of a powerful attack on the sugar consumption tax imposed by the Government with the object of aiding the Formosa sugar industry. Here is the substance of the first article. When, as a result of our war with China, Formosa fell into our hands, not a few foreigners and many Japanese predicted that we should certainly fail at colonization through acting too much like the French in our attitude to alien peoples and races that are deemed inferior to ourselves. We were among those who held this view, but facts which can not be gainsaid have forced us to change our opinion. In Formosa we have followed English methods of government rather than French. We have gone on the principle of not insisting on the Japonicization of the inhabitants. Though there are schools where Japanese is taught, the Chinese from various provinces are allowed to make free use of their own dialects, and their customs, dress, food and manner of living are not interfered with in any way. The notion that alien subjects must be made to conform to the ways of the governing race has never been held by England and this is one of the chief reasons of her success as a colonising Power. We have endeavoured to walk in her footsteps in our management of Formosa. The subjugation of rebels by means of guerrilla warfare was work of which we had had no previous experience when we undertook it, but our success even in this has been great and year by year the area inhabited by law-observing people has increased. It must not be overlooked that one great reason of our success in Formosa lies in the richness of the country itself. Where two rice-crops a year or even more are yielded, where very fine sugar canes flourish, where minerals abound, where the soil is specially fertile, if only there be a Government which is ready to encourage and to superintend the development of all these sources of wealth, large substantial results are sure to be forthcoming. Neither Korea nor Manchuria is to be ramed in the same day with Formosa. The writer here shows by means of long tables of statistics how rapidly the revenue of the island has grown in recent years.

The title of Mr. Takekoshi's article is The Foolish Policy of Colonial spoliation. Mr. Takekoshi condemns very strongly the imposition of a consumption tax on sugar used in this country as most unjust to the Japanese subjects who have to pay it. The amount it yields is only six million yen. It is designed to benefit Formosa at the expense of everybody living in this country. The imposition of this tax is, Mr. Takekoshi maintains, an entirely new departure in colonial policy and one which will, if not checked, work much mischief. Mr. Takekoshi is intimately acquainted with Formosan affairs and therefore speaks with considerable authority on this subject. What he says is this. Our administration in Formosa has, it appears to me, hitherto been the happy medium between excessive centralization and excessive local autonomy. Great powers have been entrusted to the Governor General, but he has always striven to render the island self-governing as far as possible. Our colonial policy has for 16 years always aimed at rendering colonies independent and self-supporting in as far as the safety of the empire allows. The policy we have adopted has never been altered by any of our Cabinets up till quite recently. The Ito, the Yamagata, the Matsukata, the Okuma, the Saionji and the Katsura Cabinets have all strictly adhered to it. But the imposition of this consumption tax constitutes a distinct reversal of the policy we have hitherto followed in Formosa. It is an unwarrantable interference with the system of local government to the establishment of which Formosa owes its rapid development in past years. If whenever our Government finds itself at a loss to discover a new source of revenue, it takes to the spoliation of a colony, we can have no such thing as an independent, self-governing and self-supporting colony. In its recent action the Government has in practice taken away from the Governor-General and his staff of local officials the power with which they have been entrusted ever since we began to govern Formosa. If, as all our statesmen have hitherto held, the entrusting of supreme power to the Governor-General and his Council is essential to the proper Government of Formosa, why this interference with the colony's finances? The imposition of the sugar consumption tax for the sake of adding to the revenue here is a measure which from whatever point of view regarded should be denounced as contrary to the permanent interests of the Japanese nation. It is nothing but using a colony for the purpose of spoliation under the name of protecting the sugar industry in that colony. I can not but hope that the Government will ere long give up following such a short-sighted and pernicious policy as the one I am discussing.

In the July number of the Chūō Kōron appeared ten short articles on summer, the material for which was collected by the adoption of the usual cheap and easy method of sending interviewers to the houses of well known writers. It is very obliging on the part of busy men to furnish magazines with material in the way that has now become habitual throughout the country. In the present instance the group of short essays published make fairly interesting reading. Dr. K. Futagi gives advice as to the preservation of health in summer, Mr. K. Rohan discusses the kind of books people are most inclined to read in hot weather when the mind is by no means as vigorous as it is during other seasons of the year, "Summer trips" is the title of Mr. K. Toyama's discourse, and "Summer Dishes," that of Mr. K. Saitō, while Mr. F. Nakamura sets forth the beauties of "Summer Colours" in the heaven above and the earth beneath, Mr. Y. Takekoshi has a good deal to say about Summer in the Southern Hemisphere, Mr. S. Maya about summer in Berlin, Mr. H. L. Fardel about summer in Switzerland, Mr. Y. Ikebe about summer in Berlin and Dr. Anezaki about "All Sorts of Summers." Next to the Taiyō the Chūō Kōron is probably the most widely read magazine in the country among educated people.

When the Bunshō Sekai was started we predicted that it would prove impossible to go on year after year discussing styles of writing, the peculiarities of current literature and the like without repetition. This forecast has turned out to be correct. Four years ago the effect of foreign languages on Japanese literature was very thoroughly discussed by Mr. Y. Isobe in the pages of the Bunshō Sekai in an article which we epitomized for this journal at the time. In the August number of the same magazine five or six different writers again go over the ground traversed by Mr. Isobe. The first article published is from the pen of Mr. Uchida Rohan. Speaking of translations into Japanese, he says that comparatively few of them are read with pleasure, one reason of this he thinks, being that the spirit and charm of the original works are not reproduced in Japanese. But there is another reason; many of our best works of fiction, says Mr. Uchida, treat of subjects that are by no means familiar or interesting to Japanese and which require a considerable amount of hard study in order to be thoroughly understood. A psychological novel like Hawthorne's Red Letter, even if it could be rendered into Japanese accurately and fully, would certainly fail to interest the majority of readers. Young men to day, Mr. Uchida tells us, are in the habit of talking grandly about this literary work and that, but few of them have the pluck and perseverance to tackle anything that requires steady application. Discussing the translations that have been made, Mr. Uchida reaches the conclusion that most of them need to be re-done. Of Kuroiwa's translation of Hugo's Les Misérables he says, "the flavour of the original has gone out of it" (Hugo no shin no ajiwai wa mattaku nukete shimatte iru.) Mr. Uchida goes on to observe that among the translations that have been made in past years even the very best that can be named are far from perfect. Two model translations mentioned by him are Shaku Shimpachi's rendering of Herbert Spencer's Education and Nakamura Keiu's translation of Smiles' Self-help. But even these he considers capable of improvement in various particulars. Messrs R. Uchida, N. Koda, S. Morita, S. Nakamura and S. Tokuda trace the literary effects of the study of Western books by Japanese novelists and others. Most of these writers acknowledge that they have received much inspiration from the foreign books they have perused. Several of them own their great indebtedness to Maupassant. Into the question of how far the Japanese language will be permanently affected by the importation of Western idioms and figures of speech the Bunshō Sekai writers do not go.

Ever since its establishment the Taiyō has been on the side of liberty of speech and freedom of thought and has resolutely opposed resort to despotic methods on the part of the Japanese Government. In the October number Mr. Asada Kōson discusses in a very calm and philosophic manner the present action of the Government against certain publications and writers. The measures being adopted are so severe that they have caused something like a panic in the literary world. Penalties of various kinds have been inflicted here and there and new cases are being reported every day in which the authors of books or the writers of articles in magazines and newspapers are getting into trouble. Mr. Asada gravely doubts whether the situation is such as to warrant the resort to such strong measures as those now being enforced. It would seem as though feudal despotism had been resuscitated by the present Government, contends Mr. Asada. Officialdom has furnished abundant evidence that it has little respect for the individual rights and freedom which on paper are granted by the Constitution. This action of the Government in the present instance is described by Mr. Asada as a coup d'état in the world of thought which has caused great excitement everywhere. The raid is principally against what is known as the Naturalistic school of novelists and against what are called socialistic writers. Mr. Asada asserts with confidence that the influence of these writers on society generally is very small and does not warrant all the stir that is being made by officials. He says that he does not belong to the Naturalists nor is he interested in defending them, but they are certainly harmless, in his opinion. He adds that the notion that Japanese society is so loosely organized and so fickle as to be thrown into a state of confusion and disorder by a mere handful of novelists or by a few extreme socialists, can only be held by those who are ignorant of the power of tradition and conservative influences in this country. Here are the words he uses on this topic. "As seen by official eyes the organization of society is as fragile as a thin piece of paper, while to us it appears as solid as iron." (Kwanken no me ni eizuru shakwai no shoshiki wa kami no gotoku hakujaku nari. Waghahi no me ni eizuru shakwai no shoshiki wa tetsu no gotoku kyōko nari.) It seems to officials, proceeds Mr. Asada, that nothing but a constant show of authority and physical force on their part can hold society together. In the power of individual character, in the self respect, self-control and circumspectness which are manifested by so many of the units that go to make up the nation our present Government has no faith. The public is regarded by our bureaucrats as ignorant and undiscerning, as so gullible, and so inclined to evil that it lies in the power of a few novelists to do terrible mischief among them. But our knowledge of men assures us that they possess far more common-sense and far greater discernment than they are credited with by officialdom. Surely our officials are suffering from hysteria. The situation to-day is just this. The Government has commenced to fight against new thought with the object of stamping it out. (Shin shiso bokumetsu no tata-kai wo kai-shi shitari.) The objects of its fierce attacks are its own faithful subjects. Officialdom has set itself in battle array against the world of thought. The conflict going on is between official rights and popular rights, between the rulers and the ruled. Such a spectacle as is witnessed here to day was often to be seen in Russia during the ages when absolutism was at its height, but in this country it is quite new.

In this fight victory will at first lie with the Government. Writers are no match for officials armed with authority. They are the sort of people to yield easily when pressure is brought to bear on them. But the victory of the Government in its conflict with thought can only be a temporary one, can only be a victory in name. Eventually the thought which rules the world will rule this nation. The action of the Government will only have the effect of retarding our progress somewhat, to stop it altogether for any length of time is not in their power. This is well illustrated by Russian history. In that country military despotism set itself the task of preventing the free development of thought. For a long while it triumphed, but eventually it had to haul down its colours.

The Government maintain that they have a perfect right to act as they are doing. They are of opinion that the literature they are suppressing is harmful and it is their duty to stop its circulation. But it seems to us, says Mr. Asada, that the opposition their action will develop will constitute a greater evil than the one they imagine to exist. The Katsura Government has been successful to a certain extent. In the main its financial policy has been sound and in diplomacy it has avoided making serious mistakes. But its administration is characterised by despotism that is quite out of keeping with the spirit of the age. The policy followed by the Government with regard to political parties is to devise means for rendering them powerless and spiritless. While professing to have abandoned the assumption of an attitude of superiority to political parties (Chōzen shugi) by the way it treats these parties the Government shows that its one desire is to govern the country independently of them. In both Houses, by working behind the scenes the Government succeeds in overcoming opposition to its measures, and so it has come about that the Diet has ceased to perform the highest function of a representative council; it neither asserts the will of the nation nor acts as a check on the despotic administration of government. The Government habitually disregards public opinion and current thought, and from the Diet as it is now run it has nothing to fear, so that its position to-day is very strong. Relying on its strength, after carrying through a number of operations in the material world—such as the increase of armaments and the re-adjustment of finances—it is now invading the mental world and aspires to dictate to people not only what they shall do but even what they shall think. But in acting thus, our Government is attempting the impossible. However powerful a State may be, it is not equal to the task of remoulding and controlling the thought of any given age (Kokka no kenryoku wa kyōdai navedomo, inada ichi dai no shisō wa kaisaku shi, shihai suru hodo no iyoku wa yū suru mono ni arazu). And the whole spirit of an age is more invincible than prevailing thought. Despite the fact that the present Government believes steadfastly in the omnipotence of bureaucracy, it is regarded with disfavour by the nation. To some people it seems as though bureaucracy were stronger now than it was during the early sessions of the Diet, and in certain particulars this may be so, but at the same time it must not be overlooked that throughout the country people are asserting their rights and the feeling prevailing everywhere is so strongly opposed to despotic government that it is highly improbable that the nation will submit to it quietly for any length of time. What has happened in various European countries will take place here. Marquis Katsura is not so well qualified to stay the progress of thought as Bismarck was, and yet Bismarck failed to do it. No Government can control the age during which it rules. Where things are as they ought to be the age creates the Government, not the Government the age. A good Government utilizes and as far as possible endeavours to influence for good the spirit of the age, but never goes in direct opposition to it.

The next extra number of the Taiyō, which is to appear on Nov. 10th, will be on the expansion of Japan (Nihon Minzoku no Bōchō, sono genjō oyobi shōrai). It discusses the whole question of Japan's colonial future and her new responsibilities as a Continental Power.

* * *

It is in Japan as in Europe and America, a very large number of the learned treatises, essays, reviews, and critiques that appear in book form were originally published as magazine articles. Books compiled in this way are hardly ever free from certain defects. They betray their origin here and there. There is invariably some repetition and occasionally even contradiction in what the same writer has said in the course of ten or fifteen years, and ephemeralness is apt to characterize such writing. But still in cases where the holder of the pen is an authority on any special subject, reviewers are glad to have his utterances on that topic in a convenient form for constant reference. Two books lie before us, both of which were issued last year by the Waseda University Press, which contain hardly anything that has not appeared in some magazine or newspaper. One of these is by Dr. Tsubouchi Yūzō, entitled (作と評論) Saku to Hyōron, the other by Mr. Shimamura Hōgetsu, entitled Kindai Bungei no Kenkyū (A Study of Modern Literature). Dr. Tsubouchi's work covers 488 large-sized pages. It contains original translations of passages from some of Shakespeare's plays and gives the author's views on Japanese drama, fiction and current literature. In translating Shakespeare Dr. Tsubouchi has never been surpassed. We give below a few sentences from the Merchant of Venice in order to show the easy and graceful way in which the meaning of the original is brought out in the Japanese version:

"Shylock, the world thinks, and I think so too,
"That thou but lead'st this fashion of thy malice
"To the last hour of act; and then, 'tis thought
"Thou'lt show thy mercy and remorse, more strange
"Than is thy strange apparent cruelty;
"And where thou now exact'st the penalty, (Which is a pound of this poor merchant's flesh,)
"Thou wilt not only loose the forfeiture,
"But touch'd with human gentleness and love,
"Forgive a moiety of the principal."

Shylock seijō no mono mo shika omoi, yo mo mata sayo sen jōru koto ja ga, nanto sochi ga kono tabi no soshō wa yomo hōshin de wa arumai. Koto rakuchaku no magica to ai nari, niwaka ni utte kawari, jiji to hodokeshi, ima seme hataru kono shōnin no niku ikkin wa mōsu mo, sara nari, moto-kin no taihan to mo menjo shi, kasanegasane no angwai ni sejin to odorokasan shōron de arō na.

"We all expect a gentle answer, Jew."

Koriya! Shylock, nasake aru hentō wo kikilai mono ja no.

"You'll ask me, why I rather choose to have "A weight of carrion flesh than to receive
"Three thousand ducats: I'll not answer that;
"But say it is my humour: is it answered?"

Kayō mōshita nara, naze mata san sen ryō to iu kin wa toranai de, yaku ni mo tatanu jinniku wo tatta ikkin ya sokora toru no ka to go fushin gozaimashō, sono go-henji wa itashimasenu ga, iwaba, temave no suki katte to mōshitara dō de gozarimasu?

Dr. Tsubouchi in the course of this book discusses minutely every question connected with the development of stage-acting in Japan. He is of opinion that a number of new plays need to be written, the performance of which should in no case last more than four or five hours. He has much to say on the training of actors and actresses, on stage scenery, dancing and music. Some of Shakespeare's plays he thinks to be quite unproducable in this country, such as Othello, for instance. Of those that have been staged in Japan The Merchant of Venice has perhaps been most successful, the plot being one that appeals to the Japanese mind. The price of Dr. Tsubouchi's Original Pieces and Reviews is one yen forty sen.

Mr. Shimamura Hōgetsu's new book is a much bigger work than that of Dr. Tsubouchi, covering no less than 725 pages. Mr. Shimamura being the editor of the Waseda Bungaku, it goes without saying that much of the material found in this volume has been drawn from that source, but articles that during the past three or four years have been contributed by him to the Taiyō, the Shin Shōsetsu (New Fiction), the Shumi (Taste), the Shinchō (New Current), the Meisei (明星), the Kabuki (The Theatre), the Chūō Kōron and the Nōgaku (能樂) have also been collected and are now given to the reading public in permanent shape. One of the chief purposes the author has in view in publishing the book, he tells us in the introduction, is to give his views on Naturalism as a principle which throws light upon many of the questions which reflection on human life brings to the front and on its relation to literary development. As to the main object of life and what should be its highest ideal, Mr. Shimamura tells us on the first page of his book he has never been able to make up his mind (Jinsei no mokuteki wa nan'de arō ka? Warera ga inochi no risō to subeki mono wa nan'de arō ka sukoshi mo, wakatte oranai). None of the many theories concerning the nature and chief aims of human life propounded by philosophers satisfies Mr. Shimamura. The whole subject is according to him full of perplexity and he says that to deep thinkers our human existence suggests numerous questions to which no satisfactory answer can be given. It is a happy thing that most people are so occupied in providing for pressing bodily wants and in discharging the duties of their several callings that they have next to no leisure for reflection or speculation on the problems which engage the attention of literary men and philosophers, says Mr. Shimamura. His view is that of Schopenhauer and many others, which is that the deeper the reflection the more confirmed is the pessimism which pervades the mind of the thinker.

One of the principal charms of Mr. Shimamura's writings is the outspokenness, sincerity and thorough unconventionalism which they reveal. In the opening chapter on Naturalism in Life, after a consideration of what has been written on this subject by Professor W. H. Hudson and others, he reaches the conclusion that it throws no real light on the deeper questions connected with human life. Mr. Shimamura does not give in this book anything of the nature of a historical account of modern literature, but merely states his opinions on numerous subjects which have engaged the attention of literary men in Japan. The work consists of about 50 essays on literary subjects, on art, music and the drama. A good many foreign works are discussed, and there are several chapters which contrast literary tendencies in the West with those observable in Japan. In a chapter on the way to commence a literary life Mr. Shimamura says that it is essential to success in literature that a man should not depend on it for a living. This is the rule, though there are no doubt exceptions, since in this country few professions yield such poor pecuniary results as literature. Mr. Shimamura's "Study of Modern Literature" sells at 1 yen 80 sen per copy at the Hakubunkan.

Another book which calls for a brief notice is Mr. T. Tokonami's O-Bei Shōkan (My Impressions while in Europe and America), just published by the Shiseidō. The impressions recorded in this book resemble those of so many Japanese who go to the West. What struck this Vice-Minister so much in Europe and America was the trust that men have in each other, the universal estimation for men of integrity, the high development of local autonomic spirit, the energy and perseverance in work displayed everywhere, the enormous number of our charitable institutions and our places of worship, and our aspirations towards a higher and nobler state of existence. Mr. Tokonami has come back from the West with the conviction that Japan has much to learn from Europe and America. In a few particulars he is of opinion that Japanese ways are better than foreign ways. He does not envy us our workhouses, our poor rates, and numerous institutions for giving aid to the really helpless few and the many loafers who depend on them, perceiving how this kind of indiscriminate charity is working an incalculable amount of moral mischief. He thinks that for relations to help each other in the quiet unobserved manner they do in Japan is preferable to levying rates on whole communities in order to support people whom as a rule their own kith and kin could easily keep from starving.

In Chapter VI of his book Mr. Tokonami expresses the surprise he felt when in Germany, Eng-land and America at the amount of confidence placed in land and employees of all sorts by their employers. The sums of money spent on overseers in this country is certainly very large. The German Home Minister told Mr. Tokonami that his Government made it a principle not to place superintendents over workmen and others. They were trusted to perform the duties devolving on them and it was found that this was the best way of treating them. Mr. Tokonami suggests to his fellow-countrymen and his brother-officers that Japan would henceforth do well to trust to the men they employ rather than as hitherto to the multitude of rules and endless red-tapism to which resort is had for their control. Though in the opinion of Mr. Tokonami Occidentals profess more religion than the Japanese are in the habit of doing, he says that the standard of virtue with the best people here and the best people in the West is in the main one and the same and is quite independent of religious belief. This truth he expresses by quoting an old verse of Japanese poetry Wake-noboru fumoto no michi wa ōkeredo, onaji Takane no tsuki wo miru kana! "Though many be the paths at the foot of Takane, from its summit the same moon is seen." No matter what the creed they profess, the opinion of divers nations concerning the right course to follow in human conduct is one and the same. According to Mr. Tokonami the differences between East and West are superficial. He says that directly we probe beneath the surface we find striking unanimity. Mr. Tokonami tells us that one thing which impressed him very much during his tour was the universality of the spirit of inquiry in Europe and America. In some countries, such as Germany, for instance the Government led the way, but in others every thing in this line has been done voluntarily by private individuals out of mere love of knowledge and that intellectual curiosity which have figured so conspicuously among the contributing factors to the world's progress. It seemed to Mr. Tokonami that wherever he went people were ever on the alert to discover some new and better way of doing things and the knowledge acquired by individuals becomes at once the property of the whole Western world. The intense earnestness displayed by Europeans and Americans in all their pursuits deeply impressed this visitor from the Far East.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

THE RUSSIAN BUDGET.

September 29, 1910.

The Budget Committee of the Duma resumed its labours yesterday, a month before the date fixed for the re-opening of the Duma Session. A number of estimates from different Ministries have already been put in for examination by the Budget Committee. All-summer work has been going on in the reconstruction of the roof of the Chamber in which the Duma sittings take place. The old ceiling, which fell in some years ago, was replaced by a temporary arrangement. The present scheme gives a new roof of glass, or rather an outer and an inner glass roof, to the Chamber, and a horizontal glass ceiling. The two roofs are completed and the glass ceiling is nearing completion. Alterations calculated to greatly improve the faulty acoustics of the Chamber have also been made, and additional room provided for committees by roofing in an interior court.

THE FINNISH DIET.

The Finnish Diet has followed the lead of the agitation-party and by an overwhelming majority decided that the proposals put before it for consideration have not been presented in accordance with Finnish Law, and the Diet can therefore not properly proceed to their consideration. A proposed address of loyalty to the Emperor was negatived. The Diet met in extraordinary session for the sole purpose of considering these proposals, and it having declined to consider them at all, the extraordinary session comes ipso facto to a close.

M. Leo Mechelin, the brain of the separatist movement in Finland, in an interview, explains the reasons why the Finnish Diet declined to consider the Russian legislative proposals laid before them in the extraordinary session summoned for that purpose. "The institution of the Diet, as confirmed by the Emperor in June 1906, i.e. after the publication of the Fundamental Laws of the Russian Empire, make no provision for our Diet considering any such proposals as these." By the Imperial Manifesto of 25th April 1906 and again in that of 6th August 1905, and 20th February 1906, all of which preceded the instrument referred to by M. Mechelin, special note is taken of the future government of Finland and these acts undoubtedly control the interpretation of anything to be found in the local Diet institutions. But, as M. Mechelin says further on, "The Finns do not know the conditions of life in Russia, nor the language of Russia"—and therefore remain conveniently ignorant of everything in the Russian language that may not suit their peculiar views.

TOUR OF PREMIER STOLYPIN.

The tour made this Autumn by the Premier Minister, M. Stolypin, accompanied by the Chief of the Agrarian Settlement Department, is quite a remarkable achievement, the significance of which, in many directions might easily be missed, for the newspapers record little more than that the Russian Minister arrived at such a station at such a time and left "on his further journey" on such a day at such a time! Even a glance at the map to trace his route hardly brings home its full significance. Russian territory is so vast that all maps are necessarily on a small scale and stations a thousand miles apart look less formidable for a journey on a map of Russia than a trip to the sea-side on an English map. By the time he arrives in St. Petersburg again in the first week of October M. Stolypin will have covered by railway, river steamers and road, behind horses, over six thousand miles. Something over two-thirds of this is railway travelling, which in Russia means comfort for the ordinary individual. A Minister, however, can never get far from his uniform in Russia, and all the considerable towns and many of the smaller centres of population along the railways have claimed the attention of the Minister, and obtained a hearing on their local grievances and local schemes of aggrandisement and improvement. The change from the comfort of a Russian railway to the accommodation of a river-steamer is much the same as leaving one's own house for a poky lodging at the sea-side. But no comparison that I can find will convey to those who have happily had no experience of it any idea of what it means in Russia nowadays to travel behind horses "by road." Metalled roads in Russia do not total a mileage equal to one-third that of Russian railways, and most people know how inadequately even yet is Russia supplied with railways. Anywhere off the beaten track of the great highways, built originally for strategic purposes from St. Petersburg and Moscow South East and West, there are, practically, no roads at all, as roads are understood outside of Russia, where the only adequate definition is that a road in Russia is that portion of mother earth lying between two points—the starting point and the point you want to reach. In Winter nature provides admirable snow-roads, but in Spring and in the Autumn rains, travelling "by road" in Russia is pure martyrdom. The thousand miles, or thereabouts, that M. Stolypin will have done "by road" before he gets home again will probably outlive the memory of many more important moments in his energetic life!

The object of this official tour has been to personally inspect in different parts of the Empire the working of the Agrarian Settlement scheme. From the environs of Moscow right away to the shadow of the Altai Mountains the Premier Minister has visited the new villages in which every man is a small farmer and individual owner of his little farm freehold. Such villages do not lie conveniently for travellers, and many a time it has been the lot of Russia's first Minister to pass a night in the tiny close-smelling peasant wooden huts (izba), and on more than one occasion even in the open steppe. For among the places visited have been the Autumn haunts of the nomad Bashkir tribes, who have not yet abandoned the state of pasturage for that of the agriculturist, and complain that their grazing grounds are being annually encroached on by the tide of Russian "emigrants" seeking new homes and more land, in what ten years ago were waste places of the earth, now smiling with golden harvests. But all this wealth of bread-stuffs wants, first and foremost, roads which are something more than merely territory lying between two points, if it is to be brought to the oversea markets, principally to England, in competition with sea-borne grain. And it is for roads, and railroads, that the local spokesmen principally petitioned the Premier Minister on his great tour.

RUSSIAN NAVAL ESTIMATES.

The Russian Naval Estimates presented to the Duma for the year 1911, amount to a total of twelve million pounds sterling, an increase of two and a half millions sterling over the figures of last year. The personal, exclusive of officers, is put at 47,215, an increase of 5,000 men. Roughly both figures, money and men, represent about one-third of the naval estimates of Great Britain! The explanation, which a comparison of the results obtained demands, is to be found in the maintenance at full ratings of all the higher ranks of the service whose utility passed away with the loss of the Russian Fleet at Tsushima. For example, the Pacific Command now consists of a third-rate cruiser and a score of small-fry, gun-boats and submarines. Yet the old divisions, each under its commander and staff, are still kept up, and of these "divisions" there are four in the Pacific Command. Thus the naval equipment of Russia in the Far East in the coming year will consist of one ship afloat, divided into four "divisions" located at as many naval stations each station being provided with a full staff of officials on full pay.

BANDITS.

In the neighbourhood of Elizavetpol a gang of armed robbers is besieged in their fastnesses by soldiers, who, though provided with a machine gun, have so far been unable to dislodge the robbers who have terrorised the whole district for some time past. Casualties occur on both sides and the affair, which is typical of much of the thankless work that Russia has had to do in the Caucasus, reads more like an account of some item in a regular war. It is even said that artillery may be summoned to shell out the robbers, whose mountain refuge seems to be impregnable to ordinary military measures.

A case of the severest form of plague, that attacking the lungs and propagated through the air by the breath of the patient, has occurred at Odessa. The doubt which was throw upon this alarming case has been removed by the result of the bacteriological examination which proved the case to be truly one of lung plague. The patient, a girl, died. The Prefect of Odessa in a two-column article in the press, deals with recent criticisms of the treatment of plague at Odessa. The main points that stand out from this lengthy statement are that Odessa was totally unprepared for an attack of plague, although visited by this disease twice in the past ten years; that there was a scarcity of doctors; that funds were short until the Government sanctioned a special loan; that rat trapping began the moment a case of plague occurred, but there was no proper "rat-typhus" vaccine to be got in Odessa, and this effectual means of dealing with the vermin had to be imported, causing considerable delay. The Prefect inclines to the belief that the plague in Odessa is endemic and says that it will be necessary to entirely rebuild those parts of the town where plague has now repeatedly shown itself. The population, especially the municipality and the merchant classes of Odessa, have likewise caused to appear in the press various articles pointing out that plague is confined to a few known spots in the town and that there is no more danger to life generally in Odessa, than elsewhere, together with appeals ad misericordiam based on the injury done to local trade by the "exaggerated accounts of the plague that have appeared in the press." The authorities of Odessa, who recently were paying two pence half penny per dead rat delivered to them are now offering thirty shillings (sic) for every such rat as on examination in the laboratories shall prove to have been infected with plague. At the same time, notwithstanding the case of lung-plague, it is confidently asserted that the plague is drawing to an end.

The Novoe Vremya which is in close touch with official sources of inspiration, to-day in a leader reviews the attitude of Turkey in connection with the alleged Turko Rumanian secret agreement. The exiled ex-Sultan, says this paper, made a friend of Germany but carefully avoided entering into any definite agreements with any member of the Triple Alliance, well-knowing the result of binding agreements between big folks and little folks—the latter never have much chance of promoting their own particular ambitions and are always compelled by force if need be to further the ambitions of their powerful friends. The new régime in Turkey is apparently guided by less wise heads than the crafty Abdul Hamid who showed great preference to Germany but avoided any forms of entanglement. New Turkey, after a revolution which was singularly favoured by fortune and cost remarkably few lives, is taking a new initiative—meeting German advances half-way. The result will be inevitably that New Turkey will make enemies of England, France and Russia. England and France are now-a-days the only solid financial markets in the world, and New Turkey is even more in need of ready money than was Abdul Hamid. Instead of leaning towards the moneyed Powers, who have what she most needs, New Turkey prefers leaning towards the armed Powers—who will make her a pawn in their great game of aggrandizement. For the present only four warships have been foisted on to Turkey: we may expect more to follow, with added military burdens: when the Turkish treasury has been sufficiently depleted by these specious methods, the Germanic Powers may walk into Saloniki any day they please by merely flinging a few scraps of the dismembered Turkish Empire into the jaws of Bulgaria and Greece. When the Novoe Vremja speaks out it speaks pretty plainly, and the above is merely a digest of a long article.

A lady named Kudasheva, the widow of a captain of Cossacks, has arrived at Tomsk from Kharbin in the course of her ride across the Russian Empire and two continents to St. Petersburg. She expects to reach the capital in November. The lady wears a man's Cossack uniform and rides astride, carrying with her in a couple of saddlebags everything she needs for the journey. Her horse is a Mongol breed and is in splendid condition after some two thousand miles' riding. It was taken straight from the herd and is appropriately named "the Mongol." "Mongol" knows his mistress only and will take food from no other nor even allow any other person to approach. Like all his breed he does not kick out behind but strikes with his forefeet and bites. He receives on the journey 25 pounds of oats a day and consumes in tit-bits from his mistress pocket about a pound of sugar, for which he asks insistently by snatching at the pocket when he thinks he is being forgotten too long. Home Kudasheva sleeps in the stable on a truss of hay alongside of "Mongol" while doing this trip. As far as Chita she was accompanied by a favourite St. Bernard dog which had to be left behind there as the result of an accident.

Another Siberian sportsman who was driving a team of wolves from Chita to St. Petersburg, supporting himself by the way by exhibiting their antics in the villages, has died of cholera at Tiumen, which is about half-way to his destination.

In the search for interesting items for the forthcoming anniversary celebration of the French Invasion of Russia the committee has found in Moscow a veteran soldier of the Selenginsk Regiment of Infantry who, as a boy of ten, remembers the entry of the French into Moscow and their retreat. He is now 108 years old: his father attained the age of 142 and his mother lived 128 years. He describes how the poorer people of Moscow lived during the French occupation. They had run off to the neighbouring forests and volunteers every day took turns to make expeditions to the doomed town to secure food from the deserted shops. In Russia, by the way, the year 1812 is not specially referred to the "French" but with more historic accuracy it is called the "Invasion of the Twelve Tribes" of the Gentiles.

A Russian balloon with an army officer for aeronaut has travelled safely in 25 hours from St. Petersburg to near Saratov, a distance of over 1200 miles. Another has created a Russian record by covering in 40 hours the distance from St. Petersburg to Taganrog, traversing all Russia from North to South a distance of about 800 miles without descending.

A Moscow secondary school has opened a course of the Japanese Language.

An investigation into the question of fuel supply in the Moscow region has shown that the Donetz coal, formerly very largely used for manufacturing purposes, is now being entirely ousted by the increased use of naphtha refuse and especially by the introduction of specially prepared turf fuel. Many large factories make their own fuel in special turf-works.

An Imperial ordinance was gazetted on Tuesday for the establishment for the investigation of waterways. The regulations show that it consists President (Minister for Home Affairs) and 45 commissioners.

COUNT HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

CXLIX.—ITO, AND DR. STEIN.

While Prince Arisugawa's party was staying in Austria, Ito was investigating constitutional forms of Government and often went to hear the lectures of Dr. Stein. I went with him on two or three occasions. Stein had the reputation of being somewhat of a blusterer, but I was much impressed by his practical mind, his almost inexhaustible fund of knowledge, and the skill with which he explained to us the origin of political terms and the historical development of their meanings.

CL.—POPULARITY OF STEIN WITH THE JAPANESE.

The fact that Ito went to Stein's lectures sufficed to make Stein extremely popular with the Japanese. His cult among our people was so widely diffused that to have made a tour of Europe without going to hear Stein lecture was looked upon like going to Arima and returning without having taken a hot bath. He was often confused by our people with the famous Prussian Minister of the same name. So wide was his range of knowledge that on one occasion he was able to hold his own in a conversation on Buddhist priests. Nothing seemed to come amiss to him.

CLII.—THE JAPANESE DIPLOMATISTS OF THOSE DAYS.

Our diplomatists in those days were Count Yonagiharasaki, Minister to Russia; Viscount Aoki, to Berlin, Viscount, Mori to London; Mr. Ida Yuzuru, to Paris, and Mr. Sakurada Yoshichika, to Belgium. In other countries we had secretaries who discharged the functions of Ministers.

Of these gentlemen, Mori and Aoki bore the best reputation for diplomatic skill. But they had but little opportunity for exercising their skill; for the diplomatic questions were few and far between, and nothing troubled the smooth surface of affairs except now and again a question touching the treatment of some foreign resident in Japan. It was perhaps fortunate that it was so, for they were inexperienced and ignorant and did not even know sometimes the value and importance of having a cipher code.

Let me give an example. A certain Japanese Legation in a certain capital city received telegraphic instructions from home to place an order with a certain firm. The order was promptly placed according to instructions. But a day or two later another telegram came countermanding the order, which placed the Legation in a great difficulty. They did not like taking back the order they had given, and they wanted to exonerate themselves in the eyes of the merchant. So they sent a secretary with the telegram and the secret code-book and showed them to the merchant to convince him that it was the Government at home, and not they, that had countermanded the order. This happened about 25 years ago. It was not until the outbreak of the China War that our diplomats learned to appreciate the importance of a secret code.

CLIII.—AMALGAMATION OF THE KYODO AND MITSU-BISHI COMPANIES.

Prince Arisugawa returned to Japan in Feb. 1883. The Kyodo Unyu S.S. Company had just been formed, and a few months later there broke out a fierce competition between it and the Mitsubishi S.S. Co., which finally resulted in the amalgamation of the two companies as the Nippon Yusen Kaisha.

The Kyodo Unyu S.S. Co. was projected by Marquis Inouye, but it was Viscount Shinagawa, then Minister for Agriculture and Commerce who did the actual work of floating the Company. The reason alleged was that it was not advisable to leave all the carrying trade of the Company in the hands of the Mitsubishi Co. But this was merely a pretext. The fact was that Marquis Inouye was at the time scheming for political activity in Korea, and the new Kyodo Unyu Kaisha's steamers were so constructed that they could be converted into armed cruisers at very short notice.

CLIII.—PROMPTITUDE OF THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

On the occasion of the riots in Seoul in the 15th year of Meiji (1882) the Chinese Government displayed unwonted activity and promptitude, and arrested Prince Dai-en-Kun, whom they put under confinement at Hakanfu. The Viceroy of Chih-li at the time was Li Hung Chang, but the mourning for his mother had called him away from his post, and O Bunsho (王文韶) was taking his duties at Tientsin as his deputy.

The Viceroy's deputy was as gentle as an old woman, without any powers of initiative, but he had under him some audacious and enterprising persons such as Ba Kenchu (馬建忠) who made up for the deputy's deficiencies by adopting vigorous measures in his name. Had Li Hung Chang been at his post it is scarcely likely that such active steps would have been taken.

CLIV.—MARQUIS MATSUKATA'S FINANCIAL MEASURES.

The differences in value between paper money and specie became so great at this time that a silver yen was worth one yen and eighty sen in paper. This was due to the unlimited issue of inconvertible notes. Apropos of this, Marquis Matsukata, then Minister of Finance, made representations to the Cabinet, the gist of which, I have been told, was somewhat as follows.

The only result that could possibly arise from the present policy of issuing notes to make good the deficit in the income would be a further depreciation of paper and a second deficit, and so on ad infinitum until the whole thing ended in disaster. It was like giving alcohol or opium to a person already poisoned by them: the fresh dose would bring a temporary relief, but end by aggravating the disease until the only way of escape was suicide. In the case of Japan there was still time, but there was only one remedy. The amount of paper currency must be lessened. Of course the adoption of such a measure would lead to much temporary discomfort and discontent (the alcoholic patient did not enjoy the cutting off or diminishing of his favourite beverages), but the pain had to be borne for the sake of the ultimate benefit. The Marquis therefore begged the Ministry not to allow themselves to be swayed from their course by any complaints or grumblings about the scarcity of money, but to persevere to the end, when the finances would be adjusted.

To these suggestions, the Cabinet gave their consent and promise. A maximum of expenditure was fixed for each department for the next three years, Government expenditures of all sorts were reduced to a minimum, and the superfluous paper notes were withdrawn from circulation with all convenient speed. The effect was remarkable. Within three or four years the discrepancy between silver and paper had disappeared, and in the 17th year of Meiji (1884) it was found possible to issue a system of convertible notes.

A great many people maintain that the rise in the value of paper money is due to an increase of specie reserve. This is quite wrong. It is an elementary proposition of political economy that a currency with fictitious values (such as inconvertible notes) will appreciate or depreciate according as the supply falls short of or exceeds the demand that there is for it.

And yet it is wonderful how many, even skilled economists, overlook this elementary proposition.

CLIV.—THE GOLD STANDARD.

All European Powers had adopted a gold standard. The British Indian Government had imposed restrictions on the coinage of silver, which were almost tantamount to the adoption of a gold standard. The world's demand for silver diminished so remarkably that a one yen gold piece came to stand at yen 1.40 or yen 1.50 in silver. Japan found herself obliged to follow the example of the Occidental powers and in the 30th of Meiji (897) a gold standard was adopted.

The methods employed on this occasion were the exact reverse of those adopted when the problem before the Government was the raising of the value of paper money. No limit was put to the coinage of silver, but the weight of gold coins was reduced by one half, so as to equalize values and keep the proportion between silver and gold.

But the result was a disturbance of balance in the price of commodities, in interest, in wages of labour, a disturbance which is still active, after ten long years, and which has caused much serious financial embarrassment, both public and private.

The object before the Government was the same on the two occasions when financial adjustment became necessary. And yet the mode of procedure in the second case was the exact reverse of that in the first.

Is it to be wondered at that the results were so very different?

CLV.—SIR EDWARD REED.

The one great desire that was ever present in the minds of Japanese statesmen during the early years of Meiji was the revision of the treaties, and especially of those clauses which established consular jurisdiction over foreigners and deprived Japan of the full rights of taxation.

When Marquis Inoue became Foreign Minister in the 12th year of Meiji, he set about the business with his usual vigour.

One day the Foreign Office in Tokyo received a cable from Mr. Ueno Kagenori, Japanese Minister in London, to the effect that Sir Edward Reed, M.P., was come as a globe-trotter to Japan, and that his position as chief Naval Constructor made it advisable that he should be given a very warm welcome.

Acting upon this, Count Kawamura, who was at the time Minister of Marine, sent a cordial invitation to Sir Edward, and on his arrival in Japan, Jan 10, 1879, he was entertained and lodged at Count Kawamura's residence.

The reception accorded to Sir Edward Reed was almost too cordial. Marquis Inoue was of the opinion that the greatest obstacle in the way of treaty revision was Sir Harry Parkes, and he was very anxious to see him transferred to some other post, or at the least to have some limits put to the very arbitrary influence that he exercised. I believe that he hoped to gain something of the sort through the medium of Sir Edward Reed. Sir Edward was certainly a man of influence in the shipbuilding world, and he was well disposed towards Japan. But ship-building is one thing and treaty revision another, and Marquis Inoue never made a greater mistake than when he concluded that Sir Edward Reed could exercise any influence in diplomatic questions. Was it likely that the British Government would change its Ministers at Sir Edward's suggestion?

The Marquis was, however, blind to this simple fact, and the sole result of the splendid hospitality lavished upon Sir Edward Reed was that it hurt the feelings of the British Minister.

Sir Edward was not long in Japan before he saw through Marquis Inoue's designs, and he cajoled him most skilfully during the whole of his stay. On his return to England he wrote two volumes on things Japanese, one of the most accurate and reliable of all books written on Japan, as well it might be, seeing that all the information was furnished by the Foreign Office.

Sometime after his return to England Sir Edward sent a cablegram to Marquis Inoue, demanding a remittance by telegraph of £1,000 for the expenses incurred by one of his brother M.P.'s, who had asked a question in the House relative to the withdrawal of the British troops stationed in Yokohama.* Inoue consulted with Count Okuma and decided to send the money. Some months later Sir Edward, writing to Marquis Inoue, enclosed a copy of the order of the day and a newspaper cutting. From these the Marquis was able to glean the information that a certain member of Parliament had asked the Government when the British troops stationed in Japan would be withdrawn, and that an Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs had replied that they would be withdrawn when their presence there was found to be unnecessary. This was the only information elicited, and it cost Japan £1000 sterling!

CLVI.—RECEPTION WASTED ON GOVERNOR HENNESSY.

In the same year (1879) our Foreign Office officials busied themselves with another reception—that of Mr. Pope Hennessy, an Irish M.P., and a celebrated orator, who for some reason or other had been appointed Governor of Hongkong. The reception was dictated by the same motives as those which had operated with Marquis Inoue in the case of Sir Edward Reed.

On this occasion Governor and Mrs. Hennessy and the baby were lodged in the Foreign Minister's Official residence, and the entertainment was far more lavish than before. How lavish it was may be gathered from the one fact that the house was newly furnished, and that the furniture had all been lacquered by the famous artist Kyoichi, then in the zenith of his fame, who could command ten yen and more just for lacquering a pipe.

The reception accorded to Sir Edward Reed took place during the absence of Sir Harry Parkes, who had gone home on furlough: that of Governor Hennessy took place after Sir Harry's return to Japan. Sir Harry took exception to the flag used by Governor Hennessy in the boat which carried him to a British man of war in Yokohama harbour, and a lengthy correspondence followed which the Governor showed to Marquis Inoue with some glee.

When the Governor and party went to visit Hakone, Nikko and other places in Cental Japan, the Minister for Foreign Affairs with his wife and daughter attended him: when he visited Eastern Japan and the Hokkaidō, Count Okuma was in attendance, with myself as his interpreter. Count Okuma tried hard to draw him out on the subject of treaty revision and the recovery of taxation-rights, but Hennessy always contrived deftly to change the topic, nor did he allow himself once to be drawn to dangerous ground during the whole of the trip. Craftiness is but of little use in matters diplomatic.

It was very fortunate for Japan that the British Minister at the time was an upright man, and that, but though he was by the manner of these receptions, he would not allow his private resentment to interfere with his conduct of public affairs.

On the occasion of Governor Hennessy's reception Inoue was very busy. "I wish," he once groaned to me during this time,—"I wish Ito could have been a little kinder. I wish he could have given me some help, now that I want it so badly."

I told Ito, who was at the time Minister of Home Affairs, of Inoue's complaint.

"Inoue is making a tremendous mistake," he said, "in trying to carry out treaty revision through any person except the Minister who has the confidence of the British Government."

Ito would have nothing to do with these receptions. He did not however try to dissuade Inoue from his mistaken policy. He knew that Inoue would not listen to him, and so, to avoid disputes, he let him go his own way.

CLVII.—GOVERNOR HENNESSY AND TINNED MEATS.

The Colonization Bureau had just begun canning foods, when the Governor made his trip to Hokkaido. Of course the Governor's party were asked to try some of the meats thus prepared, and the eloquent Irishman was imprudent enough to praise them highly. After that, Hokkaido tinned meats, fish, lobster, chickens, etc., were set before them at every meal. At last the Governor of Hongkong rebelled. He said that there was plenty of fresh game and fresh fish to be got in the Hokkaido; why should he and his party be expected to ruin their digestions by this continuous diet of canned provisions?

It fell to my lot as interpreter to convey to the officials Governor Hennessy's remonstrances. But they would not believe what I told them. They said that His Excellency had been so loud in his praises that they were sure his words were true! And so it was not until he left Hakodate that the poor Governor was released from the tyranny of tinned meats. Well-meaning but ignorant hospitality may at times be very trying to the person entertained.

THE WEALTH OF JAPAN.

(FROM THE "KEIZAI ZASSHI.")

I.

BY MR. H. TAKAHASHI.

In the sequel of her acquisition of the right of suzerainty over Chosen, Japan's wealth, as well as her territory and population, has increased in a marked degree, its sum total reaching well nigh over £30,000,000,000. This must of course be worth congratulation. Yet in comparison with the European Powers, still far behind them she lags, standing but seventh among those world's nations, with Italy ahead of her. To observe further, the wealth of Japan, measured on a per capital basis, is no more than one-sixth of that of Great Britain, one-fifth of France and America, one quarter of Germany, and even less than one-half of Italy, only following close upon the heels of Russia. For all that, the very nature of Japan's national character thoroughly consistent with, plus the fortunate national position of her territory boundlessly advantageous for, the future enlargement of her general wealth, naturally inspire confidence that it will by no means be a matter of much difficulty for Japan some day to outstrip Italy and Russia and even leave behind her such countries as France and Germany, provided she unites in renewed efforts in future for the exploitation of resources in her broad march toward expansion. To wit, after the recent two great expeditions, she has had her wealth increased to the amount of something like yen 5,000,000,000, which detailed would stand as below:—

	Yen.
Wealth of Japan (Formosa and Chosen excluded)	27,665,761,655
Wealth of Formosa (Ceded to Japan after 1895-96 war)	2,496,510,781
Wealth of Chosen (Annexed after 1904-05 war)	2,525,372,081
Besides the above, ought to be counted in:
Wealth of Bays and Harbours, Rivers, Books and Libraries in Japan Proper and Formosa	(under inves.)
Wealth of Saghalien	do.
Wealth of South Manchuria Railway, its accessory Building, etc.	do.
General wealth increased since the last investigation (1906)	do.

[N. B.—The figures for the wealth of Japan proper and Formosa are those obtained according to my investigation actually made in 1903-06, and those for Chosen, in 1907. Even since then, however, they must have risen in a great measure, details of which are now under investigation. It should therefore be noted that figures below given are according to an old investigation.]

All the above items put together, the grand total aggregates nearly over yen 3,000,000,000, thereby enabling Japan to stand almost side by side with Italy. Thus it is that Japan got her wealth increased by yen 2,496,510,781 in consequence of her conquest of China in 1894-95, and by yen 2,525,372,081 as the result of her annexation of Chosen which was facilitated by her victory over Russia in 1904-05,—that is to say, she has added, through the ordeals of the two great wars in the past fifteen years, from 1894 to 1910, as part of her permanent wealth, some yen 5,021,882,862, which is the combined wealth of Formosa and Chosen. This is as much as to say that Japan because of the territorial expansion consequent upon her glorious victories in the past fifteen years, has had her wealth increased on the average

* One of these soldiers is said to have used the following threat to a Japanese coolie whom he found using a horse-blanket for his own repose: "O my! if I can catch you a-sleeping in my ma's kelto, I'll jolly soon teach you wakarimasu!"

In this connection, will prove of much interest the following tables bearing on "Items of Korean Wealth" "Comparison of wealth-items of both Japan and Chosen," and "wealth, both total and per capita, of the six greatest Powers".—

THE WARWICK MAJOR'S COMEDY CO.

The first night that it did not rain during the entertainments given by the Warwick Major's Comedy Company was taken advantage of by a large portion of the Yokohama public to witness Henry Arthur Jones' play "The Case of Rebellious Susan," a sparkling and witty comedy, in which almost the whole of the Warwick Mayor's Company took part.

As usual with the members of this Company, they spared no effort to give a correct rendering of their parts, with the result that the piece went with a great swing, and was evidently much relished by the audience.

The assistance of the members of the Yokohama Amateurs who kindly supported the Warwick Major's Comedy Co. in the students' scenes and choruses, which are so pronounced a feature of "Old Heidelberg" resulted in a most interesting performance.

After having masqueraded in Society plays for awhile, this Company returned on Saturday night to its native heath with "Charley's Aunt," and, needless to say, with immense success. In broad farce and burlesque its members are in their proper element, and Brandon Thomas' world-known production gave unlimited scope for the display of the high spirits and affinity with broad humour which characterises the members of the Warwick Major Comedy Company. Mr. Kenneth Brampton, who so far has had little opportunity to distinguish himself in any of the plays presented, has on this occasion shown what he can do if the proper test is afforded him. As the clown of the piece he made a capital bogus "Aunt from Brazil" (where the nuts come from), and convulsed the audience on more than one occasion. Mr. Robert Stephenson, perhaps the best of the male characters of the company, did not have on this occasion such a thankful part as in "Are you a Mason," or "Jane," but could not disguise his great talents for representing preposterous and ludicrous situations. Mr. Reginald Rivington has generally most difficult parts to play, as on this occasion, when he was to act Sir Francis Chesney (late of the Indian Service), but he acquitted himself well. Mr. Jess Sweet as Brasset the College scout was excellent, and more convincing than on former occasions. Mr. Geo. Story also acted with great spirit, although his part was not as congenial as Tipson the manservant in "Jane," or Frank Perry, the bogus Mason in "Are you a Mason." Mr. Ronald Garland had in his rôle as the College freshman excellent scope for his abilities and made the most of them.

The ladies of the cast played a very subordinate part to that of the gentlemen, but they were all animated with the same desire to please their audience, which is such a distinguishing feature of this Company. The piece was greatly enjoyed by the bumper house which greeted them on their appearance, and shortly after eleven the following musical programme was rendered amidst the greatest enthusiasm, and repeated demands for encores:—

THE wreck of the schooner James Rolph, on Aug. 2nd, on Point San Pedro, has brought out one of the most remarkable marine coincidences on record. According to Capt. T. P. H. Whitelaw, who has been engaged in stripping the Rolph of her tackle and apparel, the vessel lies directly above and across the bones of the British ship Drumburton, which went ashore in the same place six years ago. The Drumburton sailed from San Francisco on September 3rd, 1904, and at 6.30 in the evening of the same day drifted down on Point San Pedro during a dense fog, and after a few ineffectual attempts were made to haul her off, was abandoned and left to her fate. It has been discovered during the attempts to haul the Rolph off the rocks that she had drifted over the Drumburton in such a manner that the iron ribs of the old vessel had taken a firm grip upon the wooden sides of the schooner as if in resolve to have company in the watery grave. No further attempt will be made to save the Rolph, and the bones of the two vessels will lie in such a position as to form an almost perfect cross.

THE LAW COURTS.

BETTING ON RACES.

The first hearing of a case of betting on horse-races was held on the 14th instant in the Yokohama Local Court, the presiding judge being Mr. Azuma, and the public procurator, Mr. Hattori.

The accused, 27 in number, are:—Uyekuri Shigeru, formerly member of the Chugai Shogyo Shimpō; Onodera Jutaro sericulturist; Yamaoka Takezo, marine products trader; Ito Risaburo barrister-at-law; Onuki Kaname, manager of the Yokohama office of the Chiyoda Life Insurance Company; Wakao Ryutaro, official in charge of the Wakao share and stock broking agency; Fujimura Yozo, employee of the Yokohama Fish Oil Company; Abe Jurobei, trader; Kobayashi Masuharu, employee of the Kimura Raw Silk Store; Kawai Kakutaro, employee of the Asahiya Forwarding agency; Suzuki Uekichi, geisha attendant; Ito Sansei, marine products trader; Ninomiya Wakasaburo, member of the Yokohama Trading Warehouse Company; Komatsu Kichihiro, employee of the Ito Marine Products Store; Takasawa Kisaburo, trader; Ozawa Joji, stockbroker (an American naturalized as a Japanese); A. M. Watt, British subject and employee of Ozawa stockbroking agency; Ono Einosuke, trader; Obata Kanehiro, oculist; Miyasugi Aizo, fireworks manufacturer; Nishimura Kisaburo, exporter of silk goods; Takahashi Tokunosuke, employee of the Yokohama Trading Warehouse Company; Nishimura Ryonosuke, employee of a foreign firm; Ozawa Tosaku broker and employee of the Sawa Shoten; Hiwatari Moriyoshi; Kakehi Tsunesaku and Sato Soshiro, sericulturists. (Sato Soshiro is now in Canada.)

The Attorneys who appeared in court were:—Messrs. Goto, Koide, Hanai, Ishibashi, Kubota, Akao, Y. Inouye, Tanizawa, K. Inouye, Murobuse, Anzai, Ohashi, Yamada, Sawada, Muramatsu, and Sekishima.

At 10 a.m. the hearing was opened, accused being called, one by one, before Judge Azuma who asked them various questions in connection with their offence, comparing their statements with the protocol of the preliminary examination. Some of the accused denied what they had stated before in the preliminary court, while most of them said that they had committed betting on horse-races while they do not remember the particulars. Nearly all the accused disavowed the handling of money, even though the initials of, or symbols for, their names had been put down on the betting lists.

Messrs. Ohashi, Inouye, Tanizawa, Yamada, and Ishibashi (counsels of Onuki, Ito Sansei, Kakehi, Uyekuri, Onodera, and Obata) declared that the statements which had been made by the Isezaki-cho police were quite wrong and asked the court to summon certain witnesses for the defense, but their request was rejected. Mr. Hanai (Onuki's counsel) argued that statements made by policemen should not be taken as evidence. Public Procurator Hattori, however, contended that these statements cannot be taken as absolutely worthless. He added that all the accused have been guilty of the crime for years, and asked the judge to sentence them to the following punishments:—

Uyekuri (Book-maker) ...	1½ years' imprisonment
Onodera	8 month "
Yamaoka, Onuki, Wakao, Ito Sansei, Minamiya, Obata, Miyasugi, and Kakehi	6 " "
Ito Risaburo, Kobayashi, Kawai, Komatsu, Suzuki, Abe, and Fujimura	4 " "
Takahashi, K. Nishimura, and Sato	Over 500 yen fine.
T. Ozawa, J. Ozawa, and A. M. Watt	300 " "
R. Nishimura, Ono, Takasugi, and Takasawa	200 " "

The hearing is still continuing as we go to press.

The hearing of the case of betting on horse-racas, was resumed on the 19th instant in the Yokohama Local Court.

Attorneys Hanai, Isobe, Akao and several others pled for their respective clients, stating that the accused in the present case cannot be described as habitual gamblers, on the ground that whether or not a man is in the habit of gambling cannot be judged by the number of his bets, but by his usual behaviour. In order to prove the undesirability of punishing the offenders severely, a judicial precedent in the Supreme Court and many other facts were referred to by Mr. Seki, counsel for Wakao, who complained of the unjustness of the Public Procurator's application of the law, seemed to have greatly moved the persons present in the court. He argued that horse-race betting is not a crime and added that although it may be considered by some people that traffic in pari-mutual tickets, is an offence according to the revised criminal law, betting on horse-races, if done for the sake of pleasure, cannot be called an offence. The application of the law, he said, made by the Public Procurator, was absurdly severe, and it is desirable to judge the case without any bias on one side or the other. Mr. Kubota, who represented the accused Takasawa and Kawai, also pled the inoffensiveness of betting of this sort and the impropriety of inflicting punishment, even though it is found to be an offence according to the code. Simultaneously he asked the court to postpone the execution of sentence in the event of the accused being found guilty. Further hearing will take place to-day from 9 a.m.

The hearing of the case of betting on horse-races was continued on the 20th instant in the Yokohama Local Court.

On this day Mr. Koide, counsel for R. Ito, Kobayashi, Takahashi, and Onuki, stated that the Public Procurator's opinion as to the severe punishment of the accused may have been adopted at the time when the sale of pari-mutuel tickets was permitted, and that he hoped to punish the present accused with a moderate fine.

Next Mr. Isobe, who represented Ozawa Joji and A. M. Watt, asked the court to give the verdict of "not guilty," on the ground that his clients merely told the book-maker Uyekuri that that they would bet on horse-races, while nothing substantial was staked. Especially as to Watt, who is a foreigner, the counsel urged that the accused Watt did not think it an offence to bet on horse-races on friendly terms with Uyekuri. Betting on horse-races, said Mr. Isobe, is an offence which is punished in one place or at one time, while it is not considered an offence in other places or at other times.

Subsequently Messrs. Ishibashi, Murobure, Anzai, and Inoue, pleaded for their respective clients, advancing arguments which were practically similar to the above. These attorneys in the main advocated the innocence of the accused and asked the court to punish them with slight fines, if it could not wholly acquit them.

LOCAL NEWS.

Baron Matsudaira Masanao, Viscount Miura Goro, and Baron Funakoshi Mamoru, were newly appointed members of the Privy Council on the 14th instant.

The Asama and Kasagi of the Training Squadron, with 146 cadets under the command of Rear-Admiral Vashiro, left Yokosuka on the 16th instant on a voyage to America.

A gusst who since the 14th instant has been staying at a Japanese hotel in Nihonbashi-ku, Tokyo, was attacked on Monday morning by cholera, and succumbed to the disease the next day.

According to the report of the Meteorological station of this prefecture, the atmospheric depression which came upon these islands from the east of Ryukyu, began to proceed on Monday morning towards the Bonin and Hachijo Islands. Consequently the weather in Yokohama became fine yesterday, after a period of eleven rainy days. The rainfall on the 12th instant measured 70 mm.

The U.S. Ambassador and Mr. O'Brien left for home on Tuesday by the steamer Empress of Japan on leave of absence. They are expected to return to Japan by the middle of December next.

His Highness Prince Higashi-Fushimi will honour the Nippon Race Club Meeting with his presence on the second day of the forthcoming autumn races, when the Emperor's Cup will be presented by Chamberlain Nishi.

A regular meeting of the Privy Council was held on Wednesday, when the Bill for the revision of the election law of the members of the House of Representatives, and that for the revision of the High School regulations was approved.

It is reported that some members of the Tokyo City Assembly are canvassing for municipal ownership of the electric tramway in the city. The Government, however, being not inclined to give consent to the proposal, the question is now at a deadlock.

Monday being the Kanname sai (harvest festival), a shinto ceremony was held in the Imperial Palace. The representatives of Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress, the Prince and Princess Imperial, and other Princes and Princesses of the Blood attended the function.

The first meeting of the Cabinet conference on the next fiscal year's Budget will be held on Friday. Marquis Katsura, the Premier, and all other Ministers, including Viscount Terauchi who has just returned from Chosen, will be present, the only absentee being perhaps Count Komura, Minister for Foreign Affairs, who is now confined to his official residence on account of ill health.

On the night of the 15th inst. Mr. Kamei, Superintendent-General of the Metropolitan Police Board, accompanied by an officer, made a round of inspection through various parts of the city of Tokyo, in order to personally observe how the police authorities were posting cordons with a view to preventing the continuance of murderous and other criminal offences. The Superintendent-General was challenged thirty-nine times during four hours from one till five a.m.

Prince Tsai Hsun, Chinese Naval Envoy, will arrive at Yokohama on the 23rd inst. by the steamer Chiyo Maru. Guards of honour to be detailed in connection with his forthcoming visit to Tokyo, will consist of half a company of cavalry, with colours. About one-half of the garrison in Tokyo will line up between Shimbashi and the Shiba Detached Palace, where the Prince puts up, and a salute of 21 guns will be fired in Hibiya Park on the occasions of his arrival and departure. The Generals in Tokyo will meet him at Shimbashi Station and repair to the Detached Palace to present greetings. A company of infantry with colours will be attached to that Palace during his stay.

On Tuesday evening Mayor Arakawa gave a dinner at the Yokohama Specie Bank Club, entertaining the members of the Consular Body in this city. When the feast was at its height, the Mayor made a brief address in English, stating that he is no stranger to Yokohama, having been an official of Kanagawa Kencho at an earlier period of his life, and expressed his hope of continuing those friendly relations with the foreign Consuls which had always been maintained by his predecessor. In reply to the Mayor's address, Herr F. von Syburg, the German Consul-General, stated on behalf of the Consular Body that it was regarded by them as an honour to have Mr. Arakawa as the Mayor. Baron Sufu, Governor of this prefecture, and several members of the Yokohama City Council, were also present.

ACCIDENT TO THE STEAMER "ARMENIA."

We are in receipt of the following telegram through the courtesy of Messrs. Illies & Co., "The steamer Armenia is now being towed towards Shanghai Harbour by the Monteagle, with broken shaft; due Woosung to-night (Saturday). We will telegraph full particulars after steamer's arrival. Inform the consignees."

Messrs. Illies & Co., inform us that the Armenia was en route from Shanghai to Muji, Kobe and Yokohama. It will therefore be seen that her arrival at this port will of necessity be considerably delayed.

We yesterday published a paragraph relating to the accident to the S.S. Armenia. The agents are now in receipt of a further telegram to the effect that repairs will require about two weeks.

Prince Tsai Hsun is expected to arrive at Yokohama on board the Chiyo Maru from San Francisco on the 23rd instant, a day earlier than previously arranged. The Municipality will present a pair of cloisonne flower-roses to the Prince.

CORRESPONDENCE.

TRAVEL ON THE TRANS-SIBERIAN RAILWAY.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

[We have received for publication the following letter regarding travel on the Trans-Siberian Railway, together with a reply from the General Agents of the Company, to whom the communication was first submitted.]

A YOKOHAMA RESIDENT'S COMPLAINT.

Sir,—I am here trying to get rid of an attack of bronchitis which I caught on board the International Express train en route to here.

We left Yokohama towards the end of August, and arrived on the 11th September in Vienna, 6 hours late on account of a suspected case of cholera amongst one of the lady passengers on board our train.

The table on our train was generally good, but the same could not be said of the cleanliness in the 1st and 2nd class lavatories, (and if this is the case on board the International, what must it be on board the Russian State trains?)

But my principal reason for writing is, that in the interest of the travelling public, the following should be brought to the notice of the railway authorities concerned.

From Irkutsk, or rather a little before there, we had a temperature of 40 degrees, Fahr (5 Cels.) and suffered bitterly from the cold. When we complained about this lack of heating, we were told that according to the regulations the time for doing so had not arrived yet, and that even if they wanted to they could not do so owing to the necessary reparations to the central heating apparatus.

Now I should like to ask, if the regulations are there for the convenience of the passengers, or if the passengers are there for the convenience of the regulations? The Railway Co. surely ought to regulate the heating of the carriages according to the temperature, and not to a hard and fast rule of the calendar opening of a certain season, and it is surely not to be wondered at, that under such conditions, all the passengers caught cold.

Yours, etc.,

X.

P.S.—I just heard that one of the lady passengers on board our train, had to remain behind in Berlin as she could not continue her journey on account of an inflammation of the lungs resulting from the severe cold on board the train.

THE AGENT'S REPLY.

SIR—In glancing over the article you have so kindly sent me, I note that the "well-known resident of Yokohama" speaks first of the lack of cleanliness in the 1st and 2nd Class Lavatories of the "International" Train. This may or may not be true, but always taking into account the fact that this Train is in almost continual motion on a journey of 9½ days each way, between Vladivostok and Moscow, and in spite of our best efforts, it may possibly happen that the Lavatories should not always be just as it is the wish of our Company to keep them.

As regards passengers "suffering bitterly from the cold," and being told that the cars could not be heated because "according to the regulations the time for doing so had not yet arrived," this passenger was travelling through Russia in the latter part of August which is absolutely the hottest season of the year on the Trans-Siberian, as on most other Railways; and during July, August & September, our Company and the Railway Authorities are using every possible effort to keep the the Cars cool, not warm; and it is most extraordinary and unusual that any such "severe cold" should have been experienced in August. If however, such was the case, it must have been most sudden and unexpected, and it would be only natural that the local Train staff would be unprepared to fit up the heating apparatus, and supply heat to the Cars during the hottest month of the Summer. If a similar sudden and unexpected "cold snap" happened on any Railway in America, Europe, or Japan, is it likely that they would be prepared to supply heat during the month of August, any better and whilst the Train was en route on a long overland journey, and without having been able to prepare for such a unusual and temporary contingency?

Of the many other residents of Yokohama who have travelled by the Siberian Railway in August, I feel sure that they would be as equally surprised as myself, at hearing of any such "bitter cold" having been experienced during the month of August, and common sense, I think, would make plain the difficulty of supplying heat to the Trains at that particular season.

It is very strange that no advices of this unusual cold weather should have been received, either officially or from any other passengers, although several passengers who came out to Yokohama by the Siberian Line during August and September last, referred only to the warmth of the weather en route.

Yours truly,
H. B. DARNELL,
General Agent for the Far East.
October 18th, 1910.

Marshall's play is almost always brilliant even when he loses. In this game he risked too much to shut in his opponent's Queen; at the same time, that the resulting position should prove so favourable to White was perhaps due more to the chances of the game than to good management.

Mr. A. C. White has an article in the British Chess Magazine for July on "Board Games in Japanese Legends." It is not free from mistakes, but is interesting and original.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

THE REVOLUTION.

REFUGEE ROYALTIES.

London, October 13.

Queen Amelia has telegraphed to the Duke of Orleans that King Manuel and she will embark for England and accept the Duke's hospitality at Wood Norton.

THE RELIGIOUS ORDERS.

The Spanish and Italian Governments are taking steps to prevent the members of the religious orders expelled from Portugal taking up their residence in Spain or Italy.

FINANCE AND THE COLONIES.

The Portuguese Minister of Finance, interviewed by Reuter, said the Government would strive to reduce and wipe out the Budget deficit through more equitable taxation, and would grant financial autonomy to the colonies except Angola. Under the head of colonies alone about a third of the deficit would be met without injuring the colonies.

THE FRENCH RAILWAY STRIKE.

The strike movement in France is assuming the aspect of a civil war.

M. Briand, Premier and Minister of the Interior, declared last evening that it was not a strike but a criminal enterprise.

Warrants for the arrest of the ring-leaders have been issued. Troops are pouring in to Paris. The Orleans Railway has joined the strike, and the Metropolitan Underground has voted a general strike.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE IN FRANCE.

London, October 14

Paris.—Five strike leaders have been arrested quietly, despite their assertions that they would never surrender. The Bordeaux railway has joined the strike; thus every part of the Country is involved. Nevertheless the situation is improved by the Government working the line. Communication between London and Paris is reopened. The electricians struck this evening and the boulevards are in darkness.

Later.

Paris.—There were more arrested yesterday. The automobiles reaped a rich harvest transporting passengers to the coast. Three English ladies paid £80 for a motor from Dieppe to Marseilles.

Later.

Paris.—The situation generally as regards the railways has improved. M. Briand has received communications, from both the strikers' committee and directors of the companies, saying that they are desirous of negotiating, with him as intermediary.

PORTUGAL'S AMBASSADOR RESIGNS.

The Ambassador of Portugal announces his resignation.

THE REVOLUTION.

London, October 15.

It is reported from Lisbon that the various belongings of King Manuel have been handed over to the representative of the British Minister.

The next elections in Portugal will be carried out on the basis of universal suffrage.

THE EXPELLED RELIGIOUS ORDERS.

Speaking in the Chamber at Madrid, the Premier, Senor Canalejas, said that the Portuguese monks and nuns would not be permitted to stay in Spain, which had already a sufficiency of her own.

THE STRIKE IN FRANCE.

INCITEMENT FROM ANARCHISTS.

The back of the French railway strike has been broken, and the lines are working practically in their normal condition.

The discovery of bombs in Paris reported to be inciting the strikers. The police are armed with revolvers in anticipation of disorder.

Later.

Paris.—To all intents and purposes the strike is ended. The usual traffic is expected from to-day. Normal lighting and other conditions have been resumed.

NEW SOUTH WALES ELECTIONS.

AN EVEN RESULT.

Sydney.—The result of the New South Wales elections is as follows:—Labour 46, Liberals 44, with three second ballots. Sir James Graham has been defeated.

THE PANAMA CANAL.

THE QUESTION OF ITS FORTIFICATION.

President Taft leaves Washington on the 10th proximo for a four days' visit to Panama, where he will study the question of the fortification of the Canal and the permanent government of the Canal Zone.

THE GERMAN PRINCE'S TOUR.

London, October 16.

There has been some speculation in Germany as to who will pay the expenses of the Crown Prince's tour and journey to the East. The Koelnische Zeitung announces semi-officially that the Crown will bear the main part, though possibly certain expenses arising out of his position as Crown Prince will devolve upon the Empire.

FORMATION OF NEW CABINET IN GREECE.

London, October 17.

Athens.—The King has entrusted M. Venzelos with the formation of a new Cabinet.

LORD KITCHENER.

Mr. Asquith, with the approval of the King, has requested Lord Kitchener to join the Council of Imperial Defence.

DECREES OF PORTUGUESE REPUBLIC.

Lisbon.—Decrees will be published tomorrow abolishing the Chamber of Peers Council, state titles of nobility, banishing the dynasty, and secularizing charitable institutions.

PARIS LOAN.

London, October 17.

In spite of labour troubles, the issue of 9,400,000 pounds sterling, the first portion of the Paris loan of thirty-seven million pounds, has been covered thirty times over.

TRANS-ATLANTIC AERIAL FLIGHT STARTED.

Walter Wellman has started in the huge dirigible balloon America from Atlantic city for Europe.

Later.

The Wellman dirigible America is equipped with a small wireless installation of 100-miles radius whereby a succession of messages have been received up to 12.45 p.m., indicating that the balloon is going on splendidly.

GREAT BRITAIN'S WARNING TO PERSIA.

Teheran.—In view of the injuries to trade, Great Britain has addressed a strong note to the Persian Government warning it of the serious consequences that must ensue if the restoration of order in the South unduly delayed.

PERSIA.

PARTITION AHEAD.

London, October 18.

The Times correspondent at Teheran, referring to the British Note of yesterday, says that the steps to be taken would mark the end of the policy of non-intervention. Probably Russia would follow suit in the north. The only alternative to a loan, therefore, is virtual partition. Britain naturally prefers the former policy, but desires to handle the situation in the closest possible harmony with Russia.

Later.

Reuter telegraphs from Teheran that British Note has been presented to Persia the sense that unless order is restored in the south within three months, Great Britain will be obliged to take certain measures consisting of the organization of local force commanded by Anglo-Indian officers. The cost of the upkeep will be defrayed by a three per cent. surcharge on the customs on the Gulf. If this is insufficient, a portion of the Fars customs will be added. It is presumed that in the event of its proving impossible to obtain local recruits, Britain will introduce Indian troops.

[The province of Fars, or Farsistan, of which Shiraz is the capital, lies to the north of the Persian Gulf.—Ed. J.M.]

WELLMAN.

New York.—Nothing has been heard of Wellman for 30 hours. It is feared that he has been driven out of his course by adverse winds.

PORTUGAL.

Lisbon.—Five arrests have been made in connection with the death, during the fighting, of Admiral Reis, the revolutionary leader, who is now believed to have been assassinated.

THE EXILED ROYALTIES.

Their Britannic Majesties have arranged to visit King Manuel and Queen Amelia at Wood Norton on Saturday.

CYCLONE IN CUBA.

Havana.—A cyclone has inflicted enormous damage yesterday and to-day. Communication with the interior has been cut off.

GREAT BRITAIN AND PERSIA.

London, October 19.

Reuter learns that a British note was presented to Persia after consultation with Russia. The two Governments acting in accord there can be no question of partition, so far as compatible with the safety of foreigners and the maintenance of order.

THE VOYAGE OF THE AIRSHIP "AMERICA."

New York.—The Captain of the Royal Mail steamer Trent has sent a wireless message to the effect that he picked up Wellman and crew of five this morning. The airship was abandoned. The rescue was made at latitude 35/43, longitude 68/18.

Later.

Trent sighted the airship in distress and signalled by morse code to know if required assistance. After three hours manœuvring the entire party with a net were hauled on board. All are well.

FIRST OFFICIAL RECOGNITION OF REPUBLIC OF PORTUGAL.

London, October 19.

Lisbon.—The Cardinal-Patriarch of Lisbon has formally signified his admission of the Republican Government.

THE BRITISH CRUISER
NEWCASTLE.

London, October 19.

Malta.—The cruiser Newcastle, which sailed for China on the 15th, has returned to Malta on account of internal defects requiring eight days to remedy.

THE WELLMAN RESCUE.

The aviator Wellman was rescued 350 miles off Cape Hatteras. The airship had covered 50 miles in 69 hours, this being a record in distance and time. The rescue was very lucky, the airship being in an unfrequented part of the ocean, while the Trent happened at the time to be inaugurating a new service between New York and Cuba.

Later.

Wellman has landed at New York, a hundred ships saluting him.

CHINA APPEAL COMMITTEE.

London, October 20.

A meeting of the China Emergency Appeal Committee at the Mansion House has announced that out of £100,000 which it was hoped would be raised, £40,000 would be devoted to establishment of union medical colleges £40,000 to educational institutions for the training of scholars and £20,000 to aid literature societies and general translation work. The object was to help the existing societies and not to swallow them up.

Dr. Main of Hangchow urged the establishment of hospitals in the large centres.

THE BOILERMAKERS' DISPUTE.

A ballot of the boilermakers has rejected by 10,089 to 8,760 the terms of the proposed settlement.

THE CYCLONE AT HAVANA.

Later.

Owing to the destruction of seed-beds it is estimated that the tobacco-crop will not exceed 10 per cent. of the normal. Sugar also has been severely damaged.

THE GERMAN PRINCE'S TOUR.

An American Cabinet Minister, by name Dickinson, while at Berlin last week, suggested that the Crown Prince should visit the Philippines. The Kaiser was pleased with the suggestion, which is being considered.

LIEUT. SUTOR.

Lieut. Sutor has resigned.

(By SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

ASIATICS NEEDED IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

London, October 14.

Toronto.—The British Columbian government has rejected the petition of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway for permission to import Asiatic labour for mountain sections. The company states that without Asiatics it cannot continue construction in British Columbia beyond the completion of the present contract.

STRIKES IN FRANCE.

Paris.—The arrest of five of the ring-leaders of the strike movement surprised the Socialist and Anarchist agitators, who imagined the authorities would not dare to invade the offices of the Socialist newspapers. Public opinion supports the Premier's view as to the dangerous and disgraceful character of the strike, and the hope is generally expressed that the Government will deal severely with the agitators. A decree mobilizing 120,000 men for the Southern and Eastern railways has been issued. The strike committee declares it is illegal as the men are entitled to a fortnight's grace. The Premier has given assurance that the food supply of Paris is adequately secured. There are signs that the force of the strike movement will soon be spent.

THE FRENCH STRIKE.

London, October 16.

Paris.—The strike leaders continue to issue misleading manifestoes, but they will soon probably recognize that the resumption of negotiations is their only chance of escaping from an untenable position.

TURKEY.

Constantinople.—The press has reopened an anti Greek campaign.

RAILWAY STRIKE IN FRANCE.

London, October 17.

Paris.—Owing to the energy of the Government, the strike is nearing an end, the railways being under martial law. The violence of the Socialist leaders has recoiled on their own heads. Passenger traffic is practically normal on the northern line.

CRISIS IN THE BALKANS.

Constantinople.—It is generally believed that if Mr. Venezelos accepts the Premiership Turkey will break off diplomatic relations.

PARIS MUNICIPAL LOAN.

The first quarter of the new Paris Municipal Loan of thirty-seven million pounds for embellishing and improving the city has been subscribed thirty times over.

DEMONSTRATION IN SPAIN.

London, October 17.

Madrid.—The Republican-Socialist Alliance held a large demonstration in sympathy with the Republic of Portugal. It was very orderly. Thousands of Catholics journeyed to a neighbouring shrine and prayed long hours for Church and State.

PERSIA.

A GERMAN COMMENT.

London, October 18.

Berlin.—Commenting on the British Note to Persia demanding immediate restoration of security on the trade-routes, the Kreuz Zeitung says that Britain having unsuccessfully attempted to induce Russia to withdraw from Persia, the two Powers are now settling about the partition of that country.

RAILWAY STRIKE IN FRANCE.

Paris.—Outrages are more frequent as the failure of the railway strike becomes more assured. Wanton damage to railway property is reported from nearly all parts of the country. The police are actively arresting all suspects.

THE TRANS-ATLANTIC AIRSHIP.

New York.—It is believed that the Wellman airship, attempting to cross the Atlantic, is off its course, as steamers have failed to sight it.

GREAT BRITAIN AND PERSIA.

The Times declares that while it has become imperatively necessary to secure the protection of British trade in Persia, the British Government has no intention to acquire territory and sincerely trusts Persia herself will end the Anarchy in the southern provinces.

WELLMAN'S ATTEMPT A FAILURE.

London, October 19.

Wellman's attempted trans-Atlantic balloon voyage is a complete failure. A British steamer has found the airship disabled, 250 miles northwest of Bermuda.

The crew were rescued and the balloon abandoned. It had travelled 850 miles.

THE FRENCH RAILWAYS.

Paris.—The strike is over and the men are hastening to return to work. The result will be to unite the whole bourgeoisie in support of the Government.

GREAT BRITAIN'S NOTE TO PERSIA.

Teheran.—The British note declares if Persia fails to restore security of traffic routes, Great Britain will take over the Bushire-Shiraz route to Ispahan, as it is impossible to confine the action to the British sphere as it does not include the disturbed area. The Indian Government therefore would undertake to maintain order over the whole of the neutral zone to Ispahan in the Russian zone. The note adds that the area of action may be widened if necessary.

PERSIA.

London, October 20.

The Foreign Office states that the Government of North-West India is under no responsibility to restore order on Persian caravan routes and desires no encroachment on the integrity of Persia.

The St. Petersburg Government heartily concurs with the British in the necessity of securing the safety of the Persian routes.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Japanese and Russian securities are lower.

(RECEIVED AT THE FOREIGN OFFICE.)

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION AT HONGKONG.

From the Japanese Consul at Hongkong.

In consequence of the failure of the Yuanfeng-jun the money market here has become very tight for the Chinese merchants. With the exception, however, of the local branch of the Yuanfeng-jun there has been no failure here, but there is much uneasiness as to the final outcome.

DEATH OF ADMIRAL BARON SAMEJIMA.

Admiral Baron Samejima, who had been ailing for some time from kidney trouble, expired at 1 a.m. on the 13th inst. He was raised to the First Grade of the Second Rank before his death.

THE PANIC IN CHINA.

Hongkong, October 19.

An extraordinary panic resulted at this place and in Canton on account of the failure of the Yuanfeng-jun Bank in Shanghai. But as the Authorities did everything in their power to devise means of relief, the financial conditions have been now more or less restored to normal.

THE STRIKE IN FRANCE.

Japanese Consulate,

Lyons, October 19.

The strike on the railways in the north of France threatened to extend to the whole country, but owing to the thorough care taken by the Authorities, things have quieted down, and from the 18th instant all have returned to their work. The affair was not without its effects upon trade in general, but it is not expected to have any influence on the commerce in silk.

(SPECIAL TELEGRAM TO THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

INTERPORT CRICKET AT KOBE.

Kobe, October 17.

Kobe made 242 first inning; Yokohama's fielding was excellent but bowling power was obviously inadequate.

Galloway for Kobe gave a fine display of free well judged batting. Kobe's innings finished at 3.23; Yokohama made a poor display, possibly to some extent accounted for by poor light when wickets were drawn. Thanks to three splendid catches by Kobe—Nicoll's catch in the slips was an absolute marvel—Yokohama had only compiled 33 for 8 wickets.

Kobe, October 18.

Yokohama's innings closed at 10.55 a.m. for a total of 43, being 197 in arrears.

Later.

Kobe won the Interport Cricket match by an innings and 87 runs, Yokohama, in their second innings, scoring 110.

("DEUTSCHE JAPAN-POST" SERVICE TO THE "JAPAN HERA D.")

GERMANY.

Berlin, October 13.

An article in the Berlin Post, the gist of which had been telegraphed by Reuter, says that the Republic of Portugal would probably not have the moral ability to administer and maintain the Colonies. It is proposed, for this reason, to effect an understanding between Great Britain and Germany as to the partition of the Portuguese Colonies amongst themselves. The above article is only the suggestion of a well-known writer of the Alldeutsche (Pan-German) Association and has not been taken seriously anywhere. No other journals reiterate the phantastic ideas of this writer.

The Chancellor von Bethmann Hollweg has also been created Hon. Doctor by the philosophic faculty of the Berlin University.

Rumours, according to which Herr von Lindequist, the new Secretary of State for the Colonies, is said to be already willing to resign, are officially contradicted.

A Parseval airship has carried out a successful flight from Muenchen to Berlin with only two stoppings on the way.

FRANCE.

The strike of railway officials in France is steadily spreading and all communications are interrupted. The Government has summoned representatives of the strikers to Paris, but the latter declined to respond to the invitation.

EGYPT.

The former Turkish Grand Vizier Kiamil Pasha will pass the winter in Egypt.

RUSSIA.

The new Russian Budget shows a nearly equal balance of receipts and expenses.

PORTUGAL.

King Manuel and the Queen Dowager of Portugal will shortly remove from Gibraltar to England.

COUNT AEHRENTAL ON NEAR EASTERN QUESTIONS.

Berlin, October 14.

Count Aehrenthal, speaking at the opening of the session of the Hungarian Delegation, gave a retrospect on the Orient crisis. He said that political difficulties most easily arise from confused political conditions, as the Russo-Japanese War was principally caused by the differences of opinion as to the right of occupation of Manchuria by Russia. The Austrian Government had the most sincere feeling towards the new Turkish régime and would accept any solution of the Cretan question, by which the sovereignty of Turkey over Crete was maintained. The relations of the Empire with all other Powers could be declared to be good; the Triple Alliance was unshakeable. The grouping of other Powers for the maintenance of peace was regarded by Austria without any prejudice.

GERMANY.

The expenses of the tour of the Crown Prince to the Far East will mostly be covered by the fund at disposal of the Imperial Household.

Rudolf Lindau, the well-known diplomat and poet, who was also in service in Japan many years ago, is dead. He was born in 1829.

PORTUGAL.

The Governments of Brazil and Switzerland have already recognized the new Republic of Portugal.

THE STRIKES.

The strike movement in France is beginning to abate, although many other organisations are declaring themselves solid with the railway officials. The electric supply of Paris has ceased, trains are running on many lines, the military acting as drivers and guards.

GERMANY.

Berlin, October 15.

The centenary celebrations in memory of the foundation of the Prussian Military Academy at Berlin have been carried out in a most enthusiastic manner in the presence of the Kaiser.

Berlin, October 16.

Prince Reuss XXXI, some years ago Secretary at the German Legation at Tokyo, has been nominated Consul General to Calcutta.

ATLANTIC FLIGHT COMMENCES.

The flight across the Atlantic Ocean by Wellman in his airship has been commenced.

FINANCE MINISTER VISITS PARIS.

The Russian Minister of Finance, M. Kokowtsov, has arrived at Paris, but it is stated that his visit is not connected with any financial project.

SIBERIAN MAIL.

Siberian mails, with dates up to Sept. 29th and Oct. 1st ex Yokohama, arrived at Berlin on Oct. 15th and 16th.

THE RAILWAY STRIKE.

Berlin, October 15.

The French railway strike has further abated, but the participation of an anarchistic element has been discovered.

Railway traffic in France has been reopened from to-day on all railways.

THE WELLMAN DIRIGIBLE FLIGHT.

Berlin, October 17th.

The prospects of a successful conclusion of the flight of the Wellman dirigible across the Atlantic Ocean have become unfavourable, according to latest reports.

FIERCE FIGHT BETWEEN STRIKERS AND TROOPS.

A bloody conflict has taken place between the military and strikers at Etienne in France.

BAYARD FLIES FROM PARIS TO LONDON.

The French aeronaut Bayard has carried out a successful flight from Paris to London.

KING LEAVES FOR ENGLAND

King Manuel has left Gibraltar for England.

THE CROWN PRINCE'S TOUR.

Berlin, October 18.

A visit of the German Crown Prince to the Philippines on his tour to the Far East is being considered, but is not yet decided upon.

STRIKE AT BREMEN.

A strike of tramway officials at Bremen has broken out.

RADIUM INSTITUTE OPENED.

An Institute for investigation of Radium has been opened at Vienna.

STRIKERS GIVE WAY.

The strike of railway-men in France has resulted in many anarchistic excesses. The strike committee has decided that the men shall recommence work on all lines.

PATRIARCH ACCEPTS THE INEVITABLE.

The Patriarch of Lisbon has recognised the Republic of Portugal.

WELLMAN MISSING.

The aeronaut Wellman with his big airship "America" has not been heard of for 30 hours.

CRISIS IN THE CABINET.

A crisis has arisen in the Turkish Cabinet owing to differences of opinion as to the Military Budget. The Grand Vizier is making efforts to settle the question.

KAISER TO VISIT BRUSSELS.

Berlin, October 19.

The Kaiser and Kaiserin will go to Brussels on October 25th for a sojourn lasting three days, with the object of paying a return visit to the King and Queen of Belgium.

MILITARY AEROPLANE RACE.

Three German aviators have taken part in the military aeroplane race from Berlin to Johannthal to Doeberitz, a distance of 40 miles. All three landed safely at the fixed destination. The shortest time for the flight was 23 minutes.

BRITAIN'S NOTE TO PERSIA.

It is reported in telegrams to British journals from Teheran that Great Britain, in the case of Persia not being able to secure the safety of traffic, would arrange for the maintenance of order herself on the Buschir-Schiras route to Ispahan. The report of a presentation of an official Note from Great Britain to Persia is, however, not verified at Berlin. The rumour is also published in the German Press, comment being of a mild nature.

WELLMAN'S FAILURE.

The Atlantic Ocean flight of Wellman's balloon America has completely failed. Wellman was noticed 450 miles south of Sandy Hook giving signals of distress and his crew and boat were picked up by a passing steamer. The balloon was abandoned.

CROWN PRINCE ILL.

The Crown Prince of Servia is severely ill.

COUNT AEHRENTHAL'S POLICY.

The Hungarian Delegation has passed a vote of confidence in the foreign policy of Count Aehrenthal.

AMBASSADOR TO PETERSBURG RESIGNS.

Count Borchthold, the Austro-Hungarian Ambassador at St. Petersburg, has resigned his post, his successor being Freiherr von Biskia, until now Minister at Sofia.

THE CABINET CRISIS.

The Turkish Cabinet crisis has been settled, the question in dispute having been postponed until the opening of Parliament.

CRUEL CASE OF WEEPING ECZEMA

Suffered So Terribly She Could Neither Work nor Sleep—Her Poor Hands were Perfectly Raw—Baby had Skin Trouble, Too.

MOTHER AND CHILD CURED BY CUTICURA

"I was for eight months the victim of terrible suffering from eczema. My hands were like raw beef and I was told that my complaint was weeping eczema. I had it more or less all over my body as well as on my face and it gave me so much suffering that I could neither work nor sleep. The chemist gave me a prepared powder and told me to bathe my hands in water and dust them with the powder.

But this did me no good. It seemed rather to chap my hands more, so I went to see a doctor. He gave me some medicine and told me that I might not be rid of the disease for two years. I became fairly downhearted. The disease gradually grew worse and eventually I was unable to attend to any of my domestic duties.

"After a lapse of several months I happened to go to the house of a neighbour's sister, whose little boy had had ringworm and was cured, I was told, by Cuticura. I was recommended to try it myself and when I got home I persuaded my husband to send for a set of the Cuticura Remedies. Their use had immediate effect, my skin peeled, and new flesh formed within a week. It is glorious to be once more able to get about and attend to my domestic duties. I am quite cured and it is Cuticura alone that has cured me. I also found Cuticura a positive remedy for another form of skin trouble, known commonly as 'heat bumps', from which my infant child was then suffering. I applied the Cuticura Ointment and in the course of a few days the 'bumps' entirely disappeared. Mrs. A. Holton, The Grove, nr. Wantage, Berks., England, Aug. 30, 1909."

Cuticura is the most economical treatment known for affections of the skin and scalp. A tablet of Cuticura Soap and a box of Cuticura Ointment are often sufficient to cure. Sold throughout the world. Depots: London, 27, Charterhouse Sq.; Paris, 10, Rue de la Chaussée d'Antin; Australia, R. Towns & Co., Sydney; India, B. K. Paul, Calcutta; So. Africa, Lennon, Ltd., Cape Town, etc.; U. S. A., Potter Drug & Chem. Corp., Sole Props., Boston.

Post-free, 32-page Cuticura Book on the Skin.

A NAGANO despatch says that on the 21st inst. rumblings were heard in Mt. Asama, lasting about a minute.

MR. BRAHAM, Special correspondent of The Times, is reported to have started for Japan via Shanghai, on Tuesday morning.

MR. GEORGE N. WESTON, the new U.S. Consul at Kobe, received the ex-quatour (i.e. the official recognition of the Emperor) on the 18th instant.

THE submarine cable between Nagasaki and Tamsui, extending a distance of 672 nautical miles, being completed; communication will be opened on the 1st proximo.

PRINCE TOKUGAWA, President of the House of Peers, has returned from his tour of inspection in Europe, arriving at Tsuruga early on the 22nd instant on board the R.V.F. Simbersk.

THE newly laid electric tramway from Shibukawa to Ikao, the noted hot-springs resort in Joshu, was opened to traffic on Wednesday. The whole town of Ikaho was en fete for the occasion.

THE total amount of the subscriptions for the Japan Steel Foundry loan reached some 15,000,000 yen on Wednesday, the closing day. The premium is said to have been from ten sen to three yen.

It is reported from Seoul that the party consisting of 24 Korean peeresses who are going to visit Japan, started on their journey on the 16th inst. Some of the ladies were clad in Japanese costume.

It is reported from Nikko that very cold weather was experienced there on the night of the 20th instant. Shirane, Akanagi, and other mountains were covered with the first snow of the season.

THE lady section of the Korean tourist party arrived at Shimonoseki on Monday night, and the other section of the party comprising twenty-six noblemen, reached the same port a day later. The latter were met at the wharf by the lady tourists. The whole party is expected in Tokyo tomorrow.

THE local agents of the H. A. D. inform us that they have received a telegram from Shanghai to the effect that the repairs to the steamer Armenia will be finished at the beginning of next month. The vessel will leave Shanghai for Kobe on or about the 2nd Prox., and will be due in Yokohama about the 19th prox.

GOVERNMENT sanction has been obtained for the construction of a light railway between Hachioji and Hiratsuka, which is reported to have been planned with the assistance of foreign capitals. It is expected that various arrangements for establishing the company will be finished by the end of next month, and at the same time be set about. At the outset a capital of 3,000,000 yen will be raised, which amount is to be increased to 10,000,000 yen for the purpose of establishing a hydro-electric power-house and of extending the scheme by construction of branch lines.

It is officially reported by the Government of Formosa that on the 21st instant the commander of the expeditionary forces, summoning the chiefs of the Gaogan and Morikowan clans to Mount Baron, gave instructions to the effect that if they wished to submit, they should hand over their firearms to the Government forces, and that in the event of their not doing so, their bases of operations would be cannonaded. Thereupon the savages surrendered 170 rifles on the 22nd and 23rd, and the number is gradually increasing. But it will take several days to effect their absolute submission. The expeditionary forces are ready to open fire on their last strongholds.

MR. NAKAKOJI, Vice-Minister of Communications, who has been on a tour of inspection in Europe and America on the subject of hydro-electricity, seems to have finished his investigation. It is reported that the Vice-Minister, and suite will leave San Francisco on the 1st proximo for home, by the steamer Tenyo Maru.

ON the 16th instant a serious railway accident occurred at Hichijo Station, Kyoto. A passenger train from Akashi dashed into a goods train which had just arrived there. Several freight-cars were derailed and smashed. Nine passengers were more or less seriously injured, much damage being done to the carriages. The cause of the accident is said to have been due to the carelessness of a pointsman.

THE airship America in which Mr. Walter Wellman tried to cross the Atlantic had a carrying capacity which is surprising. It is described as follows. The America was "launched" at Atlantic City on September 24. The airship is a cigar shaped balloon 228 ft. in length and had been tested to carry ten tons for thirty days under trans-Atlantic conditions. The motors were contained in a steel car weighing 4,800lb, which also provided accommodation for six men.

THE subsidized steamers of the Toyo Kisen Kaisha are the Tenyo, Chiyo and Nippon of the North American line, and the Kil, Buyo and Hongkong of the South American service. The amount of the state subsidy included in next year's budget, as prepared, is 3,000,000 yen of which 2,500,000 yen is for the North American line and 500,000 for the South American service.

The Nippon will be replaced by the Shunyo Maru which is now being constructed and will be ready in about a year. The Nippon Maru will however continue to receive a certain amount of the subsidy.

THE grand military manoeuvres to be held for four days from November 13 in Okayama and neighbouring districts, in the presence of His Majesty the Emperor, will consist of the Eastern Army, commanded by General Viscount Nishi, with Colonel Yamanashi as Chief of Staff, and the Western Army, commanded by H.H. General Prince Fushimi, with Colonel Oba as Chief of Staff. Lieut.-Generals Ochiai and Iguchi will be Chief Umpires of the Eastern and Western Armies respectively, while Lieut.-General Baron Fukushima will be the principal Umpire. The foreign officers allowed to attend the manoeuvres are:—Captain Baron von Bernowitz, military attaché of the German Embassy; Staff-Captain Franz von Raabl, of the Austro-Hungarian Embassy; Major H. L. Hawthorn, of the U.S. Embassy; Captain Ch. Bertan, of the French Embassy; Lieut.-Colonel R. W. Boger and Lieutenant F.S.G. Pigott, of the British Embassy; Lieut.-Colonel Caviglia, of the Italian Embassy; Major-General Samoyloff and Colonel Semenoff, of the Russian Embassy; Brigadier-General Wang Yuchia, Regimental-Colonel Cha La-feng, and Battalion-Commander Chung Ling, specially dispatched by the Chinese Army; Major Don Ed. Herrera de la Rosa, of the Spanish Legation; and Captain G. C. Pobst, of the Dutch Legation.

THE NEW TARIFF.

Friday, October 21.

The rumours about the new tariff grow more and more ridiculous. The latest story is that the Japanese Representative in Berlin was instructed to propose to Germany the conclusion of a tariff of which England might enjoy the advantages under the most-favoured-nation clause. Germany refused and now nothing remains except a frank alteration of the new tariff. This can only be described as a grotesque canard. Equally absurd are stories circulated to the effect that owing to England's attitude Japan is unable to conclude tariff conventions with any other Power. The framers and ventilators of this tale seem to imagine that Japan is going about from government to government in the Occident supplicating for Customs conventions. Of course Japan is not doing anything of the sort. She has made her own tariff and obtained parliamentary approval for it. If any Power desires to obtain a modification of the rates therein fixed, such Power must approach Japan with due proposals. It is not for Japan to take the initiative. Even this elementary fact seems to be ignored. The Hochi Shimbun does Marquis Inouye the extraordinary injustice of attributing to him a statement that Japan's tariff conventions are at a stand-still. Marquis Inouye is much too great a statesman to have been betrayed into such an utterance. It is of course possible that the remark attributed to the Marquis had reference solely to England.

Saturday, October 22.

This subject continues to occupy a large share of journalistic attention in Tokyo. The Asahi Shimbun observes that out of Japan's total imports, namely, 430 million yen, the duty-free goods total 155 millions, so that the dutiable merchandise aggregates only 275 millions. Out of this last figure the imports of British manufactures amount to 92 millions being thus nearly one third of the aggregate. It is natural that British manufacturers should be solicitous about the fate of a trade so considerable, but, on the other hand, Great Britain's purchases from Japan are all very petty, and no duty imposed on them could countervail the income derived from her exports to Japan.

It is stated that the Seiyu-kai are likely to raise this question in the Diet, on the general ground that a policy which fails to satisfy the country's ally must be pronounced defective.

Mr. Abe of the Foreign Office points out the error of supposing that Japan would be inconvenienced by the absence of conventional tariffs with foreign States. The fact is that if no such conventions existed, Japan's action would be all the more untrammelled. Several Western countries at present carry on trade with each other and do not trouble their heads about tariff conventions.

Sunday, October 23.

The assailants of the new tariff are directing their lances against Mr. Abe, Councillor of the Department of Foreign Affairs, who was quoted two or three days ago as having stated that if the new tariff contained any defects, responsibility for them must be borne by the Diet as well as by the Government. This statement is vehemently taken up by the Nippon, which appears to think that Mr. Abe was quite unjustified in saying anything of the kind, inasmuch as the tariff was compiled at the Foreign Office whose officials must be supposed to have been better versed than the Diet in foreign affairs. We suspect that the Diet will be disposed to resent this comment by our contemporary. After all, whatever be the source of a measure submitted to the Houses, the responsibility of adopting or rejecting it rests with them and with them alone, and cannot be in the slightest degree evaded by pleading that confidence was placed in the drafters of the measure. At all events these are mere side-issues. The main point of Mr. Abe's statement was that the Government cannot reasonably be expected to invite the Diet to amend the Tariff unless the latter can be shown to be palpably defective.

The Jiji Shimpō, which led the way in recommending easier terms for England, now admits that things have come to a stand-still. Our contemporary suggests that a plan was at one time entertained to solve the difficulty by concluding conventional tariffs with all the powers except England and then extending all the embodied privileges to the latter. But it is palpable that the Powers would not lend themselves to such a manoeuvre. The Jiji therefore quotes an anonymous "well-informed person" as saying that the only course is for Japan to exercise her autonomic right and grant special terms to English manufactures without concluding any conventional tariff and frankly on the grounds of the alliance. But the Jiji does not take note of the palpable fact that such an arrangement would have to be extended to France and Russia also, and that the resulting situation would be unendurable for the other Powers. We ourselves (Japan Mail) do not doubt that some exit from the dilemma will be found, but what form it will assume we think it idle to speculate at this juncture.

Monday, October 24.

The Jiji Shimpō continues its powerful advocacy of a policy of conciliation in the matter of the tariff. Dismissing the purely legal side of the question, and condemning all attempts to drag the problem into the arena of party politics, our contemporary confines itself to the simple argument that exceptional consideration must be extended to Great Britain as Japan's ally, above all when the English proposals are in no sense unreasonable. We observe that the Jiji Shimpō avoids any distinct statement of procedure. It simply maintains that the rates fixed by the new tariff should be reduced so as to avoid any injury to British trade. How the thing is to be managed without involving grave inconvenience in other directions, and how Russia and France are to be excluded from the resulting Zollverein, our contemporary does not say, interested as the public are to be instructed on this point.

The Niroku Shimbun is more practical though less convincing. It points out that English exports consist almost entirely of articles of fine manufacture, which, being correspondingly expensive, are undergoing gradual displacement by coarse German goods. Consequently to impose an exceptionally high duty on English manufactures would be practically to prohibit them at once instead of suffering them to undergo gradual extinction. It is natural that British merchants should complain in the face of such a prospect, and the Japanese Government finds itself distinctly in a dilemma. It cannot negotiate a conventional tariff with Great Britain in the face of Count Okuma's declaration to the Diet, and it cannot invite the latter to amend the statutory tariff on the very heels of its enactment. In these circumstances the plain and only convenient course is for the Cabinet to resign, and bequeath to its successors the duty of saving the situation. That is the Niroku's view but the only thing accomplished, so far as we can see, would be a change of Ministry.

The Nippon writes quite violently, and its utterances are correspondingly unconvincing. It is bitterly opposed to the Katsura Cabinet, and it appears to follow the principle that any stick will do to beat a dog.

Tuesday, October 25.

A very positive statement is made by the Mainichi Dempo and the Shogyo Shimpō with regard to the new tariff. These two journals agree in alleging that, as all the Powers are waiting to see what course England will take, it becomes impossible to conclude any conventional tariffs until some agreement is come to with Great Britain. Accordingly the Japanese Government has decided that the best course will be to fix the rates upon British special manufactures in accordance with Downing Street's wishes, and to ask the Japanese Diet to approve the corresponding changes in the tariff. That having been effected, it will be possible to proceed to negotiations with other countries, and as only special articles will have been thus treated, the most-favoured-nation clause need not prove an obstacle. We give this news for what it may be worth, and by no means do we endorse it.

Thursday, October 27.

Certain Tokyo journals, conspicuously the Mainichi, the Chuo and the Nippon, continue persistently to write in an agitated strain about the new tariff. Anxious as we all are to discover some comfortable exit from the present situation, we cannot but deprecate the attempts made by these newspapers to drag the question into the field of party politics. The Nippon is conspicuously intemperate. It dubs the statesmen in power mere monkeys, who have no idea of expediency or tact, and it observes that had they divested themselves a little of their self-conceit by taking foreign nations into their confidence when drafting the tariff, all this trouble might have been avoided. We can easily imagine what kind of criticisms would have been evoked from the Nippon had the Government adopted the course thus suggested. This is another case of expecting from Japan a line of procedure which is not followed by any other independent country in the world.

The Chuo writes as though the alliance were in jeopardy and is persuaded that the recent failure to raise a loan of 60 (?) million yen on account of the South Manchuria railway was due, not really to financial conditions, but to the sentiment evoked in England in connection with the tariff question.

THE BUDGET FOR NEXT FISCAL YEAR.

We read in the Kokumin Shimbun that on the 21st instant a meeting of the Cabinet definitely adopted the budget for next fiscal year. The Government adheres strictly to the programme hitherto pursued by it. In other words the normal revenue will be made to cover all expenditures; there will be no floating of new debts, nor any new public enterprises; the redemption of the national debts will be continued as before and the taxes will remain the same. Thus the total outlays in the ordinary budget will amount to 530 millions whereas the outlays for the current year aggregated 534 millions. These figures seem at first sight difficult to reconcile with the fact that large outlays have to be incurred on account of the annexation of Chosen. But the expenditures under that heading are relegated to a special account. Were they included in the general budget the outlays would total over 550 millions. On the other hand, there is an extraordinary income in sight amounting to some 65 millions. This is derived from natural increase of revenue, which gives 30 millions, and from surplus which gives 35 millions. The extraordinary expenditures are, first, 16 millions on account of the Navy, being the first instalment of a total grant of 80 millions spread over five years; second 1½ millions for developing the Wakamatsu Iron Foundry, this being a part of a total appropriation of 10 millions; third, 500,000 on account of the Shimonoseki-Moji ferry-bridge; and fourth, a sum of 1,300,000 on account of telephone expansion, this to be in addition to the 4 millions already set aside on that account. It is anticipated that there will be a loss of revenue under the headings of land-tax and business-tax to the extent of 4½ million yen. As for the income tax it will be allowed to remain as it is. Nothing is said about the tax on textile fabrics or that on communications.

The critics are beginning to busy themselves about the Budget for next fiscal year. It is predicted by the Asahi—which seems to find some pleasure in the prophecy—that the attacks of the opposition will be directed chiefly against the appropriation of large sums on account of continuing enterprises while providing money for one year only. This is notably true in the case of naval increment and the Wakamatsu foundry. Under the former heading a total of 80 millions is set down to be provided during a period of six years, and under the latter heading a total of 10 millions spread over five years, but the only provision made is for 15 millions and 1½ millions respectively in the first year of the two periods. Another point of attack will be the Cabinet's abstention from bringing forward a revised law of income tax in the next session of the Diet. It was promised in the last session that this should be duly submitted to the Diet of 1910-11.

The Nippon attributes this action on the part of the Cabinet to the fact that the proposed amendment of the income-tax law would entail a reduction of revenue to the extent of 5 million yen, which the Government cannot afford in view of naval expansion

THE CONVERSION SCHEME.

If journals like the Nichi Nichi Shimbun were believed implicitly by foreigners, the credit of Japanese finance would be in a bad way. Our contemporary is quite persuaded that the operations of conversion carried out during the past ten months have been practical failures; that they never could have been achieved without the aid of foreign money; that to convert domestic debts by contracting foreign obligations in their place is a fatal policy, since in return for a small diminution of interest-rate great sums flow out of the country; and that the Japanese bankers who formed a syndicate to assist the Government's measure are now bitterly regretting their rashness. So far as we can discover the only apparently solid ground for this criticism is that the new 4 per cents. are quoted at a little over 93 at present in the open market. But the 5 per cents. were quoted at 87 three years ago, and it is surely extravagant to interpret a temporary fluctuation as an evidence of the failure of a large and permanent scheme. Something very much more convincing than our Tokyo contemporary's arguments is needed to convince us that a programme deliberately adopted by all the leading financiers in the country is to be tried by a tribunal consisting of one newspaper.

It must be confessed, however, that the present trend of public opinion as reflected by a large part of the Tokyo press resembles the feeling which existed in May and June of 1907 when the Saionji Ministry was tottering to its fall. Thus the Asahi Shimbun notes that whereas complete abstention from fresh loans and repayment of existing debts constituted principal planks in the Katsura Cabinet's platform, the Ministry has now been obliged, in deference to the demands of the military party, to make an appropriation of 80 million yen spread over six years for purposes of naval increment. This has entailed two measures inconsistent with the policies hitherto professed. One of those measures is that the bill for reducing the income tax has had to be laid aside, and that the surplus accruing from interest on debt reduction has had to be carried to the general account instead of being added to the redemption fund. Another point made by the same journal is that whereas the net profits of the State railways do not exceed 9 million yen annually, from 20 to 30 millions are allotted for railway improvements. This money is understood to be obtained from the Deposits Bureau in the Finance Department, but that is merely another form of borrowing, and cannot therefore be reconciled with the Government's policy of refraining from other loans.

This point about railways is taken up by the Fiji Shimpō which advocates a frank issue of railway bonds as the best way of liquifying capital and restoring prosperity throughout the country. The Government talks about extending the system of Industrial and Hypothec Banks so as to bring cheap funds within the reach of the people in the provinces, but the Fiji believes that a much more effective method would be to float railway bonds and lay aside romantic adherence to the policy of contracting no new debts.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The figures for the foreign trade during the second ten days of the current month were as follow:—

	Yen.
Exports	15,025,000
Imports	10,403,000
Excess of Exports.....	4,622,000
The figures for the whole year up to the 20th instant are as follow:—
	Yen.	Compared with last year.
Exports	354,534,000	+38,784,000
Imports	367,172,000	+4,877,000
Excess of Imports.....	12,638,000

THE SEIKOSHO DEBENTURES.

Up to the 22nd instant the applications for the Seikosha's debentures had totalled 3,118,500 yen. This is considered as indicating that the whole loan, namely 10 million yen, will be largely oversubscribed.

Up to the evening of the 24th instant the subscriptions for the Seikosho's debentures in Tokyo alone totalled 6,350,000 yen. The list closed on the 25th, and it was expected that the subscriptions would considerably exceed the required amount, when all the names of subscribers outside Tokyo were included.

Returns have not yet been received from Osaka and Nagoya with regard to the progress of the above loan, but it is believed that when the lists closed on the evening of the 25th instant the applications from all quarters must have totalled some 14 or 15 million yen. Some offers went as high as a yen and a half premium, but it is believed that the average price paid was about 50 sen over the selling price. It must be confessed that neither this nor the result of the Hypothec Bank's debenture-issue suggests such a plethora of unemployed capital as Japanese publicists believe to exist. Had the Seikosho's debentures alone been in question, we might have concluded that credit had something to do with the matter. The general public have not yet learned that the Tanko Steamship Company and the Seikosho are two wholly distinct enterprises, the only relation existing between them being that the shareholders of the former are shareholders of the latter also. Equally nebulous are many people's minds about a connection between the Seitetsujo of the Tanko Company and the Seikosho. It is supposed that because the former has not proved successful thus far, the latter's prospects are correspondingly impaired. As a matter of fact, however, the Seikosho has nothing whatever to do with the Seitetsujo. The connection between the two is limited to the identity of their first syllables. The Seitetsujo may ultimately prove a total failure or a brilliant success, but beyond a feeling of natural sympathy the Seikosho will be equally indifferent in either case. The public, however does not yet make these clear discriminations, and to that want of discernment might fairly have been attributed any reluctance to subscribe for the Seikosho's debentures. But nothing of the kind can be said of the Hypothec Bank's case. Yet the subscriptions for its debentures exceeded the issue by only 5 million yen. Does it not seem pretty clear that all this talk of a flood of pent-up capital must be taken with reserve?

FORMOSA.

Mr. Uchida, Head of the Civil Government of Formosa has just returned to Taipeh after a tour of inspection through the regions where the Japanese forces are operating. He is quoted as speaking with profound astonishment of the feats achieved in scaling mountains, planting artillery in virtually inaccessible positions, and erecting wire entanglements across regions absolutely without a road. He alleges that these achievements have thoroughly startled the aboriginals, who regard them as something super-human. It is true that the aboriginals have not yet surrendered en masse, but a large number of them have returned to their homes and abandoned all intention of further resistance.

CHOSHŪ.

Friday, October 21.

The leaders of the Dai-han Hyop-poi are still in difficulties about the money which they received to meet the expenses of dissolving the party. The person principally concerned has gone into hiding, and it appears pretty certain that there has been dishonesty of some sort. This is a very unsavoury ending after all the great professions made by this association. The Il-ching-hoi at all events has escaped any such unsightly record.

It may be mentioned here that the money subscribed some years ago for the purpose of liquidating the national debt of Korea is still awaiting disposal. An absurd conception at the outset, this fund has threatened to ruin several reputations. Recently a proposition to hand it over to the Educational Authorities received some support, but not unnaturally people are now beginning to say that as annexation has wiped out Korea's debt, the proper course to pursue with regard to the money is to return it to its original owners. The question is, however, how much of the fund is available for any purpose.

Saturday, October 22.

At the recent interview between Prince Li (senior) and Min Chihyong-sik, formerly leader of the Wi-Pyong (righteous army), the ex-Emperor is said to have told Min that his, Min's, efforts on that occasion were as futile as would be an attempt to smash Mount Paik-han with an egg. He himself—the ex-Emperor—had partially recognised this at the time. Min is said to have acknowledged the justice of Prince Li's observation, and to have announced his intention of docking his top-knot as a sign of allegiance to the new regime.

It is stated that the office of the Governor-General in Seoul has contributed 40,000 yen to pay the expenses of the party of Korean tourists who are about to visit Japan. This is a mere rumour and may remain unconfirmed, but certainly the money would be well spent.

Tokyo newspapers publish a statement that the total ordinary expenditures in connection with Korea during the next fiscal year are 21 million yen, and the extraordinary outlays 14 millions. The most important items in the ordinary expenditures are the following:—

	Yen.
Imperial Princes' Households	1,500,000
Governor-General's office	3,000,000
Law-courts and jails.....	2,500,000
Police	327,000
Local expenditures.....	4,250,000

Among the extraordinary expenditures a sum of 3 million yen on account of road construction is noticeable.

In consequence of the purchase of the Tsushima Fusan cable by the Japanese Government the telegraphic rates between Chosen and Nippon will be reduced by one half from next month.

Sunday, October 23.

The party of Korean tourists who are to visit Japan number forty-five including ladies. The male section of the party are to leave Seoul on the 24th instant, the females preceding them by one day, and the two sections coming together at Shimonoseki on the 25th instant. They will proceed thence via Kyoto and Nagoya, and will reach Tokyo on the 30th.

General-Viscount Terauchi carried with him from Seoul and presented to the Emperor, the Empress and the Crown Prince and the Crown Princes of Japan various specimens of Korean manufactures.

Tuesday, October 25.

It was always anticipated that to deal with the Yangpan would prove a troublesome problem when the Japanese undertook the management of Korean affairs. These Yangpan may be briefly described as the expectant-official class, and their presence in any country constitutes an emphatic obstacle to progress. On the other hand, they have existed for centuries, and to ask them now suddenly to abandon their life of idleness and to become productive members of society is a suggestion easier to make than to enforce. The thing has to be done, however, and although a portion of the recently distributed pension bonds has been allotted to the Yangpan, that provision will not suffice to keep the wolf permanently from the door, and earnest investigations are now said to be in progress for the purpose of determining how these idlers shall be set to work and what sort of employment shall be provided for them.

The ladies' section of the Korean tourists' party have arrived at Shimonoseki. They number 26 and among them there is only one who has had any experience of travelling. Thus they are said to have found the journey very distressing, and it is uncertain when they will be able to proceed. For the moment they are comfortably living in the Sanyo Hotel and the Kawau Hotel, where they will remain at all events until the arrival of the male section, numbering 22.

The Water Works at Chemulpo have been at last finished. They were planned five years ago at a total outlay of 2,170,000 yen, and it appears that they have been built within the limits of that estimate. A beginning was made under the auspices of Prince Ito. The ceremony of Tsusui, in other words, of sending the water for the first time through the pipes, is to take place on the 30th instant.

Thursday, October 27.

It is really noticeable that Korea, instead of being a seed-plot of anxieties, as was the case before annexation, seems to have now entered an era of complete tranquility. From week's end to week's end one hears nothing of the insurrectionary disturbances which used to be so common. One of two inferences is inevitable. Either official secrecy is rigidly exercised, or the sometime-disturbers of the peace have become absolutely resigned. We have no right to make the former assumption, though the latter is almost too pleasant to be quite credible. One feature of the situation may be that the Yangpan and Literati, who are understood to have been the main fomenters of trouble, have folded their hands in expectation of liberal largesse. If so, it is possible that these idlers may once again begin to disturb the peace, for the latest accounts say that the sum available for distribution among them does not suffice to give more than from 15 to 100 yen to each of the 6000 persons who constitute the two categories. The 15-yen men are not likely to become very valiant supporters of the new system.

On the 19th instant a case of Cholera was reported from the warship Fuji anchored in Kure harbour.

THE ANGLO JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

The Japanese commissioners of the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition report that the affair has been very successful in opening avenues of trade. This is especially true of the following articles, namely, embroidery, silk fabrics, cotton crêpe, porcelain and pottery, lacquers, paper and paper manufactures, soy and sake. Several English firms signified their desire to become importers of these goods, and not a few were introduced to representatives of the Japanese manufacturers, with whom they are said to have made arrangements. Some have set out for Japan to investigate the conditions of this country more fully. Moreover, in the sequel of applications made by British middle-men, various specimens were ordered from Japan, these being intended to illustrate manufactures which did not find a place among the exhibits. The principal falling under this category were drawn-work handkerchiefs, embroidered screens, carved chairs and embroidered female costumes. We should have thought that these articles were amply represented among the exhibits, but the report from which we are quoting gives a different impression. There is also said to be some prospect of a market for Japanese green tea in the United Kingdom, and a great impetus has been given by the Exhibition to the demand for Formosan Oolong.

With regard to the Mexican Exhibition, our readers are probably aware that no official part was taken by Japan, but certain merchants of Tokyo, Osaka, Yokohama and Kobe combined to furnish a section in the Exhibition. A report of the result is now said to have reached Messrs. Watano and Company in Yokohama. It is to the effect that the affair has been very successful. The 15th was originally fixed as closing day, but the time was prolonged until the 20th instant. From the beginning to the end the sale of entrance tickets produced seventeen thousand yen, and the prices obtained for Japanese goods which had originally cost only 50 or 60 thousand yen, aggregated about 120,000. Besides this many other articles were ordered from Japan.

THE WAKAMATSU IRON FOUNDRY.

Our readers will have observed that in the budgetary figures recently published an item of considerable magnitude appeared under the heading of the Wakamatsu Iron Foundry. This subject is likely to provoke a fresh outburst of controversy. The Asahi Shinbun has already taken up the matter. It observes that the money sunk in the Wakamatsu enterprise seems to be without limit. When the work was originally started, the estimated expenditure did not exceed 5 million yen, whereas it has now reached 51 millions, and the Government proposes to ask for a further grant of 10 millions, of which the first installment, namely, 1½ million, is included in next year's budget. The explanation given by the Authorities is that whereas Japan needs 600,000 tons of iron annually, the Wakamatsu Foundry cannot turn out more than 150,000, and its plant therefore requires to be doubled. The Asahi does not think this a sufficient reason. It considers that the country is asked to pay too heavily for the privilege of being self-supporting in this matter, and it notes that the losses incurred on account of the Foundry show no signs of diminution,

THE CLEARING HOUSES BANQUET.

The annual banquet of the Clearing Houses of Japan took place on the 23rd instant at the Bankers' Club in Tokyo. Mr. Toyokawa, of the Mitsubishi Bank presided, and in a speech, briefly reported, he referred to the success which had attended the Government's conversion scheme. There could be no question, Mr. Toyokawa added, about the expediency of continuing this programme and the leading bankers of the Empire rested secure in that confidence.

The Prime Minister then made a lengthy speech of which we publish a detailed translation elsewhere.

The next speaker was Baron Matsuo, Governor of the Bank of Japan. He spoke in a hopeful strain, maintaining that the money market had not been injuriously affected by even such a calamity as the inundations, and he considered that fact to be conclusive evidence of the stability of the financial position. Another evidence was furnished by the returns of the Clearing Houses, which returns showed that the volume of transactions during the first nine months of the current year had been 6,000 million yen, namely 800 millions greater than the corresponding volume of transactions last year. Turning to the country's foreign trade, the Baron spoke of the results as most encouraging. The figure for exports was not inferior to that reached in 1907 which had been a record year. With regard to productive enterprises, the sums subscribed for increasing the capital of banks and manufactories or starting new enterprises of that nature during the first nine months of the current year had amounted to 360 million yen, whereof 110 millions had been duly registered, being 92 millions more than the corresponding figure for 1909. Moreover, the debentures issued by companies and other similar transactions had aggregated 87 millions, and altogether the conditions seemed to point to a return of business prosperity.

Baron Shibusawa spoke next but his speech did not amount to anything more than an explicit endorsement of the Government's policy from point to point.

There has not yet been time for the leading journals to comment on the Prime Minister's speech at any length, but the Nippon strikes the key note of the Opposition when it denounces the Government's adherence to the policy of conversion. Our contemporary predicts that the result of Marquis Katsura's statement will be a heavy fall in the share market, and doubtless the debate which took place on the day before the speech will be interpreted as confirming this prediction. It is noticeable, however, that the two independent bankers who may be said to possess an exceptional measure of public confidence, namely Baron Shibusawa and Mr. Toyokawa, have declared themselves emphatically in favour of continuing the conversion policy. And it is further noticeable that so far from depressing the share market, the effect was precisely the opposite.

THE JAPANESE NAVY.

Captain Oguri of the Japanese Navy was sent from the Naval Department to a session of the Popular Party's Investigation Committee to furnish information on naval matters. The Captain seems to have made a most exhaustive statement, the gist of which was to show that by the year 1917 Japan will be in a very dangerous situation unless she materially changes her programme. He divided his information into four sections which we epitomise as follow:—

1.—PRESENT NAVAL STRENGTH.

	Battleships.	Armoured Cruisers.
England.....	52	45
America.....	32	15
Germany.....	33	12
France.....	19	15
Japan.....	14	13

2.—NAVAL STRENGTH IN 1917.

England.....	47	31
America.....	37	6
Germany.....	31	14
France.....	26	4
Japan.....	7	7

3.—FORCES THAT COULD BE SENT TO THE EAST AT PRESENT.

England.....	26	23
America.....	32	15
Germany.....	33	12
France.....	19	15
Japan.....	14	13

4.—FORCES THAT COULD BE SENT EASTWARD IN 1917.

England.....	24	16
America.....	37	6
Germany.....	31	14
France.....	26	4
Japan.....	7	7

It will immediately occur to our readers that the methods of arriving at the above calculations require a great deal of explanation. Specially strange is the arithmetic which shows that England's battleships will decrease by five and her armoured cruisers by fourteen during the next seven years whereas the corresponding figures in nearly all other cases show actual increases.

We find in the Nichi Nichi a statement which if correct, has considerable interest. It refers to the allotment of 80 million yen on account of the Navy, as provided in the draft of the new budget. The sum remaining to be spent under the Third Programme of Naval expansion is 95 million yen, and the period of the programme being eleven years, it has still six years to run, namely, until 1916. It was in consideration of these remaining six years that the period was fixed for the new grant of 80 millions. The manner in which this grant is to be applied is stated by our contemporary to be two-fold. Twenty millions will be expended upon increasing by from 5000 to 7000 tons the displacement of the vessels whose construction is provided for under the present programme. The remaining 60 millions will be spent upon the construction and the equipment of one 25,000 ton battleship and one large armoured cruiser. The sum spent under the two programmes during next fiscal year will be 44,800,000 yen, namely 28,800,000 under the old programme and 16,000,000 under the new.

THE LATE PRINCE ITO.

The leading Tokyo journals devote the major part of their space to comments on the career of the late Prince Ito in commemoration of the first anniversary of his assassination. In fact the volume of the articles penned upon this subject, the description of the tomb and the reminiscences collected from various quarters amount to a public demonstration not less striking than that which attended the Prince's obsequies. A memorial service attended by the members of the family only was held at the residence of the Prince in the forenoon, and at 2 p.m. a public service took place at the grave. Delegates from the Emperor and Empress and the Crown Prince were present. The place of sepulture has now been converted into a park, and the immediate surroundings of the tomb recall the burial places of the Shoguns in Uyeno and Shiba.

It is stated that Marquis Inouye pays frequent visits to the sepulchre where he remains silent for long intervals, apparently communing with the spirit of the dead and often evincing his deep sorrow by tears. Since the Prince's death the Marquis has interested himself actively in arranging all the family affairs of the deceased, and is reported to have made great sacrifices for that purpose.

Many interviews with celebrated statesmen appear in the columns of Tokyo newspapers in connection with the anniversary, but as a rule they possess little public interest. An exception should be made, however, in the case of Count Okuma who is quoted by the Hochi Shimbun as alleging that what he had anticipated has taken place, namely, that the spirit of constitutionalism in Japan has been weakened by the demise of Prince Ito, and that military methods have gained a corresponding access of power. The Count does not enter into details, but he points broadly to the procedure of the Katsura Cabinet in confirmation of his theory.

Count Itagaki makes an interesting criticism. He says that a notable trait of Ito's character was his absorbing patriotism. Persons did not count with him at all: country was everything. If he had disputes with his contemporaries, the subject was always limited to State affairs, and it thus resulted that these differences of opinion never affected his private friendships.

The Chuo and the Nippon take the same line as Count Okuma. They insist that the twelve months which have elapsed since the death of the Prince have sufficed to greatly strengthen the hands of the military party, and the fact is demonstrated in the conduct of the Cabinet. We observe, however, that both of these journals are equally careful to refrain from particularizing the counts of their accusation.

THE GAS COMPANIES.

The original trouble between the Tokyo Gas and the Chiyoda Gas Companies has dropped out of sight for the moment, but another complication is now reported to have arisen. It is in connection with the reclaimed land at Shibaura. The Chiyoda Directors are looking to obtain 17,000 tsubo of this land as a site for their factory, and they are said to have taken much trouble for the purpose of inducing a majority of the members of the municipal assembly to promise their support of an application for the sale of the land at 20 yen per tsubo. But now suddenly the Tokyo Gas Company has stepped into the field, and has applied for 20,000 tsubo in the same locality, asking further that the price shall be fixed by open tender. It is said to be the intention of the Tokyo Gas Company to offer 30 yen per tsubo, and the Directors explain their action by saying that they will soon have to move their factory from its present site owing to the nuisance of the smoke. This indeed puts a spoke in the wheel of the Chiyoda people.

THE CHINESE NATIONAL ASSEMBLY.

If a telegram sent by the Mainichi Shimbun's correspondent from Peking be correct, an important step forward has been taken with reference to China's National Assembly. On the 23rd instant, after receiving the petition unanimously adopted by the Senate, advocating the immediate opening of such an assembly, the Prince Regent held a council in the Palace, at which were present the President and the Vice-President of the Senate and all the Ministers of State. The subject of discussion was the petition, and after a debate lasting two hours, it is said to have been decided that the Assembly should be opened in the fifth year of Hsuan-tung, that is to say, in 1913. The date originally fixed was 1916, being the eighth year of Hsuan-tung, and it will thus be seen that, if the above report be accurate, the remaining period of probation is to be cut down by just one half. Of course no one will be disposed to place implicit credence in this important news without full corroboration, but it has to be noticed that previous telegrams indicated the above compromise as very probable.

It appears, as indeed might have been suspected, that no credence can be attached to the statement telegraphed to Tokyo on the 24th instant, namely, the statement that at a meeting of the Council of State in the Palace a decision had been adopted for shortening by three years the probational period for the opening of a National Assembly. That story seems to have been manufactured out of absolutely whole cloth. The latest news is that the Government is receiving from many sides encouragement to oppose so radical a measure as the hastening of the National Assembly. It is now stated that the President of the Board of Finance, Mr. Tsai Tsz, is resolutely opposed to any change of the original programme, and that he repaired to the palace on the 24th instant and urged the Prince Regent to remain steadfast. Prince Chin's attitude has not been clearly ascertained, but it is thought to be conservative. Rumour now has it that the unanimity shown by the Senate in adopting the petition was largely the result of menaces to which various members had been subjected, and the feeling in Peking is said to be that to yield in this matter would be fatal to the prestige of the Throne. At all events, whatever be the immediate outcome of the petition, the fact that it was adopted unanimously by the Senate cannot fail to encourage the radical element throughout the provinces.

It is really harrassing to attempt to keep track of events in Peking by the aid of telegrams reaching Tokyo newspapers. In our last issue we quoted a wire which represented Mr. Tsai, President of the Board of Finance, as prominent among the opponents of shortening the period of parliamentary probation. Now, however, news comes via the Hochi Shimbun's correspondent to the effect that on the 26th instant, when the budget was read for the first time in the Senate, the President of the Board of Finance offered an explanation in the course of which he declared that a National Assembly to deal with the country's finance ought to be convened as speedily as possible.

When a Committee was appointed by the Senate to draft a covering despatch for the petition to the Throne with reference to the immediate opening of a National Assembly, it was thought quite possible, if not probable, that the Committee might be persuaded to postpone the completion of its labours for a lengthy period. However this forecast has been completely contradicted by events. The Committee presented its report on the 26th instant. It is described as a document couched in most imposing language. Among other things it was stated that whereas the introduction of representative Government would certainly carry China into the path of prosperity now trodden by Japan, to continue her oligarchic system would be equally certain to expose her to dangers such as have overtaken Korea. This, it will be observed, is precisely the argument attributed to the Local Assembly in Mukden; namely that a united China can stand but a divided China must fall.

Only one speech was delivered by a member of the Committee, namely, Mr. Wang, and the Committee's draft was then unanimously adopted for presentation to the Throne. It is right to observe that the Hochi Shimbun has a monopoly of this news. Possibly some other Tokyo paper will to-morrow have a monopoly of a contradiction.

In the Jiji Shimbun's Peking correspondence it is stated that this question of a National Assembly is causing much discussion in official circles, and that a difference of opinion exists on the subject between the Empress Dowager and the Prince Regent, the former, as will readily be supposed, regarding any abbreviation of the probationary period with something like aversion.

CHINA'S FOREIGN LOANS.

Collating the telegraphic reports to hand this morning we are disposed to place credence in the rumour that the Viceroy of Manchuria has concluded a loan of 15 million Taels with an American syndicate. The difficulty in crediting this story at the outset lay in the fact that such a transaction would have been directly opposed to the Peking Government's recently adopted policy of vetoing independent loans on the part of the localities. It would obviously have been a wise policy on the part of Peking to do all the necessary borrowing abroad in the name of the Chinese Empire, subsequently distributing the funds thus obtained to the localities having need of them. Manchuria would of course have been included in such a programme. But it is now said that Viceroy Shih Liang was induced to withdraw his resignation solely on condition that the Three Eastern Provinces should be placed in a separate financial category. The result is the conclusion of the loan above referred to. Another obscure point is now cleared up. Our readers will remember that when this transaction was first spoken of, the loan was described as unsecured. We ventured to doubt that statement at the time, and it now appears that the revenue of Manchuria is to be hypothecated as security. Apparently the Viceroy's idea is that if this money be judiciously employed, it will not only relieve the pressure of immediate embarrassment but will also promote the material development of the Three Provinces sufficiently to lighten the burden of the debt

From Peking comes news that Mr. Bland has again appeared upon the scene as the representative of a British syndicate, and that his return to China is believed to herald the opening of renewed competition between the powers interested in bringing capital within China's reach. The immediate project seems to be an extension of the Manchurian railway into Mongolia and the building at Lienshan of a harbour such as shall absorb all the over-sea trade of Newchwang and bring Dairen face to face with a powerful competitor.

It appears that there is a conflict of opinion between Mr. Tsai, President of the Board of Finance, on the one hand, and Viceroy Hsih and Jui, of the Three Eastern Provinces and of the Two Kiang, on the other. Viceroy Jui is understood to advocate the raising of a large loan by the Central Government, and the division of the proceeds among the localities where railways are to be built, while the Viceroy of Manchuria has stipulated that the region under his jurisdiction shall be exempted from this method and has already taken steps to conclude an independent loan of 10 or 15 million taels. The President of the Board of Finance is now said to have advised the Throne that these two Viceroys are taking a very short-sighted view of the situation, and are bent solely upon procuring funds without any due thought for their repayment. His Excellency suggests that the matter should be left in the hands of the Senate.

On the other hand, the Jiji Shimbun's Peking correspondent telegraphs that the United States Legation in that city has been formally approached by Mr. Tsai, President of the Board of Finance, and Mr. Sheng, Vice President of the Board of Posts and Telegraphs and Chief Commissioner of the Coinage Committee, with a proposal for raising in America a loan of 80 million taels. This money is to be applied avowedly as a hard-money basis for the new monetary system, but in reality it is said to be needed for meeting the deficit of over 73 million taels shown in the budget now lying before the Senate. The correspondent adds that several overtures had previously been made to the American Representative in Peking, but that owing to their informal character they could not be officially entertained. This last proposal, however, not being thus disqualified, has been duly accepted and forwarded, and its immediate consequence is that Mr. Straight, agent of the United States Syndicate, is expected to arrive in Peking about the 17th of November. Of course it will be perceived that this alleged loan of 80 million taels has nothing to do with the building of railways in the Yangtze valley. On the latter account China is evidently being pressed independently to enter the market as a borrower.

THE CHINESE BUDGET.

The budget for the next fiscal year is said to have been handed to the Senate in Peking on the 22nd instant, and it was expected to be brought up for discussion on the 25th. The telegraphic reports vary slightly in their statement of figures, but the broad facts appear to be that the total revenue of the State is 297 million Taels, and that the expenditures exceed that amount by 73,800,000 Taels. This very large deficit is made up of 24,800,000 Taels on account of the localities; 29 millions on account of the Central Government, and the remainder on account of reserves and sundry purposes. The main source of income is the land tax, and the next important items are Customs revenue and transport duty (likin), which yield about an equal sum, but the exact figure is not stated. The telegraph alleges that one third of the total expenditures are on account of military preparations, a startling allegation, the truth of which we are inclined to doubt. The budget is said to be accompanied by a statement deploring the discrepancy between income and expenditure and insisting that some steps must be taken speedily to establish equilibrium. It is added that a very pessimistic feeling pervades in Chinese financial circles, and we can well believe that such is the case, for if the outlines of the budget given above be correct, the Chinese State may almost be said to be bankrupt. An excess of expenditures to the amount of some 25 per cent. of the revenue is indeed a formidable state of affairs. Our readers will remember that the highest estimate hitherto published as to the deficit did not exceed 50 million taels, whereas now we are told that it is nearly 74 millions. That the military outlays should exceed 100 million taels as the above figures indicate, requires confirmation, for it has hitherto been maintained that China does not spend up on warlike preparations as much as she has to devote to the service of her national debt, which latter involves an annual outlay of only 51 million taels. Moreover the world has hitherto been in the habit of imagining that China's Army and Navy cost only a petty fraction of her total outlays, and this has been frequently adduced by her friends—among whom we count ourselves—as an evidence of her highly civilised determination to appeal to anything but force in the conduct of her international relations.

As a matter of course great interest is excited in Japan in connection with the figures of the first budget presented by the Chinese Government to a representative assembly. The enormous deficit of 74 million taels shown by this budget thoroughly perplexes onlookers. For the sake of clearness it may be well to restate the various excesses of expenditures over revenue. They are 24,800,000 taels on account of the Central Government's outlay; 29,000,000 taels on account of the localities; and 20,000,000 taels on account of preparations for the constitution and extraordinary continuing expenses. As for the revenue, that of the Central Government is put at 297 millions, and if it be true that one third of this goes to the army and navy and 51 millions to the service of the national debt, it follows that only 147 millions remain available for administrative outlays. With regard to the provinces the total revenue is put at 230 millions, but as this is based on a somewhat antiquated estimate, the figure may be unduly small. However the broad fact remains that the country's income is glaringly less than its outlays, and it is tolerably certain that if the Senate be invited to save the situation by voting increased taxes, a flat refusal will be elicited. The interesting speculation, however, is how have the finances been hitherto conducted if these immense deficits have existed. How are we to reconcile a total deficit of 29 millions in the provinces with the universally accepted idea that the local satraps collect from the people a great deal more money than is actually needed for administrative expenses? Probably many people will be disposed to conclude that the budget presented to the Senate is not a very accurate document, and that the figures it sets forth do not by any means represent the exact state of affairs.

THE PRESS IN CHINA.

Considerable excitement has evidently been caused in Peking by the submission of a new draft of press-law to the Senate. The bill emanates from the Government, and its eleventh article provides that no newspaper may publish anything injurious to the reputation of an individual whether it be true or untrue. The enactment of such a law would of course be fatal to journalistic criticism, and newspapers in Peking denounce it on that ground as well on the ground that it would be diametrically contrary to an edict issued by the late Emperor's Government providing that all administrative affairs should be conducted in accordance with popular feeling. We gather that the bill has been submitted to a special committee of the Senate and its second reading is expected to elicit a very animated debate. The Chinese newspapers are naturally devoting much space to this question.

Meanwhile the cause of speedy parliamentary institutions in China has found a new ally in the Mukden Local Assembly. That body of legislators has adopted and forwarded to the Viceroy for submission to the Senate in Peking a decidedly disquieting petition. The document speaks in the plainest terms. It is quoted as declaring that the Russo-Japanese alliance has placed Manchuria in a position of imminent danger. The allied Powers may be said to have already set their forces in motion. It is idle to think that this Viceroy or that can save such a situation. Salvation lies solely in the union of the Chinese nation. The defeat suffered by China at Japan's hands sixteen years ago, and the outbreak of the conflict between Russia and Japan, which conflict related to the possession of Chinese territory, could both have been averted had China been a united nation, confident and ready to exert her full strength in case of emergency. The danger that now threatens is even more serious, and it cannot possibly be averted by any means except a whole-hearted union on the part of the entire Chinese nation. To bring that about a national assembly is essential, and the sooner such a body is called into existence, the better for China's safety.

These are very outspoken views, and certainly in enunciating them the Mukden Local Assembly does not show much reserve.

THE SENATE IN PEKING.

The adoption of the petition for shortening the parliamentary probation period in China, seems to have been marked by some unexpected features. The scene when the petition came up for discussion was most animated, no less than 250 persons being in the strangers' gallery. It was supposed that strenuous opposition would be offered by the Senators nominated by the Government, but not one of them uttered a word of protest or criticism. In fact there was no debate whatever. The measure was adopted unanimously, and the announcement of the fact produced an extraordinary result, namely, a vehement shout of Banzais for the Chinese constitution, which demonstration was led by one of the officially nominated members. It is stated that during the days immediately preceding the submission of the bill to the Senate by the Special Committee, the advocates of the measure besieged the houses of the Ministers of State and urged the cause of the petition with such insistence that the high officials were utterly wearied, and ultimately came to the conclusion that the best plan was to let things take their course. Naturally such a laissez aller policy evokes much criticism. If at this early stage the Government is going to adopt a programme of drift, there is no knowing what the final issue may be. It is not thought, however, that the proposals of the petitioners will be carried out in their entirety. They ask for the opening of an assembly at the fall of next year, but the probability is that, in view of the practical impossibility of complying with that project, the Government will compromise by shortening the probation period to one half of the six years which it has still to run. Whatever be the issue, the Government seems unfortunately invertebrate at this most important stage of China's history. The opening of a Chinese assembly does not in itself imply anything incongruous. The Chinese have no superiors in intelligence and adaptability. But there is an underlying fear that the first efforts of a national assembly would be devoted to the overthrow of Manchu authority, and no prudent man can regard such a contingency without apprehension.

THE CHINGCHOW-AIGUN RAILWAY.

Somewhat confusing telegrams come from Peking with regard to foreign loans and railway construction in Manchuria. The Asahi's correspondent speaks by wire of the renewal of the Chingchow-Aigun project, and refers to an agreement consisting of seven articles, and embodying in its preamble a frank statement that the railway is intended to compete with Japanese and Russian lines. We cannot clearly gather whether this agreement is still in the lap of the future or whether it has actually been signed, but we are inclined to think that the correspondent refers merely to rumour. The Chuo's correspondent forwards news that the construction of a harbour at Lienshan is the principal work to which the new Manchurian loan of 15 million Taels is to be applied. Now a harbour at Lienshan, which place is in the immediate neighbourhood of Chingwan-tao, would have no raison d'être except as the maritime terminus of a Chingchow-Aigun road, and consequently it is a fair inference that the building of that line though suspended has not been abandoned. When the line was proposed originally Japan signified her assent provided that she was admitted on equal terms with the other parties to the loan. Russia however negatived the programme in toto. If now the undertaking be brought again upon the tapis, Japan and Russia will have to work together, since the terms of their alliance oblige them to combine for the preservation of the status quo in Manchuria.

CHINA.

Friday, October 21.

It is announced that a great scheme of riverine improvement is contemplated in Central China. Five provinces are interested, namely, Hupeh, Hunan, Kiangsi, Anhui and Kiangsu. The idea is to construct engineering works which shall rob the Yangtze's floods of their destructive potentialities, and further to dredge the river thus curbed so that it will be possible for vessels of several thousand tons burden to steam right up to Hankow.

The complication at Mukden assumes more and more incredible dimensions. According to the original statement two Chinese employes of the Japanese Consulate-General had visited the German Consulate to make enquiries as to the itinerary and programme of the German Representative who was on a visit to Mukden. The two men were arrested on suspicion by the Chinese police, and a pistol being found in their possession, they were thrown into prison, whereafter Japanese protests failed altogether to obtain their release and the matter was finally submitted to Peking. The mysterious element in this story was that two ordinary employes of the Japanese Consulate should have taken upon themselves a duty of conducting such an enquiry. This feature is now elucidated by an explanation that the two men were employed as constables at the Japanese Consulate. But the strangest part of the incident is now reported; namely, that instead of awaiting the result of the representations made in Peking, the Local Authorities, abandoning the original charge of felonious design, substituted an accusation of conduct calculated to impair the relations between Germany and China, and the result is said to have been that the two constables were sentenced to three years' imprisonment. The whole tale reads like a page from Alice in Wonderland.

Saturday, October 22.

On the 21st instant, Mr. Tang Shao-yi took up the duties of his post as President of the Board of Posts and Telegraphs. He is represented as intending to deal with the railway-loan problem according to a policy different from that of the late Chang Chih-tung, but what the new policy is we have no indication. Inasmuch however as Chang pledged himself to the use of foreign money, it may be inferred that Mr. Tang intends to dispense with that aid. But how the Central Government is to disavow obligations contracted by one of its highest representatives, we are perplexed to see.

The Local Assembly of Hupeh has taken a distinctly retrogressive step. It has unanimously passed a bill vetoing residence or trade by foreigners outside treaty-limits. Such a restriction is in direct contravention of China's agreements with foreign Powers, and consequently the Hupeh Assembly's procedure must remain without effect unless the Central Government can persuade the Powers to abandon one of their most important conventional privileges. So far as the temper of the Assembly is concerned this incident recalls the action taken by the Japanese House of Representatives nineteen years ago, when it debated the possibility of preventing purchases of land by foreigners in the names of Japanese subjects, and when it adopted the policy of "strict enforcement."

The Viceroy of Manchuria is said to have telegraphically instructed the various local officials to deal with foreigners residing outside treaty-limits as they have hitherto dealt with them: in other words, not to abate any of China's pretensions in that respect. The Viceroy speaks of a new treaty between China and Japan on this subject.

Harbin telegraphs that the Russo-Chinese Bank, in the sequel of an agreement with the Banque du Nord, has changed its name to "Bank of Russia."

Sunday, October 23.

On the 22nd instant the Senate in Peking took an important step. It unanimously adopted for presentation to the Throne the petition for immediate convocation of a national assembly. The scene is described by telegrams as having partaken of solemnity. The Special Committee entrusted with the duty of considering the measure seems to have reported in the briefest manner, and thereafter only five short speeches were delivered. The Senate then adopted the Committee's report nem-con, and entrusted to a committee of six the duty of drafting a covering dispatch for the submission of the measure to the Throne.

According to the telegrams sent by the Nichi Nichi Shimbun's Peking correspondent strenuous efforts were made by both sides, the one to impede, the other to promote, the passage of this important measure to the Senate. If this be true, the official agitators were signally unsuccessful, for it does not appear that so much as one voice was raised in the Senate against the adoption of the petition.

From Shanghai comes news that the petition adopted by the Mukden Local Assembly bore the signatures of an immense number of supporters. "Tens of thousands" is the expression used in the telegram, and such a form of speech is generally interpreted in Japan to mean forty or fifty thousand. The anxiety felt in Mukden for speedily uniting the nation through the medium of representative Government is construed as strong evidence of the apprehensions caused by the Russo-Japanese alliance and the danger that it is thought to create for Manchuria.

Shanghai telegraphs that the German Representative in Peking, having approached the Chinese Government for information as to whether the Treasury guarantees or does not guarantee the paper of the Bank of China, received an answer tantamount to disavowing any responsibility for the redemption of these notes. We print this news for what it may be worth, observing that more than one doubtful feature suggests itself at once.

The Mainichi Dempo has an amusing wire from Peking to the effect that a representative of the Midland Bank of England is in that city endeavouring to arrange for a loan of money to China without interest. This is too comical to call for comment.

It is stated that the Peking Government has engaged six German officers as military instructors in the Metropolitan province, and that these employees are already on their way to China via Siberia. It may be taken for granted that as the present President of the Board of War was recently Chinese Representative in Berlin, his Excellency will be wholly in favour of German Military methods and weapons.

There has been a serious catastrophe in Shanghai. The warehouses of the Bank of Belgium have been destroyed by fire, and the loss involved is put at half a million taels.

The Antung Keekwanshan branch of the Mukden-Antung railway is reported to be so far advanced that the official opening will take place on the 31st of November.

The Mukden police affair seems to have really ended in the extraordinary manner that was predicted. The two constables who were in the employ of the Japanese Consulate at Mukden have been sentenced respectively to one year and six months' imprisonment, the crime of which they are accused being conduct calculated to impair the good relations between Germany and China. If this be really the offence committed by these constables, it follows that a great many newspaper editors should be condemned to share their imprisonment.

Monday, October 24.

A few days ago news was circulated that a deadlock had occurred between the Canton Local Assembly and the Viceroy. The subject in dispute was a petition adopted by the Assembly for the abolition of opium-smoking and gambling-houses. This document the Viceroy declined to forward to the Senate in Peking, and the Assembly thereupon resigned en bloc. The telegraph now says that the Viceroy had signified his intention to forward the petition, and has intimated the fact to the Assembly, accompanying the intimation with a courteous suggestion that the Assembly should resume the discharge of its functions. The telegraph does not say whether this conciliatory course has produced the desired result, but we may assume that it has since unqualified victory rests with the Assembly.

Tuesday, October 25.

The proceedings of the Provincial Assembly in Shantung have been marked by unusual events. Shortly after the opening of the Assembly, five of the members resigned en bloc. The same step was subsequently taken by two others, and this example is said to be likely to find several more followers. One is prepared to learn in the context of such incidents that some dissatisfaction is felt with regard to the procedure of the Local Authorities or of the Central Government. But the fact is that the Shantung seceders are actuated by disapproval of the methods of the Assembly itself. They complain that everything is conducted on party lines; that no attention whatever is paid to public interests, and that the people's money is recklessly spent. It is a novelty find one section of a public body taking such a broad line, and the seceding members of the Shantung Assembly are to be congratulated.

Wednesday, October 26.

Two items of news, brief but not uninteresting, come from Mukden. One is that Mr. Han, Chief of the Bureau of Foreign Affairs in the Local Government, has resigned his office on the ground that in the face of the strong anti-Japanese feeling now prevalent he cannot hope to discharge his functions satisfactorily. This news is sent by the Asahi's correspondent, yet in spite of such authority we venture to doubt the truth of the statement.

The other item is that the Chinese subject recently arrested at Mukden on suspicion of being engaged to act as a spy upon the movements of the Governor-General of Kwantung in connection with the autumn manceuvres, has been released with a caution.

Thursday, October 27.

A few days ago the telegraph conveyed the outline of instructions which had just been issued by the Taotai of Shanghai under the authority of the Viceroy. The gist of these instructions was that banks must limit their transactions with due regard to their capital; that their books must always be open for official inspection, and altogether that their business methods must be more conservative. It is now alleged that these regulations, instead of improving the situation, have impaired it. The bankers declare that to enforce such restrictions now, when the quarterly settlement of accounts is pending, would check the return of confidence and otherwise injure the situation. They therefore ask that the enforcement of the new system shall be delayed until after the close of the year by which time they expect that things will have resumed their normal condition.

There is no other news from Shanghai this morning, and it may therefore be assumed that the remedial measures attributed to the Viceroy and the Taotai were correctly stated and that the crisis of the situation has passed.

From Chientao comes a curious piece of intelligence. It is to the effect that owing to the efforts of Chinese local officials, a feeling of apprehension has been engendered among the Korean settlers. They have been led to believe that an invasion of the region by Japanese troops is imminent, and by way of preparation they have instituted a species of conscription, the result being that every ten households furnishes one man to form a contingent of defensive troops. Side by side with this intelligence comes news that the same Koreans are now regretting the arrangement made prior to the annexation of Korea; namely, the arrangement which hands them over to Chinese jurisdiction in consideration of being allowed to settle anywhere they please throughout the district. They are endeavouring to have this arrangement amended; an attitude which is difficult to reconcile with their alleged preparations to resist a Japanese invasion.

IN MEMORIAM OF PRINCE ITO.

On the 26th instant, the first anniversary of the death of Prince Ito is to be marked by a grand ceremonial at the grave in Omori. The place of sepulture has now assumed the character of a park measuring nearly 2 acres and completely surrounded by a stone fence. More than a thousand trees, many of them special favourites of the deceased, have been planted in this park, and among them are several torii of granite or bronze, the largest standing twenty feet high and having been presented by the Seiyu-kai. Two of the bronze lanterns are old castings which were particularly admired by the Prince and which have been presented by Marquises Inouye and Katsura.

We take this opportunity of mentioning that there seems to have been no truth in the report recently published to the effect that the Sorokaku, the well-known villa erected by Prince Ito, had been sold to a Yokohama millionaire for the paltry sum of two thousand yen. We gather that the villa is now in the occupation of the deceased Prince's family.

THE FINANCIAL CRISIS IN SHANGHAI.

Saturday, October 22.

It is a little difficult to follow the steps taken for relieving the financial situation in China. The difficulty arises mainly from the fact that the exertions made by different officials are not clearly indicated as either independent or combined. Thus the latest telegrams say that the Taotai of Shanghai has applied to the Central Government for a grant of 4 million Taels, and that the Viceroy has practically concluded arrangements with the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank for a loan of 3 million Taels repayable in six years. If these measures be cumulative, it would appear that the relief required amounts to 7 million Taels, which is a larger sum than anything indicated by previous accounts. Meanwhile Viceroy Chang is evidently doing everything in his power to ease the situation. He is said to be holding frequent consultations with leading Chinese merchants, and the general feeling is that the trouble will be effectually dealt with.

Monday, October 24.

The Viceroy of the Two Kiang is still in Shanghai, and is said to be busily engaged devising means to alleviate the situation and to provide against the recurrence of such crises. His Excellency, with the advice of the financiers and business men of Shanghai, has elaborated a body of thirteen regulations, of which the three most important are telegraphically reported to be, first, that the Taotai shall superintend the principal officials of the Chamber of Commerce and of the banks and shall have competence to investigate the state of the banks' funds; secondly, that the managers of Chinese banks shall not be at liberty to open stores on their own account; and, thirdly, that the Taotai shall have the right to impose limits upon the transactions of the banks, such limits to be in due proportions to the funds at the banks' disposal.

Meanwhile the measures of relief that are being taken appear to be numerous. Thus the telegram reports that the Chinese Chamber of Commerce has negotiated with the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank a loan of 2 million taels, the Viceroy and the Taotai guaranteeing the transaction. Further, the Central Government has borrowed a sum of 1 million taels from the Specie Bank, and out of that total 300,000 taels have already been paid over in Shanghai. Other minor steps are spoken of, and the upshot is that a feeling of confidence is gradually returning and it is thought that there will be no recurrence of panic.

Wednesday, October 26.

The Hochi Shimbun has a telegram which contradicts previous statements as to the provenance of funds for relieving the tension in the Shanghai money market. Hitherto the Specie Bank and the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank have been freely spoken of as prepared to come to the assistance of the merchants, but according to the above telegram, aid is to be obtained from Chinese quarters solely. Thus it is alleged that in the sequel of long conferences between the Viceroy and the Taotai, arrangements have been made for borrowing 2 million Taels from the Chinese Savings Banks, 2 millions from private capitalists and 3 millions from the Bank of China, another sum of 3 millions being obtained by the issue of bonds. This makes 10 millions in all, and that amount being considered ample to solve the difficulty, the Viceroy has left Shanghai.

THE CHINESE CONSTITUTION.

An interesting scene was witnessed in the Chinese Senate on the 19th instant. It is not exactly clear what routine of procedure was observed. From the telegram we learn only that the Chief Secretary reported the receipt of a numerous signed petition in favour of the immediate opening of a national assembly. In ordinary circumstances the items of such a report could not become a subject of immediate discussion unless they were placed on the order of the day in the sequel of an urgency motion. Whether that course was adopted we cannot tell, but it is at all events certain that the petition was discussed then and there. Naturally it attracted great attention and an animated debate took place, the evident tendency of the Senate being in favour of the petition. Ultimately, however, it was not placed upon the order of the day, but was left to be dealt with in the usual sequence of events. Nevertheless the treatment it received is said to have greatly strengthened the hands of its advocates, and there is further news that all the Viceroy's throughout the Empire are in favour of the immediate opening of parliament and of the appointment of a responsible Cabinet. Hankow seems to be the centre of the movement on the part of high provincial officials, for Viceroy Jui is said to have been entrusted with the conduct of the agitation. This news about the Viceroy's requires much confirmation, for it is evident that the opening of a national assembly would have the effect of greatly curtailing the powers they now exercise. The all important question of finance, for example, instead of being left as it is at present virtually under the complete control of the nineteen Satraps, would immediately be brought within the purview and scrutiny of parliament.

THE RAILWAY LOAN QUESTION.

It was not to be supposed that the representatives of the Occidental Powers would tamely submit to the tearing up of the written promise given by the late Chang Chih-tung with regard to the borrowing of money for the construction of railways in the Yangtze valley. Neither was it to be supposed that the active agents of the western financiers would wait until the new Minister of Communications committed himself to some declaration of an i-loan policy, as he had been expected to do after his arrival in Peking. We are not surprised therefore to learn by telegram that these gentlemen have anticipated any such action on Mr. Tang's part, and have addressed to him a note indentique, requiring that the engagement given by the late Mr. Chang Chih-tung shall be carried out, and insisting that the policy subsequently enunciated by Mr. Sheng, being in distinct violation of the original agreement, shall be set aside. The telegram adds that this note was written in the German language. Of course no special significance attaches to that fact, but it is a decidedly curious feature of a situation so vitally affecting the interests of the Yangtze valley.

THE RIVER IMPROVEMENT COMMITTEE.

Our readers are aware that the Cabinet has appointed a committee comprising fifty members for the purpose of investigating matters relating to the control and improvement of rivers. Among the members are many noted publicists and experts, and it is evident that the Government contemplates the adoption of really drastic measures for the purpose of permanently averting calamities such as that which recently visited the country. The Committee held its first meeting at the Home Department on the 25th instant when an interesting speech was made by Baron Hirata, Minister of Home Affairs. He explained that in pre-Meiji days very effective measures of riverine control were in operation, each feudal chief making it a cardinal part of his duty to guarantee his fief against inundations which were as inconvenient to the Local Government as to the farmer themselves. But all these measures were taken independently by the different fiefs. There was nothing like uniformity of system or coöperation. After the Restoration, so many problems pressed for solution that this particular question received no thought until 1873, and even then it was put aside as one of the things that might be deferred. Not until 1887 was a grant of 1½ million yen made for riparian purposes; and in 1896 the first law bearing upon this subject was enacted under the name of Kasen-ho. This was followed in 1899 by the Sabo-ho, or law for the restraint of sand. Something much more thorough than any of these measures was evidently needed, but it had always to be remembered that Japan's difficulties were due in great part to her configuration. The area of her lowlands was not proportionate to that of her mountains, and the torrents pouring down from the latter could scarcely be fully contained by the former.

AN EDUCATIONAL QUESTION.

At a recent meeting of the heads of industrial schools throughout the Empire, the Minister of Education, Mr. Komatsubara, delivered an address the most important part of which was a reference to the growth of naturalistic philosophy among young people in Japan. The Minister denounced this tendency as utterly subversive of morality, and urged upon all those engaged in the education of young people to lose no opportunity of combating the spread of this pernicious doctrine. Probably the worst enemies of the Japanese race to-day are the book-sellers and the editors of periodicals and newspapers who, for the sake of producing salable articles, search out the most striking treatises and collect the most sensational material for translation into their pages or insertion in their columns. One longs to hear some great and strident voice raised to save Japan from drifting into the evil groove now followed by the feet of so many misguided persons in the West.

We observe in this context that the Chuo Shimbun publishes an article which aims at differentiating clearly between socialists on the one hand and nihilists and anarchists on the other. Evidently our contemporary believes that the Authorities do not keep this distinction sufficiently clearly before their eyes when they undertake to deal with the moral and ethical episodes of the time. The doctrine of socialism is held by many highly respectable and learned men. It is worthy of respect and investigation. But the agitators who, finding themselves out of food and raiment and without any prospect of getting either honestly, have recourse to preaching the subversal of all normal systems, are in reality nihilists and anarchists and the greatest care should be taken to distinguish them from genuine socialists.

THE INTERNATIONAL PRESS ASSOCIATION AND PRINCE TSAI HSUN.

An address of welcome presented on Sunday afternoon by the Hon. K. Minoura, President of the International Press Association of Japan, to H. H. Prince Tsai Hsun, Imperial Chinese Naval Envoy, is as follows:—

"May it please Your Imperial Highness:

"The International Press Association of Japan has the honour of hereby expressing its welcome to Your Imperial Highness on your visit to the capital of Japan. Being organized by Chinese, Japanese, European and American journalists, the International Press Association of Japan invariably endeavours to keep international sentiments harmonious, dissipate international misunderstandings, to foster international good understanding, and to promote international interests. Entertaining profound sympathy with China, one of the greatest Empires in the Far East, and a lively hope in her future, the international Press Association of Japan takes unusual pleasure in hereby expressing these sentiments to Your Imperial Highness.

"Believing that the peace in the Far East depends upon the cordial relations between China and Japan and that the welfare of the world largely depends upon peace in the Far East, the members of the International Press Association of Japan fervently hope that the relations between China and Japan may be on a footing of ever-increasing friendship. Consequently, it will be a source of unqualified congratulation for the sake of the world, should Your Imperial Highness' visit to Japan prove a step forward in this direction.

"May Your Imperial Highness' tour diffuse a brilliant light upon the civilization of the Far East and upon the peace of the world. The members of the International Press Association of Japan beg to present their hearty greeting to Your Imperial Highness and pray Your Imperial Highness' continued prosperity and good health."

THE OIL COMPANIES.

An attempt has been made by the Japanese oil companies to come to some arrangement with the Standard and the Rising Sun firms, but the representatives of the foreign companies naturally point out that their rivalry is world-wide, and that they cannot make any exception in Japan's favour. In consequence of this answer the Directors of the Hoden and the Nippon have decided to act independently of the Rising Sun and the Standard, and to compete for the command of the domestic market. This course will not be finally taken, however, until a few days longer have elapsed so that the situation may be more fully developed.

The rivalry between the two foreign oil companies is becoming keener and keener. Prices have now fallen to such a point that when all expenses are paid there remains only from 47 to 55 sen per gallon as the net price of the oil, which is obviously an impossible figure. One consequence is that the Hoden and Nippon Companies have been obliged to suspend their sales altogether. It is thought probable that as the time for laying in the winter stock of oil is now approaching advantage will be taken of these rates to make large purchases.

It is thought that this competition has now reached its acme. The Tiger Brand of the Standard Company which was quoted at 3.01 yen before the competition is now selling at 2.01, and the corresponding figures in the case of the Rising Sun's Tank oil are 3.21 and 2.21 yen. When from these amounts the total expenses, namely 1.81 yen, are subtracted, the remainder is obviously insufficient to pay first cost.

THE AUTUMNAL MANŒUVRES IN MANCHURIA.

A curious coincidence has occurred in Manchuria. The Japanese Military Authorities planned the Manœuvres of the Manchurian troops this autumn to take place in a certain district at a certain date, and the fact was duly intimated to the Chinese Authorities. But the Japanese intimation was crossed by one from China's side indicating that the same locality and the same date had been chosen by her for the autumnal manœuvres of a mixed brigade. As it would have been obviously dangerous to have two large bodies of Chinese and Japanese troops operating simultaneously in the same region, the Chinese abandoned their project temporarily.

A propos of the Japanese manœuvres in Manchuria a spy incident is reported to have occurred. When General Viscount Oshima reached Mukden for the purpose of attending the manœuvres, a suspicious looking Chinese subject was observed loitering about the railway precincts. He was apprehended by the Japanese police, and on examination he proved to be a spy employed by the Mukden Government to observe and to report upon the Japanese manœuvres. The man appears to be still in custody though the Chinese Authorities are said to have applied for his release.

AN INTERVIEW.

Mr. Shirani, head of the Civil Government of Kwantung, has just arrived in Shimonoseki and has undergone the usual process of interviewing. He is quoted as speaking in decidedly pessimistic terms of the relations between China and Japan in Manchuria. The conclusion of the Russo-Japanese alliance followed by the annexation of Korea has produced a most exciting effect upon Chinese sentiment, and that effect is reflected in all relations between the two peoples, Japanese and Chinese in Manchuria. In fact if Mr. Shirani's estimate be correct and if he is rightly reported, the Chinese are importing into their intercourse with the Japanese in the Three Eastern Provinces a temper which is very regrettable.

Referring to the loan of 10 million Taels—that is the amount said to have been stated by Mr. Shirani—contracted by the Viceroy of Mukden with an American syndicate, this Japanese official explains that there is talk of establishing an industrial bank in Manchuria and employing for its capital the sum derived from the loan, but it is thought to be more probable that the money will be devoted to meeting administrative outlays.

EARTHQUAKES.

Tokyo was visited by two exceptionally severe shocks of earthquake, one on the 24th instant at 11.50 a.m. the other on the 25th at 3.10 a.m. Both were horizontal motions, so that the peril attaching to them was comparatively small, but they nevertheless developed sufficient force to be alarming. It was remarked that the movement accompanying the first shock was felt with quite exceptional violence in the solid brick buildings usually known as the Mitsubishi block. In these buildings an earthquake of ordinary dimensions is as a rule scarcely perceptible, but on the 24th instant the edifices swayed perceptibly. It does not follow of course that either of the above shocks was equally felt over a wide area, for the experiments of seismologists have shown that a great difference in sensibility to seismic disturbance exists between various localities of Tokyo. There is a possibility that Asama was the centre of force on the above occasions, for a state of unwonted activity is said to have been observed at that mountain for the past two or three days.

At 11.52 a.m. on the 24th instant a slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama, lasting one minute and twenty-one seconds. Another shock which was fairly severe took place at 3.22 a.m. on the 25th. This time the oscillations lasted 2 minutes and 15 seconds, and a very slight vibration was repeated twenty minutes later.

Another slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama at 10.14 a.m. on Wednesday, lasting one minute and twenty-seven seconds. The oscillations were in a northerly and southerly direction.

THE NEW COMMERCIAL CODE.

On the 22nd instant two Secretaries of the Department of Justice attended a meeting of the Popular Party's Special Committee for the purpose of explaining the amendments which the Diet will be asked to make in the Commercial Code. The most important of these changes appear to be the following:—Hereafter managing directors, directors and auditors of companies will be held individually and collectively responsible for any losses incurred by a company owing to mismanagement or dishonesty. In the matter of insurance the present law provides that by whomsoever a life insurance policy be taken out, the money cannot be paid on the death of the insured to any one save a member of the deceased's family. This will now be changed, and it will be lawful for the money to be paid direct to the person in whose favour the policy has been written or to whom it has been hypothecated. The third change relates to the responsibility of endorsers of a bill. Much of the troublesome procedure which has now to be followed will be abbreviated. The fourth change is that hypothecated goods may be taken delivery of in sections and not necessarily in their entirety.

THE NEW FACTORY LAW.

An idea gains ground that the Government's new draft of factory law will fare ill at the hands of the Diet. It may not be rejected en bloc, but it will be amended to such an extent as to become invertebrate. When all is said and done Japanese manufactures do not seem able to reconcile themselves yet to the abolition of night-work even by gradual processes. They are said to calculate that by closing their factories during the night their production would be diminished by 50 per cent., to say nothing of the increased cost of working. At present the amount of capital involved in spinning factories is 80 million yen, and in the present state of the money market the country cannot afford to sink any larger sum in that class of enterprise. Hence the effect of ceasing night-work would be that whereas the present production of 2 million bales leaves about 300 thousand for export, the knocking off of night work would cut down the total production to considerably less than even the domestic demand.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

The approach of each session of the Diet is invariably marked by a crop of rumours representing a certain collision between the Seiyu kai and the Cabinet. This year is no exception to the rule. Tokyo journals predict confidently that the Seiyu-kai will attack the Ministry in connection with the latter's financial policy, the view taken by the great Party being that the Government's programme of refraining from all debts and confining its operations strictly within the limits of the States' normal income, is behind the times and cannot but impede the country's material progress. This spirit of opposition showed itself very distinctly at a recent meeting of Seiyu-kai's supporters in Toyama prefecture. They voted unanimously that the Government's methods are unconstitutional and that its negative policy is not in keeping with the spirit of the time.

We read in the Shogyo Shimpo that the steamers of the Toyo Kisen Company have fallen upon better days. The S.S. Chiyo Maru, which arrived in Yokohama yesterday, carried 600 passengers and 2,000 tons of goods, producing a gross revenue of 120,000 yen. Such earnings are very much out of the common. It is expected that the Tenjo Maru which leaves the other side on the 1st of November will be equally fortunate, and that when the steamship service is linked up with the Western Pacific Railway still better results will be obtained. The question now to be decided, according to our contemporary, is whether these steamers should devote themselves mainly to carrying passengers or goods. This matter is now under debate, and it is expected that the decision will have an important bearing upon the maritime carrying trade of the Pacific.

Japanese newspapers state that the chances of an amicable settlement of the Toyo S.S. Company's claim against the Hoden Oil Company have almost disappeared. The latter concern pleads that owing to the competition in the oil market it finds itself in much too embarrassed a position to think of entertaining any demands like that of the Toyo S.S. Company. In these circumstances it is thought that the projected meeting of the two Companies' Directors next month will not take place.

It is stated that the officials of the Railway Board have decided to abolish third-class carriages and to compose the trains in future with first-class and second-class only. For this purpose certain improvements are to be effected in the carriages, and the second class fares will be slightly reduced, those of the first class remaining as before. It appears to us that this change will make a considerable increase in the revenue derived from railways.

The amalgamation of the Katsura River Hydro-Electric Power Company and the Denki Seizo Kaisha, which has long been talked of, is now an accomplished fact. The two companies join hands on perfectly equal terms, and Mr. Amenomiya becomes President of the new concern, of which the Board of Directors consists of the whole of the previous two Boards. The new company will go by the name of the Katsuragawa Denryoku Kaisha.

A memorial service to commemorate the first anniversary of the death of this eminent jurist was held at the Tsukiji Cathedral on the 22nd instant. A great number of eminent Japanese attended and the service was conducted by the Very Reverend Father Everard.

It is stated that Marquis and Marchioness Matsukata will celebrate their golden wedding in the middle of November.

On the 23rd instant the Japanese residents of Port Arthur, military and civilian, organized a celebration to commemorate the anniversary of the first opening of the harbour to commerce. The telegraph says that the affair was a great success, and that it may be taken as evidence of the importance attaching to the opening of the port.

We have been repeatedly asked whether any organization exists in Tokyo for taking charge of parcels and forwarding them to their destinations abroad. It may therefore prove a convenience to our readers to know that there is such an organization, namely, the Tokyo Branch of the Nippon Yusen Kaisha. Its office is at No. 1, Hakozaicho Shichome, Nihonbashi-ku, and its telephone numbers are Naniwa 910, 1407 and 3710. If a communication be addressed to that office, carriers will be sent to the applicant's residence to take charge of the parcel and forward it to its destination.

Just this time 3 years ago 5-per cent. Japanese State Bonds were selling in the open market for 87. To-day the 4-per cents. are quoted at 93, having fallen in the past few days from 95. It is a striking contrast, and it constitutes a strong practical evidence of the success of Marquis Katsura's policy.

We have received from the Mikimoto Pearl Store a most attractive Looklet containing pictures of various particularly seductive articles of jewellery offered to a discriminating public by that well known firm. Needless to say that pearls constitute a prominent feature. Many of the designs show great taste and we can well imagine that the jewellery must prove almost irresistible to the fair sex.

The affairs of the Soy Company have at length been settled. Its debts amounted to 5 million yen and these have been wholly discharged by heavy sacrifices on the part of the Directors and Promoters. Of course the shareholders lose all the money they have put up, namely 3½ millions, and have further been obliged to contribute a sum of 130,000.

THE PAYMENT OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT.

FOUR years ago the House of Commons passed one of those academic non-committal resolutions which from time to time serve to relieve, to the general satisfaction, the tension that normally pervades the Mother of Parliaments. The question which provoked this formal expression of opinion was the advisability or otherwise of the payment of members of Parliament; and on this question an overwhelmingly Liberal House, fresh from a sweeping victory at the polls, pronounced in the affirmative, by 348 votes to 110. Since then the question has been buried, so to speak, under a number of graver and more urgent issues—most of which, it may be remarked in passing, are still as far from settlement as they were four years ago. In December of last year, however, the House of Lords added (in Labourite eyes) yet another to its long list of iniquities by affirming, in a decision now famous as the Osborne judgment, that it was illegal for Trades Unions to impose a levy on their members for the payment of Parliamentary representatives. Against this decision the Labour Party, with their Socialist allies, are up in arms. The funds for the support of the Labour M.P.'s have hitherto been furnished by the various Trades Unions, and if this source of revenue be interdicted, the number of representatives which this section of the Coalition party can in future afford must be considerably reduced. At first sight, therefore, it would appear that the Labourites have a grievance. However, the question has a wider bearing. It may be considered on its merits, as a proposition for debate—in which case it certainly provokes the greatest differences of opinion: or it may be considered in the light of its political potentialities, and its more immediate effects on the fortunes of the two great parties. In the respect, it has already given rise to a curious divergence of opinion, which, in view of the present situation, invests the whole subject with an importance it could not otherwise assume.

The question whether members of the national legislative assembly should receive payment for their services has already been settled, in practice, in various parts of the world. We believe that members of the American House of Representatives receive as much as £1,000 a year from the coffers of the State; while, of the self-governing colonies in the British Empire, Victoria and New South Wales, for example, pay the members of their Legislative Assemblies £300 per annum and provide them with a free pass on all Government railways and tramways in the State. Nevertheless the arguments against the payment of members, even if they receive no confirmation from resultant abuses in these cases, lose none of their cogency. It is claimed that the payment of members reacts prejudicially upon the tone and prestige of Parliament, that it leads to the introduction into public life of that undesirable element, the professional politician; that with professionalism in politics there creep in all sorts of abuses, akin to patronage and corruption; and that, the system of payment once introduced, it is impossible to prevent its spreading to municipal and other bodies. In the case of the United Kingdom these arguments may fitly be reinforced by that of additional expense, for which the country is ill prepared. Assuming the amount of remuneration for each member of the Imperial Parliament to be no more than that given in the case of the legislative assemblies of the Australian colonies, the annual expenditure on this account would reach some £200,000; while if the practice was extended to the urban and county councils, and came to include the election expenses of each member—which, with the enhanced competition for the sweets of office, would show a continual upward tendency—the total expenditure which would have to be met by the country would run into millions. As the London Spectator observed recently, in discussing this point, "it is not the British way to let salaries of £300 a year go a-begging." A propos of which most just remark, a correspondent interested in the question inserted an advertisement in a few of the London papers, inviting applications for "an appointment of a political nature, candidates to be accustomed to public speaking, salary £300 a year." "Within 48 hours," writes this correspondent, "there were over 800 applicants for the job; and the imagination boggles at the number who would apply for Parliamentary salaries if there were 670 appointments thrown open to competition, under all the conditions of publicity and excitement that accompany a General Election." It would certainly be the case that, amid all this political pot-hunting, the sound British tradition of government by "an honorary body representing the unbiassed commonsense of the nation" would go by the board, and the House of Commons would lose its pride of place among the legislative bodies of the world.

As to the possible effects of the situation arising out of the Osborne Judgment on the political fortunes of the Unionist party, it may be observed at once that a sharp cleavage of opinion already exists in the Unionist press as to the attitude to be taken up towards this question. On the one hand it is contended that resistance to the principle of the payment of members as the safest way out of the impasse created by the Judgment will antagonize the working classes and seriously prejudice the prospects of the Unionist cause at the next General Election. On the other hand, those who are not in favour of the principle marshal their unanswerable arguments, and urge that, for the Unionist party, which has always been understood to be opposed to the payment of members, to make a sacrifice of this principle on the altar of utility would be condemned as a discreditable manoeuvre by the very classes whom it is designed to conciliate. Thus, on the one side, we find so vigorous a defender of the Unionist faith as Mr. F. E. SMITH, writing to The Times in the following strain:—

Is it a part of Unionist policy that there should be no working men in the House of Commons except such as are subsidized by one of the great parties? It is, I think, clear that such a view would be unworthy, narrow, and foredoomed to failure. How, then, are such men to be maintained if the Osborne judgment, which we are determined to support, is to survive the assault upon the great principles which it declares? An honest attempt to answer this question has led me to a conclusion which I dislike, but which, nevertheless, after long reflection, I believe to be inevitable. It is that the payment of members is the only alternative to the intolerable system which the Osborne judgment has ended. There are many and grave objections to the payment of members, but there is, on the other hand, this overwhelming merit, that it safeguards the independence of Parliament by making the representative the servant of the country, and not that of a caucus or a union. If this change were accompanied by a measure, in itself very reasonable and long overdue, placing the returning officers' charges upon the rates, no burden would be left which it would not be very reasonable for the Socialist Party to raise by voluntary effort.

I am myself a reluctant convert to these views, but I contemplate with grave anxiety the prospect of a blunt non possumus in Unionist circles to the claim that an unsubsidized working man shall have access to the House of Commons.

On the other hand, Mr. ARTHUR LEE M.P., as emphatically raises the cry of "no surrender":—

Payment of members may be forced upon us by a Radical-Socialist majority, but it does not seem either necessary or seemly that Unionists should assist in the interment of one of the greatest and most beneficent of British Parliamentary traditions. They could only do so by repudiating their principles and swallowing their convictions. Nor would such a cynical exhibition of opportunism win them an ounce of gratitude from the Labour Party or the smallest advantage at the polls. Their attitude could be too justly satirized as a case of:—

"I could not love thee, dear, so much Loved I not office more."

The Socialists and trade union leaders are not so easily fooled. We can put up with their hostility, but we need not invite their contempt.

It seems to us that the question is one in which justice could be done by an examination of individual cases. If evidence was forthcoming that the chosen representative of any constituency was too narrowly circumstanced to support his position as a Member of Parliament with due dignity, the requisite provision should be made for him, not by the State, but by his constituency. Similarly, the election expenses of candidates should be paid, wherever, in the judgment of the returning officer, the candidates are not in a position to do so themselves. In this way individual cases of hardship could be met, while, at the same time, the best traditions of the Mother of Parliaments could be maintained.

Twenty-six stallions of American breed, which have been bought by the Horse administration Bureau, arrived at Yokohama on Tuesday afternoon by the steamer Kamo Maru. It is reported that some of these horses are valued at as much as 20,000/25,000 yen each.

THE REVOLUTION.

(CONTRIBUTED)

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 25)

THE reports of internal dissension among the organizers of the revolution in Portugal, when (as it were) the blood shed to bring about the change is hardly dry, suggest the most sinister omens of future unrest. It had been hoped that with the downfall of the Monarchy, and the adoption of Republican institutions, the long disturbed country would settle down into something like contentment. The telegram published in our issue of yesterday, however, points to the possibility of a Ministerial crisis, and when due allowance is made for the vigorous censorship which has been maintained not only since the outbreak, but prior to it, the bare announcement that "notable" dissension exists among the members of the new Government may be taken to imply more than appears on the surface. It has been said of the French Republic that what Paris thinks to-day, France will think to-morrow. So far this has been the case with the upheaval in Portugal. The government of Lisbon has for some time been entirely in the hands of men of avowed Republican sympathies, and the control of the capital's affairs, it must be admitted, has been attended with a conspicuous success which has served as an excellent réclame for the friends of change. This success of the Republicans in municipal administration has undoubtedly been a factor of no small importance in the revolution, inasmuch as it did much to win the confidence of the country as a whole. But if the Republican structure becomes at the outset a house divided against itself, that feeling of confidence will speedily disappear and the affairs of the nation will reduce themselves to chaos. For the best friend of Portugal can hardly claim that, at any time since the assassination of King CARLOS, things have been far removed from that unhappy state. Ministry has succeeded ministry in monotonous rotation—there have been five such changes in the space of the past two years—without any perceptible improvement in the country's administration or in the condition of its poorer inhabitants. Nor can the responsibility for that sorry state be justly laid at the door of the deposed King or of his predecessor, though persistent attempts have been made to do so. "It is not the Royal House of Portugal," remarks a London journal, "but her politicians and her caricature of representative government that have caused her poverty and backwardness. . . . Corruption and speculation are universal; nor has the Republican Party so far escaped the stigma of venality which has lain so black upon the other leading figures in Portuguese politics." On the one hand there are the Progressists, with clerical and conservative elements; on the other, the Regenerados, who correspond, in the main, to the Liberals in British politics.

The Ministry which fell on the 5th inst. represented a Coalition of moderate men from both parties, but it nevertheless proved too weak to resist the attack of the advanced Regenerados, or Republicans. For the time, indeed, the triumph of the latter appears complete. The bishops, at the one extreme of political opinion, have signified their adherence to the new Government, and the Socialists, or Nationalists, at the other, have been placated by the repeal of the recently devised legislative restrictions on the freedom of the press. The Republic has been accepted in the various Portuguese colonies, and the late King is a fugitive on foreign soil. The new President, Senhor BRAGA, has a high reputation as a literateur and as a man of just and pacific disposition. Certainly, then, the authors of the upheaval have everything in their favour. It remains for President BRAGA and his colleagues to prove their statesmanship. The future of their country is in their hands: it is for them to make or mar it. While there is no reason to anticipate any change in Portugal's foreign policy—a contingency which, in view of the fact that she is a colonial, as well as an European Power, would impart to the revolution an international significance—any lack of stability in her government, or any perpetuation of internal unrest, must be a source of anxiety to her friends.

THE PRIME-MINISTER'S SPEECH AND THE PRESS.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 26.)

ON the whole the tone of the Tokyo press is hostile to the Prime-Minister's speech delivered on the 23rd instant at the meeting of the Clearing Houses. The methods of criticism differ slightly, but the general tendency is to doubt the feasibility of continuing the conversion programme. It is pointed out that whereas no little difficulty was experienced in inducing capitalists to come into the 4-per-cent. scheme even when the bonds were quoted at 95, to talk of continuing the scheme now that the quotation has fallen to the neighbourhood of 93 seems extravagant. Notice is, however, taken of the fact that the Minister of Finance qualified his statement of procedure. He spoke of a gradual programme adapted to circumstances, which form of speech was evidently dictated by a desire to refrain from giving any definite pledge. One paper, the Jiji Shimpō, construes this announcement of gradual procedure as a change of programme, but surely the Jiji Shimpō does not suppose that any Minister of Finance binds himself to undertake consolidation at a fixed date in the future and on fixed terms? Officialdom has its limitations of potentiality, and the most that could have been expected from Marquis KATSURA was a guarded announcement precisely such as he actually made. If no favourable opportunity presents for undertaking conversion at profitable rates, the operation will be deferred. That is all. To defer does not necessarily mean to abandon, but merely means that the state of the market will be consulted. No ordinarily prudent financier can promise more. An interesting fact is that our confident contemporaries brush aside the views of leading bankers like Mr. TOYOKAWA and Baron SHIBUSAWA as though they were not worthy of a moment's attention. The Nippon is conspicuous in this respect. It charges these bankers with acting the part of sycophants and merely echoing the opinions expressed by the Premier and the Governor of the Bank of Japan. The same paper girds very strongly against the assertion that the dawn of better days has come upon the horizon. That estimate excites our contemporary's ridicule, but we observe that the Nippon makes no allusion to its own prediction that the Premier's declaration of policy would drive down the share market—a prediction which has been diametrically contradicted by events.

Another point of tolerably general criticism is that one year's funds only are provided to meet expenditures of an essentially continuing character. If any of our readers will take the trouble to look back, he will remember that, at one time, a favourite theme of condemnation by certain journals was precisely the converse of the above criticism. The Government was then abused for committing the country to long programmes of expenses spread over a number of years. We ourselves sympathise with the latter view much more than we do with the former. It appears to us that the only prudent plan for a financier is to limit his outlays to the income actually in sight. The prophetic character of Japanese budgets has always been, in our opinion, a defect. Marquis KATSURA's plan is simply to say:—"Here is so much money actually available, and here is an enterprise that ought to be undertaken. We propose to commence the enterprise with the idea of finishing it within a given number of years, but we reserve the power of suspending or postponing it should financial convenience dictate such a course." Evidently this policy has a defect. Suspension or postponement of an already commenced work may mean that a part of the money hitherto spent upon it is lost. But it should easily be within the competence of skilled engineers to adapt their operations so as to avert any inconvenience of that kind. Altogether the journalistic criticisms evoked by Marquis KATSURA's speech are very far from convincing.

PICTORIAL EXHIBITION IN UYENO.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 27.)

THE Pictorial Exhibition organized in Uyeno Park under the auspices of the Department of Education is well worthy of a visit. There are paintings in pure foreign style, in hybrid style and in pure Japanese style. As for the first, there is not much to be said except that they show marked progress. One attractive feature is that they are much less pretentious than they have hitherto been. Modesty is always charming, especially in a tyro; and it can scarcely be claimed that in the domain of Western art the Japanese have emerged sensibly from the tyro stage. At first there was an obtrusive disposition to select imposing and complicated motives; but that has yielded to emphatic self-restraint, and instead of broad oppressive canvases with extensive subjects inadequately treated, we have sober little sea-scapes and land-scapes, often very pleasing. In portraiture, also, there are some distinctly good essays, and it will scarcely be rash to say that a field lies before Japanese artists in this direction. Their old-time portraits being painted on silk, there was almost insuperable difficulty in modelling convincingly. But good likenesses were often obtained and there was no lack of idealistic emphasis. It may well be that Japan's modern artists are destined to make a mark in this branch of their metier, working with oils on canvas. Statuary gives even more striking earnest of success. One naturally expects that the descendants of UNKEI, KAIKEI and the mediæval giants of the chisel should possess inherited genius for this class of accomplishment, and though the sculptors of present-day Japan are obliged to dissociate themselves from their old motives, eschewing Alhrats, Bodhisatvas et hoc genus omne, they are already evolving worthy substitutes and treating them with success. As to the hybrid school, no salient progress has to be noted. WATANABE SEITEI's methods, carried to their zenith a dozen years ago, have undergone no change since then, nor have they found any greater master than the late HASHIMOTO GAHO. It is in the school of pure Japanese art that the most interesting features are observable. Attention is attracted, first, by the dimensions and shape of the pictures. There is a distinct tendency to break away from alcove restrictions and to cater for a wide range of utilities. Folding screens, friezes, wall-panels and other objects of large dimensions are conspicuous. The artists have evidently awaked to the fact that in transitional Japan fashions have to be suggested as well as ministered to. Buyers who would not be attracted by a solitary picture or even by a triptych may well be tempted by a screen or a frieze. There is always the consideration that householders who have alcoves and who are happily opulent enough to furnish them strikingly, prefer an inferior work by an old master to a superior by a new. But in the case of other decorative objects the supply is so small and the units are so costly that the modern painter is in a more promising position. Passing from this striking departure in shape and dimensions to the painting itself, a visitor to the Exhibition will note that there is a very marked emancipation from the tyranny of outlines. All the productions of the old Chinese School, as copied by the Sesshu Academy of Japan, were disfigured by sharply lined outlines, such as are not to be found in any realm of nature. KANO MOTONOBU was the first to eschew that error. He passed at once from salient contours to masses that defined themselves; and the change was delightful. But it is only now that the modern artists of Japan have appreciated MOTONOBU's genius in this respect. Some are still in the trammels of the old error, but the great majority of the pictures shown at Uyeno to-day are free from that blemish. Another very striking feature is full utilization of the exceptional facilities that silk offers for effects of aerial perspective and chiaroscuro. These are the features which, next to strength of line, constitute the special charm of Japanese paintings, and they are conspicuous in the Uyeno display. Therefore there is reason to applaud the exhibition for astute use of the old and intelligent deference to the new.

IMPENDING PROBLEMS AND "THE GRAMMAR OF RUIN."

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 28.)

SEVERAL of our Japanese contemporaries have published reports, telegraphed from London, to the effect that the Constitutional Conference, which began its sittings some four months ago, has agreed in principle to a settlement. The terms of that settlement are alleged to involve a recasting of the Constitution and a species of Home-rule all-round; but the possibility is thoughtfully intimated that the Conference may not agree on the details. We may remark, in passing, that the difficulty in agreeing to details is more likely to be found in the House of Commons than in the Council of Eight; but as to the broad outlines of the alleged settlement, as given above, it would be as well to await confirmation from other sources. If there is any foundation for the wholesale-devolution report, it would explain the remarkable discourse on Home-rule-all round which Mr. BIRRELL was put up to deliver at the Eighty Club in August. There is a species of Home Rule to which Englishmen as a whole—leave alone the Loyalists of Ulster—would never agree; a Home Rule which could hardly be anything but the first Act in a Drama of Imperial Dissolution. Fortunately, however, the term is an elastic one, quite consistent with a slight enlargement of the scope of the Local Government Act; and a compromise on such lines might conceivably satisfy Mr. REDMOND and his ex-Fenian friends—at least for a time. As to the "recasting of the Constitution," we should be disposed to regard that as a hyperbole for "definition of the powers of the Upper House in matters of finance"—a definition which would probably point to that blessed path which the perplexed politician is so wont to pursue—a via media between the claims of contending parties. But quite apart from the Veto Conference—as it has been loosely called—and any settlement that may, or may not, have been reached, there are several questions of more than ordinary importance which press for speedy solution. In fact, as has been observed, in the excitement aroused by these questions the House of Lords seems to have been forgotten altogether. There is the awkward situation arising out of the Osborne Judgment, which may yet eventuate in a revolt of the Labour Party; there is the steady pressure of public opinion in the Dominions in the direction of Tariff Reform with Inter-imperial Preference, as an instrument for unification of the Empire; there is the Irish Sword of Damocles hanging over the Ministerial head; and last, but by no means least, is the naval question, to which Mr. BA'FOUR's Edinburgh speech and Lord CHARLES BERESFORD's open letter to Mr. ASQUITH have drawn fresh attention, and to which sundry verbose indiscretions on the part of the younger members of the Cabinet have added a certain piquancy. In this direction Mr. LLOYD GEORGE and his fidus Achates, the HOME SECRETARY, have been airing their views in a manner which would seem to show that all is not for the best in the best of all possible Ministries. Liberal Governments in the past have steadfastly set their faces against the principle of a naval loan, as an evil departure from time-honoured traditions of British policy; and the present Liberal Government is no exception to the rule. Only a few days ago Mr. McKENNA vigorously denied the existence of any such intention on the part of the Government, and repudiated the suggestion put forward by the Unionist Leader that the condition and comparative strength of the Fleet were such as to necessitate recourse to a naval loan. On the other hand, the hot-heads of the Cabinet, led by the pushful solicitor from the Caernarvon Burghs, have been saying otherwise. "In the grammar of ruin," declared Mr. LLOYD GEORGE, in an interview which he confided to the redoubtable W. T. STEAD (who, by the way, is a persistent advocate of the two-keels-to-one policy), "there are three degrees: Positive, Protection; Comparative, Armaments; Superlative, War." Mr. GEORGE did not linger long over the first—its absurdity was probably as apparent to himself as it is to most people; but he unburdened himself to a considerable extent on the subject of armaments. After complaining that out of every million of revenue he raised, half a million had to go in armaments, he observed regretfully—"We cannot disarm in the midst of an armed camp." Britain had piped to other nations, but they would not dance to her music. On the contrary, they had stopped their ears to the toot of the Chancellor's penny-tin-whistle, and had set themselves to the construction of Dreadnoughts with renewed vigour. Then followed, mirabile dictu, those very arguments for the maintenance of British naval supremacy that we are accustomed to read in "Jingo" Unionist journals, in service publications, and in the organs of such iniquitous associations as Navy Leagues. Of course they were duly interlarded, for the benefit of Radical readers, with pious expressions of regret concerning this terrible game of beggar-my-neighbour at which the nations insisted on playing; but all these carefully arranged preliminaries were merely intended to lead up to a climax. The consummation of Mr. GEORGE'S homily, immediately prefaced with the quotation of that good old adage—"He that goes a-borrowing goes a-sorrowing," was judiciously, almost reverently, wrapped up in these words:—We still have the untouched reserve of a naval loan—a resource of which our competitors have long since had to avail themselves." Now, as all the world knows, Mr. LLOYD GEORGE is Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Mr. REGINALD MCKENNA is First Lord of the Admiralty. History is familiar with the spectacle of a First Lord knocking for funds—whether ordinary or extraordinary—at the door of the Treasury; but it is some thing new to have an over-burdened Chancellor coming forward with an offer (cautiously expressed, of course) to assist in the raising of a special loan on that most wasteful of all objects—ships of the line. What is the inner meaning of this strange proceeding? We fancy that the explanation is not far to seek. Thanks to the costly course of "Social Reform" on which this most modest of Governments has embarked, there will be a very big bill to foot next year—a bill, moreover, which gives promise of continual increase, while its popularity is not enhanced by the inquisitorial character of Mr. GEORGE'S land-Taxation scheme. Meanwhile the country will insist on a further large addition to the already swollen naval estimates. The bulk of the expenditure on the "contingent" Dreadnoughts of last July will have to be met in the coming financial year; and there is a general demand for six or eight new ships to be included in the 1911-12 programme. In these circumstances it is not unnatural that Mr. LLOYD GEORGE should be anticipating, with some anxiety, the roar of Radical-Socialist protest which will inevitably greet his next Budgetary statement. If some of the cost of armaments now looming ahead could be borne by a naval loan, the Chancellor's relief would be easy to understand. Verily, adversity makes strange bedfellows. The breezy Lord CHARLES, and the indefatigable secretaries of the Imperial Maritime League—not to mention the 350 distinguished signatories of the Hundred-Million-Loan petition to the PRIME MINISTER—must be congratulating themselves on assistance from an unexpected quarter. At all events, the Session which is to open in a few weeks gives earnest of strenuous and fateful debate. However strong the natural desire to avoid another General Election before the Coronation, it is difficult to see how an appeal to the country can much longer be deferred.

WRECK OF "TIMES" BUILDING IN LOS ANGELES.

(CONTRIBUTED.)

The wreck of the Times building in Los Angeles throws into vivid light the dangerous side of the American Labour situation. Few people who are not connected with this great struggle, either as employers or employees, realize in even the slightest degree, the intensity of the questions involved. Two vivid pictures serve to present the whole matter; first, this awful crime in which a great building has been blown up, with its entire force of over 100 employees; the building and its $500,000 worth of machinery—a total value of over a million dollars—utterly destroyed; nineteen lives lost and twenty other workers seriously injured—an awful affair, for which some one must pay in awful punishment, or government itself must be a failure. This is one picture. The other follows: Marshall Field's big store in Chicago is one of the greatest and finest retail establishments in the world. Its owner was originally a poor man. But when he died he left an estate of $223,000,000.00. Marshall Field lived in every luxury that man's heart could desire, including, it is asserted, his mistress and illegitimate children. But thousands of his employees had not income enough to properly clothe, feed and educate their children. At the time of Marshall Field's death estimates published by serious conservative citizens stated that at least 1,000 of his girl employees had fallen to moral wreck and lives of infamy, due almost wholly to the starvation wages to which he ground them down. Yes, it is true, they could have left his employ and gone somewhere else to work—where? It is stated frankly that there are certain immense industrial establishments in Chicago to-day where a girl will not be permitted to continue work who insists on retaining her virtue.

The Los Angeles criminals must be hunted down and punished, we all agree. They have destroyed a million dollars' worth of property and nineteen lives. Marshall Field amassed 223 millions of dollars, at the sacrifice of a thousand souls—nobody was punished!

The above is not an attempt to justify for an instant the awful crime at Los Angeles. It is only written to illustrate the intensity and needs of the situation, of which the Los Angeles outrage is only one of the dramatic incidents.

In connection with all the columns and columns of details of this calamity printed by American newspapers, occurs a little paragraph many may have overlooked. It is the statement that the authorities of Los Angeles recently made "picketing" a crime, and arrested and sentenced men who persisted in it. Do you know what "picketing" means? Picketing is the simplest, most innocent form of fight with which a labour organization can oppose an employer. It consists in detailing men to stand on street corners, and, without threats or violence, request "strike-breakers," as they go and come, to resign their positions in the "strike" plant. It is an effective weapon. The immense Conkey printing establishment near Chicago was picketed for five years before it finally surrendered, during which time not a single assault, fight, or criminal offence occurred. But hundreds of "strike-breakers" were persuaded to leave Conkey's employ. As one of these men expressed it, "The situation simply became unendurable. I dreaded to go out of the house, and I could see those reproachful eyes in my sleep." The same process was at work in Los Angeles. It was successful in a measure. The owner of the Times, aided by his immense wealth and influence, has fought the unions bitterly for twenty years. When picketing was made a crime the last weapon was taken from the latter. In other words the city had tried the case and decided it in favour of the employer, without any hearing or arguments. Whether there be any connection between the two or not, it is still the fact that the awful calamity occurred almost as a sequel to the arrest of picketers.

Summing up the whole affair, the Los Angeles crime is only a vivid illustration of the fact that other methods than coercion must be found to deal with the labour situation in America, where over 50 per cent. of the labouring men belong to unions and over 90 per cent. of large employers to employers' Associations.

The situation in the United States has grown serious very rapidly during the last ten years. Ten years ago it was an axiom, generally accepted, that a man might buy for what prices he could secure merchandise and sell for the highest prices he could obtain; that he might form whatever partnerships he chose; might pay men what he could secure them for, and, if the men could do better, they, in turn, were free to go elsewhere. Every man was equally free to follow out this law to wherever it might lead. Theoretically, the matter appeared absolutely just and reasonable. But practically, it was becoming a tyranny worse than any absolute Monarchy in existence; until, as a famous American banker expressed the situation, "the absolute control of America was already in the hands of twelve men." The worst feature is that these powers of finance are not content with the immense fortunes already accumulated, but are using these facilities just as earnestly as ever to acquire more and still more, each year increasing the ratio at which they are able to grasp; until the masses of people are already wholly dependent on the facilities, markets, means of communication, etc., owned by these few.

The reason ex-President Roosevelt is so popular to-day, is not, as many think, due to personal magnetism, but because he is the leader of a tremendous movement of the people against the force of insatiable wealth, and the real issues in the United States to-day are not tariff or navy, imperial or domestic policy, but the old problem of liberty—of existence—for the man who works. It seems to be almost a choice between Anarchy, as illustrated by the Los Angeles outrage, or a higher phase of Socialism.

Most of us would be seriously offended if we were called Socialists and yet so serious has become the struggle between Consolidated capital and United Labour in the United States that the great masses of common people are ready to say: "If ideal Socialism will save us, then let us be Socialists." The briefest definition of Socialism, as they understand it, is a condition of society where the same law and privileges do not necessarily apply to the rich man which are extended to the poor man. The statement that this condition already prevails in no small degree in Great Britain would surprise many an Englishman, but it is true nevertheless, and whatever may be said to the contrary, and whatever the right or wrong of the case may be, that is the heart and centre of the doctrine known as Rooseveltianism—legal discrimination against the rich.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

Friday, October 21.

Bottom seems to have been reached except in the case of the oils, which are specially affected:

Saturday, October 22.

It was supposed on Friday the 21st instant that bottom had been reached in the share market, but Saturday showed the fallacy of that idea. Everything fell sharply, including the 4-per-cent. State securities which dropped to the level of 93.

Monday, October 24.

Considerable recovery was witnessed yesterday owing to the good effect produced by the Premier's speech at the meeting of the Clearing Houses, and to the bankers' endorsement of his policy.

Tuesday, October 25.

Prices were firm yesterday, with an upward tendency, but profit-taking sales caused cheapening in some cases.

Wednesday, October 26.

Prices were firm yesterday with an upward tendency. The oils were quite active. Rice is falling and that fact has a wholesome effect.

Thursday, October 27.

The market opened firm with an upward tendency on the forenoon of the 27th but profit-taking sales drove prices down in the afternoon. We append the quotations for December delivery:—

PRINCE ITO'S MEMORY AT HARBIN.

On the 26th instant a solemn and largely attended ceremony was held at Harbin to mark the anniversary of Prince Ito's assassination. The occasion was taken by Mr. Consul-General Kawakami to announce that all the preliminaries have been arranged for erecting a monument to the Prince on the spot where he fell, and that the liberal coöperation of the Russian Authorities have been secured.

PRINCE TSAI HSUN.

Prince Tsai Hsun and the naval mission of which he is the head, arrived in Yokohama on Sunday forenoon and were received with all the honours, the Japanese warships in harbour firing a salute and a detachment of blue-jackets being drawn up on the pier. The party proceeded to Tokyo, after having been greeted by the Governor of Kanagawa, the Mayor of Yokohama and a number of naval officers and leading citizens of Yokohama. The reception in Tokyo was even more brilliant. A large force of cavalry and infantry paraded at the station and an Imperial salute was fired in the Hibiya Park. We may mention that Prince Tsai Hsun is the younger brother of the present Prince Regent of China, that he is now in his 26th year and that he occupies the post of President of the Board of Naval Affairs. His Imperial Highness is accompanied by Admiral Sah Ching-pin and by twelve other high officials. The Tokyo newspapers publish photographs of the Prince and welcome him in very warm terms.

His Imperial Highness Prince Tsai Hsun was entertained at dinner by Marquis Katsura on the 24th instant. The Marquis spoke in very warm terms of the expediency of sincere friendship between China and Japan. He said that the two nations were of the same stock and used the same script, and that upon the nature of their relations the peace of the world largely depended. He trusted that his Imperial Highness' visit would tend to increase the mutual feeling of amity, and he promised to afford to the Prince every possible facility for seeing whatever Japan had to show.

Prince Tsai Hsun replied in almost identical terms. He expressed sincere gratitude for the hospitality extended to him, and he agreed that the two nations were related by consanguinity and bound together by a common script, and that a great responsibility devolved on them as guardians of peace in the East.

Prince Tsai Hsun, Chinese Naval Envoy, and suite comprising Admiral Sah Cheh-peng and several other naval experts, arrived at Yokohama on Sunday morning at 9 o'clock on the steamer Chiyo Maru, escorted by the warships Tsukuba and Takachiho which had received the steamer early in the morning off Tateyama. As soon as the steamer passed quarantine, the Prince and suite were taken aboard a torpedo-boat specially provided for the purpose, and landed at the Hatoba where a large welcome arch had been erected by the Municipality. A salute of twenty-one guns was fired by the warships in the harbour and fireworks were set-off at intervals. The students of the Yokohama Commercial and the Middle Schools, and the girls of the Girls' High School lined both sides of the street close to the Hatoba. The Yokohama Chamber of Commerce gave a reception to His Highness at the Yokohama Bankers' Association, before he took the train for Tokyo, when a beautiful floral-tribute and a pair of cloisonne vases were presented to the Prince by the Chamber of Commerce and the Municipality, respectively.

The Chinese Naval Envoy Prince Tsai Hsun who arrived in Tokyo on Sunday, will repair to the Imperial Palace at 11.50 a.m. to-day, and be received in audience by His Majesty, the Emperor in the Howo Hall. An Imperial luncheon will be given in his honour. Yesterday the First Order of Merit and the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun, with the Paulownia Flower, were conferred on the Prince, the First Order of Merit and the Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun, on Admiral Sah, and subordinate decorations on the rest of the suite.

Under the auspices of Baron Saito, Minister of the Navy, a dinner party was held in honour of Prince Tsai Hsun on Sunday evening at the Suikosha in Tsukiji, Tokyo. At 5.50 p.m. the Prince, accompanied by Mr. Nagasaki, Master of Ceremonies, arrived at the Suikosha, when His Highness was met at the entrance hall by Baron Saito, Admirals Togo, Ito, and Inouye. Not long after the Prince entered the reception-hall, a splendid feast was served to His Highness and the party of Chinese and Japanese dignitaries, numbering 121 in all. When the feast was at its height, Baron Saito, the host, proposed three cheers for the Emperor of China while the band played the Chinese anthem. Subsequently Prince Tsai Hsun proposed a toast, and called for three cheers for the Emperor of Japan, the Kimigayo being played by the band. The Minister of the Navy then presented an address of welcome on behalf of the Navy, to the effect that it would be a great honour to have the Japanese Navy personally inspected by His Highness, and he (the minister) was willing to afford all possible facilities in compliance with the Prince's request. The Prince replied to the above through Interpreter Hyo, returning thanks for the trouble the Minister of the Navy had taken, and stating that he would make full report to the Court of what he had studied in Japan, as well as make every effort towards the maintenance of peace in the East. When the feast came to an end, His Highness and suite were entertained with jugglery and cinematograph performances. The Prince returned to the Shiba Detached Palace at 9.20 p.m.

Prince Tsai Hsun inspected the Naval Department on Monday morning, accompanied by Admiral Sah, Minister Wong, and other members of his suite. Baron Saito, Minister of the Navy, Vice Admiral Ijuin, Chief of the Naval Headquarters, and other high officers acted as guides. At noon His Highness gave a luncheon party at the Shiba Detached Palace, entertaining Mr. Arakawa, Mayor of Yokohama, Count Matsukata, Baron Iwasaki, and others guests to the number of over 40. In the afternoon the Prince visited the Mercantile Marine School and Baron Iwasaki's villa at Fukagawa.

Prince Tsai Hsun repaired to the Imperial Palace at 11 a.m. on Tuesday and was received in audience by Their Majesties the Emperor and Empress in the Phoenix Hall. Luncheon was served for His Highness and suite in the Homei Hall, there being also present Prince Fushimi, Prince Higashi-Fushimi, Viscount Watanabe, Minister of the Imperial Household; Marquis Tokudaiji, the Grand Chamberlain; Marquis Katsura, the Premier; and Baron Saito, Minister of the Navy. On the same day, just before Prince Tsai Hsun proceeded to the Palace, His Majesty the Emperor had sent Grand Chamberlain Tokudaiji to the Shiba Detached Palace and decorated the Prince with the First Order of Merit and Grand Cordon of the Rising Sun with Paulownia Flower. Admiral Sah and other officers also received decorations through the Foreign Office. In the afternoon His Highness paid a visit in turn to the Palace of the Crown Prince, the residences of other Imperial princes and Ministers of State, and the Embassies and Legations. The Chinese Minister Mr. Wong gave a dinner party in the evening in honour of the Prince at the Legation. Some 600 dignitaries, both foreign and Japanese, were present.

At 9.15 a.m. on Wednesday Prince Tsai Hsun left the Shiba Detached Palace and inspected the Naval College, the Naval Medical and Paymasters' Schools. A little before noon Prince Fushimi paid a visit to the Chinese Prince, returning the latter's visit to the Imperial Palace yesterday, when Prince Fushimi handed an Imperial letter to Prince Tsai Hsun, who asked the former to offer sincere gratitude to His Majesty the Emperor. After seeing the Imperial Prince off, Prince Tsai Hsun with his suite pro-

THE BOOKSHELF.

Administrative Problems of British India, by JOSEPH CHAILLEY, Member of the French Chamber of Deputies. Translated by Sir William Meyer, K.C.I.E. London, Macmillan & Co., L.P., 1910.

M. CHAILLEY, a barrister who had given special attention to just such problems as face the British Administration in India, spent something like twelve years in careful, personal study of those problems, and while his modesty leads him to disclaim having been granted any marked privileges for prosecuting his investigations, such as might have been afforded by the officials in India, yet it is manifest that he had excellent opportunities made for him; and it is equally clear that he made the best use of his advantages. Such being the case, we have in his book something which must appeal with peculiar force to all, of whatever nationality they may be, who are interested in the excessively difficult task which now, perhaps more than at any other time, faces the British Government in India, in its efforts to maintain a right that was acquired through large cost, both of life and of money, and at the same time to do that justice to the many different classes of the natives of India to which the British spirit naturally lends itself. That such an excellently qualified stranger should have expressed himself in general terms as satisfied that the present Government is, all thing considered, doing the best which can be done, must be pleasing to the Briton. It must be admitted that M. Chailley's work suffers a little at the hands of his so-called translator after Sir William's admission that "the English version which I have prepared does not profess to be a literal translation of the French text. Some portions of the latter, as, for instance, in the chapter on States and Chiefs in Burma, have been condensed, and in some cases I have given paraphrase of the author's statements and conclusions rather than an absolute reproduction." In reading this English version, one thinks there are many places where we could wish that the French idea had been more carefully followed. Frequently by misplacing the word "only," the sense is unpleasantly distorted; but this little particle is one of the most awkward to handle correctly. We sometimes have to re-read a whole sentence, in this volume, to get at the precise meaning which the translator intended to convey.

It is not necessary to speak of the enormous native population in India, or of its varied and complex units: all know these things so well that M. Chailley's stupendous figures come merely as confirmation. The author's book, either in the original text or in the English version, is one that may be highly recommended to Japanese readers, for while there is everywhere a keen appreciation of what Japan has done in the last fifty years, and is trying to do to-day, there is a perfectly frank admission that the native Indians can hardly follow Japan's lead implicitly and with perfect safety. The problem of Education is a conspicuous example of this: the tendency in Japan to make higher education almost wholly a matter of lectures, without any pretence at actual personal study on the part of the undergraduate, is condemned for India, as it should be everywhere. Again, with instruction in the lower schools, the slavish adherence to "text-books," without any original expounding by the masters, is something that all educationists in Japan should condemn, and for India M. Chailley vehemently characterises it as pernicious.

It is pleasing to note the broad and liberal spirit which M. Chailley displays when considering the needs of India in the matter of religions, and it is surprising to see that, in this respect, he is quite in accord with the leading teachers of Christianity, who have, for the most part, admitted that there is so much to be respected in the native religions as to render it expedient, if not absolutely necessary, that for India there ought to be a national religion—based upon the teaching of Christ, it is true—and yet so adapted as to meet the special needs of all. Indeed, the long chapter on "Religions" (and its very length indicates the great importance the author attaches to this subject) is one that deserves careful attention from every reader. The same thing may be said, in perhaps slightly less emphatic terms, of the chapter on "Caste," that "most remarkable social phenomenon in India;" and the one thing, probably, which has been the obstacle in the British scheme of advancement. In the chapter dealing with "Political Reform," M. Chailley sounds the key-note of his whole composition in unmistakable tone when, in discussing the possibility (or it would be truer, undoubtedly, to substitute the word "impossibility") of "evacuation," he says: "India is one of the main pillars upon which the grandeur of the British Empire rests, and England will not willingly let her go; nor can a foreigner judge, or any one prophesy, in regard to a matter such as this."

There is a striking parallel between what M. Chailley says of the "Social Relation between Europeans and Indians," in Chapter XI, and the existing conditions in Japan; for it must be admitted that there is hardly a European in that country who really knows the home-life of his most intimate Japanese friend; and, possibly, the limiting "hardly" is not actually necessary or even correct. Those who have lived longest in Japan, those who (and this is not written with any thought of depreciating the good work of Christian propagandists) have nothing in the way of an axe to grind when seeking to get at the very heart of their Japanese friends; these are unanimous in saying that practically all there is of social intercourse between native and foreigner is based upon an exotic standard, with nothing that is really Japanese life about it, and this statement does not imply any sense of offensive superiority on the part of the European or American, it simply connotes that (as yet) impassable barrier between Asiatic and European.

Is it not well worth while for the Japanese educational authorities to give careful attention to the opinion of such a disinterested and intelligent observer as M. Chailley when he declares that "language is a living organism, and not dead matter; and just as there is reason to doubt whether natives, however, learned, intelligent, sincere, and devoted, can become effective interpreters of Western science, so, too, we have to ask ourselves whether the indispensable vehicle for conveying the elements of this science to the native mind must not be a European language, which alone possesses a sufficiently supple and extended vocabulary—one which has grown up concomitantly with the ideas it expresses? Now this, it must be borne in mind, relates to India where, as a matter of fact, the study of Western science and cognate branches has been of longer experiment than in Japan. The fullest measure of appreciation for the adaptation and absorbing of European ideas by the Japanese is cheerfully accorded; yet it is still open to discussion whether the education could not even now be better imparted by those who have lived the ideas rather than acquired them: after an intimate personal experience of five and twenty years in the Japanese Government schools, the writer of this article is compelled to say that there has never come under his observation a case where the mathematics, science, and all else, would not have been better taught by a Western man who had grown up to it, and more readily and more clearly understood by the student.

In closing this very brief reference to specific matters, it may be noted that there is rapidly developing in Japan a passion for litigation which is almost amusingly similar to the same spirit that has existed in India for many years. It is something that the outside observer in both countries must condemn, and for Japan there is the added objection that Court procedure lends itself most shamelessly to a degree of procrastination which is hardly known in India.

One finds it almost impossible to believe that a Frenchman could have written such a book as this; for it is filled with evidence of the closest study and patient investigation of a subject which, we should have thought could hardly attract such a writer; the results of these studies and investigations are supplemented by a frank exposition and a sympathetic appreciation that lead one to think they must have been penned by an English-speaking person. Yet such matter would not quite round out the volume, and the finishing touch is found in the last chapter of suggestions. As is always the case when Messrs. Macmillan & Co. decide to print such a book, the mechanical part leaves nothing to be asked—in paper, type, or make-up. G.

KOREA.

(FROM OUR SEOUL CORRESPONDENT.)

Annexation is completed and Korea settles down to a new life of beginnings. Old traditions have ended. Customs, superstitions, habits, will have to adjust themselves to a new age. New horizons outline themselves on the four sides. The changes of the next ten years, one may not be able to guess, but they will be very great, undoubtedly.

A long farewell will be said to ancient modes of thought. The Korean's hills will fade away and other prominences project themselves, to which he can pin his faith. As mentioned before, the Korean has always lived under the guardian peaks that convey their influences some 200 miles from the high ridges of the east coast. Shortly after the completion of the palaces, on the first founding of the city, it was discovered that there were hostile mountains twenty miles to the south, that kindled fires in the palace enclosure. Geomancers guarded the dynasty against this mountain by placing two stone-lions or fire-eaters before the palace. These stone-lions still stand to-day and look with meaningless faces at the age into which we have been ushered. Graves too must have their guardian peaks or the family will not prosper. The spirit of the dead must see itself properly adjusted, and spirits do not see as men see. There is a saying "Dragons do not see stones, men do not see dust (in the air), dogs do not see snow, tigers do not see paper."

People were born according to the formation of the hills on which their ancestral graves are situated. A craggy hill brought forth warriors, a smooth well-rounded hill brought forth scholars, a sharp peak brought forth writers, an opposing peak brought forth robbers, jade peaks brought forth beautiful women.

A long farewell will be said to much of this shadowy spirit world, but something else must take its place, for the Korean is undoubtedly a man of spiritual instincts and appreciation. One of my most delightful friends used to pray for a hundred days at a time on the hills to some god or other that he was not quite sure of, but he took much more pains to satisfy and please and win over that god of his than most Christians do to please the Creator of the world.

Just now a campaign for the propagation of Christianity is on foot, and a wide proclamation of the Gospel is being made. Years ago all sorts of discontents, political suspects etc., came to the meetings, but it is not so to-day. Those come who are "weary and heavy laden" and a fair percentage of them are said to find rest.

SPECIATOR.

DEATH OF MRS. W. W. GREENE.

We regret to record the death at San Francisco, of Mrs. W. W. Greene, the wife of Captain W. Woodus Greene of the steamer Chiyo Maru, and to whom we extend our sympathies in his sad bereavement.

Most residents will remember Mrs. Greene (then Miss Jessie M. Booth) for her kindly sympathy towards all good causes both before her marriage and after. Although during the last few months her health was precarious, it was thought the change of climate would do her good.

COUNT HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JIJI (HIMPO).")

CLIX.—SALE OF GOVERNMENT ENTERPRISES.

From about the year 1887, as a step preparatory to the opening of Parliament, the Government began on a large scale the sale of its enterprises. The prices were originally payable in fifty annual instalments, free of interest; but a new plan was subsequently devised by which the payments were made in advance. Thus, if, for example, a man bought an enterprise valued at yen 500,000, he could pay one lump sum in advance, instead of having to pay fifty yearly instalments of yen 10,000 each. These sums were calculated in a most absurd manner. It was reckoned that, if a certain sum of money were paid in to the Government at once, that sum together with the interest accruing therefrom would at the end of fifty years reach the full estimate of the value of the enterprise purchased, and that thus the Government would be no loser. None but a Japanese financier would have thought of such a plan. And yet at the time their reasoning was considered most sound and just.

CLX.—THE TREATY REVISION PROJECT FALLS ASLEEP.

During the years 1880-1, Marquis Inoue, as Minister for Foreign Affairs, had repeated negotiations with the European and American Ministers in Japan on the subject of Treaty Revision, and his proposals were forwarded to the Powers concerned through their respective representatives.

During these negotiations, as I heard from a very reliable source, the British Minister spoke very little. At the end of the conferences, when asked to transmit the proposals to his Government, he replied that he would do so, but that at the same time he was quite sure that his Government would not accept the suggestions.

When I was in Paris in 1882, I was told by a Foreign Office official that the Treaty Revision drafts were lying fast asleep in the pigeon-holes of the Department, and that he could not tell me when they would awaken. When I asked him what he thought would be likely to happen in London, he said that he supposed the Draft would meet with the same fate there as in Paris.

CLXI.—TREATY REVISION, ITO AND INOUE.

Treaty Revision came upon the tapis again during the years 1885-6. A man who had much to do with the negotiations told me the following story. The Draft contained a clause, which had been prepared by Viscount Aoki, then Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs, in collaboration with the British and German Ministers, to the effect, that a translation into a European language should be made and submitted to the Foreign Ministers for their approval previous to its being promulgated.

The American Minister, who had heard of the clause, told a member of the Revision Committee that it was tantamount to giving the Foreign Ministers the right to interfere in Japanese legislation, and that it would cause much embarrassment to everybody. The official, thus warned, undertook to bring up the question at a meeting of the committee, but only succeeded in getting himself into hot water with the Viscount. He was told to hold his peace, and the Draft containing the clause in question was duly signed by all the Ministers and Foreign Ministers concerned.

Finally, the minutes and the Draft were submitted to the Cabinet Council, where Prince Ito pulled the whole thing to pieces. The draft Treaty which had been approved by the Revision Committee was rejected by the Cabinet, and Inoue resigned.

The public has generally looked upon this incident as the commencement of the discord between the two statesmen. My opinion is somewhat different. It is my belief that Marquis Inoue saw the mistake he had made when it was too late to get things altered, and that he then came to a secret arrangement with Prince Ito to get out of the difficulty by means of a pretended defeat [The Japanese word is (八百長) "Yauchō"]. I have found much that bears out my suspicions.

CLXII.—COUNT OKUMA'S BIG WORDS.

Marquis Inoue was succeeded at the Foreign Office by Count Okuma. Okuma entered into negotiations separately with each Power. He succeeded in putting through his negotiations with Germany, Russia and America, but the attempt on his life, when he was on the eve of commencing negotiations with Great Britain, brought further proceedings to a standstill.

Parliament was to be opened, according to the Imperial promise, in a very few years, and the different political parties were working tooth and nail to get the start of their rivals and secure a majority of seats.

I heard from a friend that Okuma one day boasted at a Cabinet Meeting that, if he succeeded with his plan of Treaty Revision, his followers of the Progressive Party would secure an overwhelming majority in the Diet.

The heads of the other Departments were not a little alarmed when they heard Count Okuma's words. They looked upon a Progressive victory as a sort of political revolution, and set to work to combat the danger. They recommended their subordinates in the Departments to go down to the country and become candidates for Parliamentary seats. Thus many sober officials turned politicians in order to fight Progressivism, and not a few of them ruined themselves in the process.

CLXIII.—THE ATTACK ON TREATY REVISION.

Count Okuma's plan of Treaty Revision now became most unpopular. Its unpopularity was not, however, based on the provisions of the scheme itself; but arose rather out of the envy of Okuma's colleagues, who looked with jealous eyes at the success which attended his efforts. Many of them secretly joined hands with Count Gotō and his Daido Danketsu party, and thus fostered the attack on Treaty Revision.

CLXIV.—THE TRUE INWARDNESS OF THE AFFAIRS IN SEOUL.

The troubles at Seoul in 1884 were mainly the work of Kin Gyoku Kin. It was however rumoured that Marquis Inoue had a finger in the pie. The Marquis, taking advantage of the troubles between China and Japan, tried to recover Japan's lost prestige in Korea (lost since 1882) by making a cat's paw of Kin Gyoku Kin. If this is true, it was a great mistake on his part to entrust matters of such moment to so simple a diplomatist as Mr. Takezoe, and to neglect the simple precaution of keeping in Seoul a troop of Japanese soldiers capable of holding their own against the Chinese.

CLXV.—VICES OF LOCAL GOVERNORS.

I have noticed elsewhere that the officers of the Government began to be luxurious from about the 12th or 13th year of Meiji. Their extravagance increased year by year, and reached its culminating point about the 20th year (1887). The bad examples of the higher officers of Government soon spread to their subordinates. I will here give one or two instances.

There was a local tax, known as Bukin, which was imposed by Prefectural Governments upon Geisha and other women of similar callings. The proceeds of this impost were reckoned to belong neither to the Imperial Treasury nor to the Prefectural Governments, but to be entirely at the discretion of the Governors themselves. Certain expenses (often merely nominal) were supposed to be paid out of these funds,—the prevention of venereal diseases, hygienic institutions and "high police."

The incomes derived from this impost were in some cases very considerable. Thus, in Osaka, it produced from yen 130,000 to yen 140,000 per annum, and in Kobe between yen 60,000 and yen 70,000. Three per cent. of these revenues were to be paid to the Central Government as a contribution to those Prefectures which had no local imposts of this sort: the rest was left to the absolute discretion of each local Governor.

Most of the prefectures had their own special hotel in Tokyo, subsidized out of these funds, and the local Governor, when he came to town would put up at the subsidized hostelry to which he would sometimes give a "tea-money" gift of several hundreds of yen. Grand dinners would be given at these hotels, and there was always a rivalry of entertainment among the Governors. All these expenses were defrayed out of the Bukin funds. Some Governors built villas for themselves out of these moneys, others kept and entertained costly mistresses, and some invested the money in their own names in banks.

But in 1887 the control of the Bukin funds was transferred to the care of the Prefectural Assemblies, and a death blow was struck to gubernatorial extravagance.

CLXVI.—THE CUNNING POLICY OF THE GOVERNORS.

Road making was being much pushed at this period throughout the Empire, and the improvement of means of communication brought a great influx of population to the country towns. The consequence was naturally a great appreciation in the values of suburban lands, and of this the Governors knew how to avail themselves. The building of roads was entirely in their hands. They knew where developments were going to take place, and they were able by virtue of their knowledge to buy lands cheap and to sell them again at a very great profit.

The same thing happened with Railway shares. A railway-building fever had seized the people at this time and each Prefecture had its own railway schemes. On the pretext of encouraging enterprise the Governor would get a large number of promoters' shares allotted to him. He would then bide his time, wait for the shares to reach a high quotation in the market, and then sell out, making his own fortune and leaving the railway scheme to ruin. I know of several most painful quarrels which arose out of crooked transactions of this sort.

CLXVII.—THE BENEFIT OF CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT.

In the days of the autocracy, before the promulgation of the constitution, the Local Governors had many ways of increasing their private incomes. Some were connected with publishing firms, and compelled all the schools in the Prefecture to buy their text-books. Some created imaginary officers, whose names were entered on the books as having been sent for study or investigation, or what not, to other Prefectures, and whose (not imaginary) salaries were pocketed by their creators. Bribery, fraud, speculation of all sorts, was rife.

The opening of Parliament did not cure these evils at once. But it provided an organ by means of which these crimes could be brought to light, investigated and exposed, and the increasing difficulty of maintaining secrecy has undoubtedly diminished official dishonesty.

This is certainly by no means the least of the many benefits conferred on us by the Parliamentary system.

CLXVIII.—HERR MOSSE.

In the days when our people had not yet got over their astonishment at the great wisdom of western nations, and when every foreigner was an object of admiration, a certain Herr Mosse was employed by the Government as an expert adviser in the Department of Law. Before coming to Japan, he had been a judge in his own country, and he came on the recommendation of the German Government, to assist the Japanese authorities in the establishment of local self-Government.

But the following instance will show that he did not understand his business very well. When he paid a visit to Nikko, the inhabitants sent three or four of their number as their representatives to give him a welcome. And from this simple fact he inferred that the Japanese people had given ample evidence of their fitness for self-government, CLXX.—MARQUIS INOUE AND THE JIJITO.

When Marquis Inoue resigned his office of Minister of Foreign Affairs in consequence of the failure of his efforts to obtain Treaty Revision, Viscount Aoki (who was then Vice Minister of Foreign Affairs) and Viscount Nomura (then Vice-Minister of Communications) exerted themselves to form a political party, to be called the Jiji-tō, with Marquis Inoue as its leader. Out-of-place politicians, business men, and others were invited to join it, and the movement was inaugurated by an introductory lecture on Self-Government in the Hall of the Rokumeikwan. A goodly company assembled for the lecture, and were very politely received by the two Viscounts, who even busied themselves with finding chairs for their hearers.

I was at the time serving in the Department of Communications. Many of the officials of that Department went to the lecture at the Vice-Minister's most urgent request. People were saying that the tension between Ito and Inoue was become very severe, and that it behoved them now to determine which of the two leaders they should follow, for hesitation might mean the ruin of their future careers. A great many persons pinned their faith on Inoue and the organization of the political party which was to endorse his views was showing great signs of life, when all of a sudden the Marquis re-entered the Cabinet and became Minister for Agriculture and Commerce. Then it was discovered that the talk of a discord between Ito and Inoue was nothing but idle rumour. After that, the whole great scheme of the Jijito for the promotion of local autonomy vanished speedily into thin air.

One day I had an opportunity of asking Mr. Ito (as he was then) about the Jijito. He smiled at my question. It was very foolish, he said, of Nomura and Aoki to make an idol of Inoue. Any one would have foreseen that they would one day find themselves left in the lurch.

I was afterward told by a friend of mine who had done much work for the organization of the Jijitō, that it was Ito himself who had persuaded Inoue to abandon the idea of forming a political party by pointing out the many disadvantages to himself which it would entail.

CLXX.—I BECAME A PREFECTURAL OFFICER.

On the 3rd of December 1887, I became Governor of the newly instituted Kagawa Prefecture. A few days later, I went to my post in Sanuki. The Matsudaira family, the ancient lords of the district, were a branch of the Mito Tokugawas, and therefore more distantly connected with the House of the Shōgun. Towards the end of the Tokugawa period, these Matsudairas had behaved with considerable haughtiness, so that they were not at all in good odour among the other daimyō families of the neighbourhood.

In the changes which followed the Restoration Sanuki had never been an independent prefecture, but was attached, sometimes to Noto and sometimes to Ehime, arrangements which caused much annoyance to the good people of the old province. But the province had now recovered its autonomy, and I, its first Governor, had been an adherent of the Tokugawa. The people were much pleased with the appointment and gave me every facility of administration in their power.

I remained at this post for about one year, after which I was transferred to Kobe. In this connection I will relate a very insignificant occurrence. It is true that a Prefectural Governor is not one of the very highest of Government officials, but yet he is the head of the Prefecture and is expected to keep a certain amount of style. Now when I came to be removed from Sanuki to Kobe, I found that the allowance to which I was entitled for the purpose was only 27 yen! It was the height of absurdity. Our Finance authorities had not yet arrived at a sense of proportion.

Similarly, when I was sent as Minister to Peking I was allowed yen 100 for travelling expenses for myself and family! On arriving at Taku, I took two boats that Li Hung Chang had provided for our conveyance up the river. We went in these boats as far as Tientsin, where we found a guard of honour sent by Li Hung Chang to escort us.

The cost of the boats, and the usual tip of two dollars a piece for the guards, did much more than swallow up the whole of my Government travelling allowance.

I do not know whether this system of allowances has been changed. A Japanese gentleman hates to have to speak about pecuniary matters, but it is highly important that common sense should be employed in the settlement of a matter like that.

CLXXI.—THE SUGAR AFFAIRS OF THE KAGAWA PREFECTURE.

It was a very great satisfaction to me to be able satisfactorily to settle the so called tonya difficulty which had been for a long time a much vexing problem. It had been the custom of the Matsudaira lords, in the feudal days, to make large advances from the family funds to nine creditable farmers of the clan, who in their turn made smaller loans to the agriculturists to enable them to cultivate the sugar cane and make sugar. The nine farmers thus selected were called tonya and were personally responsible for all the money advanced from the clan treasury.

The sugar thus produced was sold at Osaka by an official appointed by the clan, and the proceeds, after deducting the loaned capital, the interest, the working expenses, and the taxes, were divided amongst the farmers. The same process was repeated the following year, and the thing had been going on for quite a long time.

When the clan system was abolished and all clan property transferred to the Government, there was an outstanding loan of some yen 600,000 which had been loaned to the farmers. It had not yet come in, and the debt was transferred from the Matsudaira family to the local Government.

Then arose complications of all sorts. The farmers were not over well disposed to the new regime and did nothing to facilitate matters for the Governors of Ehime or Noto, and there had even been threats of bringing the matter before the local Law Courts.

After I had been appointed Governor and had got the affairs of the Kagawa ken into something like working order, I thought I would try my hand at an amicable settlement of the dispute, a thought in which I was encouraged by the fact that the erection of Kagawa into an independent Prefecture had undoubtedly produced a most salutary effect on the people of the Prefecture.

So one evening I invited the nine tonya farmers to my official residence, talked with them very frankly about the circumstances of the case, asked them to bear in mind the great trouble which the business had already given to individuals as well as to the Government, and besought them to do their best for the prosperity of the Prefecture. Then I sketched out for them my programme for adjustment, and added that if any of them had a better scheme to propose I should be very glad to adopt it. The farmers met me half way. They met together several times for the discussion of my proposals and finally agreed to accept them. The accounts were then made out on the basis I had suggested, and thus the question, which had caused much trouble throughout the province, was amicably settled in the course of a month or two.

CLXXII.—THE NECESSITY OF GIVING THE PEOPLE ACCESS TO THE EAR OF THE HIGH AUTHORITIES.

If the Governor of a province should want to know the thoughts of his people on any particular point and should order the police authorities to make an investigation for him, the Police will first enquire what the wishes of the Governor are and will make their report accordingly. They will not trouble themselves about the real feelings or wishes of the people.

For instance, if the Progressist party should happen to be in power the police authorities in any district would report in a sense favourable to that party, but the same officials investigating the same question would give a very different report if the Liberals should happen to be in power. Whenever a Government office has a dispute with a private individual the police will always side with the Government office. A Governor who relied wholly and solely on police reports would be constantly in danger of being misled. He should check the police reports by means of information acquired by free intercourse with the people. Then and then only will he be enabled to come to independent and impartial decisions.

THE REVOLUTION IN PORTUGAL.

The first reports written from Lisbon by the correspondent of the London Daily Mail were on Oct. 5th and are as follows:

The first sign of the revolt was the presence of rioters parading the streets on Monday night and exciting the populace by versions of the assassination of the Republican member for Lisbon, Dr. Bombarda.

Early on Tuesday morning the rioters, evidently by prearranged plan, fired their signal outside the barracks of the 16th Infantry Regiment. Then the trouble began. The soldiers, murdering their captain, Celestino Costa, burst into the armoury and distributed arms to the people. Out they sallied with the 1st Artillery, who joined the revolt.

They then signalled news of the rising to the warships in the Tagus.

There was the greatest difficulty in maintaining communication. The streets were impassable, the Municipal Guards (then loyal to the Throne) forbidding all traffic.

The trains ceased to run, for the lines were cut by the Republicans, who were most thorough in the measures they took.

My residence is situated right in the middle of the fighting. This enables me to obtain news from the soldiers on guard under the windows. Troops are now (Tuesday morning) filling the square.

I am writing at dawn on Wednesday. There has been a terrifying cannonade all night long, and it is now increasing in violence. The artillery from Santarem (forty-five miles away) have arrived and joined the Republicans.

An attack is being made on the Carmo Convent, the stronghold of the Municipal Guards. Shrapnel bullets are falling like hail round the windows, smashing the glass as I write.

Municipal Guards under the windows of the office of O Mundo (a Republican newspaper) have just been shot dead. The ambulances are full of dead and wounded and are constantly passing. The Red Cross is hoisted all over the town, even on the newspaper offices. The streets are deserted except for the troops. The bakeries have been raided by the soldiers for bread.

At eight o'clock on Wednesday morning I was informed that the hitherto loyalist troops hoisted the white flag and surrendered to the Republicans.

Suddenly the streets filled with crowds shouting "Viva a Republica!" (Long live the Republic). The people then began rushing down to the Avenida (? da Liberdade).

The Municipal Guards, who were absolutely heroic in their defence, have also now surrendered.

I have absolutely trustworthy information that all the Royal Family are safe at the Mafra Monastery (twenty three miles north) and will leave Portugal either in the royal yacht Amelia, anchored off Ericeira, which is not far from Mafra, or by motor-car for Spain.

It is now one o'clock on Wednesday afternoon. The Republic of Portugal has been proclaimed at the town hall amid the enthusiasm of the people. A Cabinet has been formed, presided over by Senor Theophilo Braga.

The English cruiser Newcastle has just crossed the bar of the Tagus.

OFFICIAL TELEGRAM TO "DAILY MAIL."

The following is the translation of the official telegram received by the Daily Mail, as published by that paper:

Lisbon, October 5.

I have pleasure in informing you that the Republic was proclaimed this morning, and has been recognised by the people and by the Army.

The deposed Royal Family is in flight.

The Government, of which I am President, has taken every precaution to guarantee the lives and safety of the King and his family, whether they embark in some foreign vessel or leave Portugal by land.

Public order has been perfectly maintained by the Republican forces and even the people themselves. Their enthusiasm is indescribable.

Several Army officers who were partisan to the monarchy until yesterday have now joined us.

Several of the country towns are enthusiastically on our side.

The stability of the Republic is assured by the desires of the whole country.

It will respect all the national covenants of Portugal, and will be pleased to further the consolidation, on a moral and practical footing, of good relations with foreign peoples and of the alliance with England.

IN THE NAME OF THE PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT,

DR. THEOPHILO BRAGA,
PRIME MINISTER.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWS LETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent)

M. ISVOLSKY.

St. Petersburg, October 6.

The appointment of M. Isvolsky to the Embassy at Paris is gazetted together with an Imperial Rescript conferring upon him the order of the White Eagle. That enfant terrible of the press, M. Menshikov, whose slashing articles form one of the attractions of the Novoe Vremja improves the occasion to express in several columns what the Novoe Vremja has been endeavouring for years to instil into its readers. Briefly put, the article says: "M. Isvolsky is a failure, a 'might-have-been'; who has now at last found a hole in which to hide his shortcomings. Of course he took office as Minister of Foreign Affairs at a moment when only the highest genius of a statesman could have done more than M. Isvolsky did. Had he been content to pull together modestly and quietly the fragments remaining from the wreck of old Russia, criticism would have been unkind whatever his achievements or want of achievements. But he must forsooth pose as a new Bismarck, run all over Europe advertising himself. As a fiddler compelled to play on a battered fiddle, he might have escaped condemnation by doing his best; but why give concerts on this instrument? The achievements which his friends put to his credit, the relations with England and Japan—well, the first is injurious to us, for where is the good of being friends nowadays with a country that has no army: and the second might have been really useful if it had been kept strictly a secret. On the other side is the annexation of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the manner of its accomplishment, as well as the drawing into the German orbit of Turkey and Rumania. Nothing will ever counterbalance the failure to keep Germany our friend, the friend of ages past with whom Isvolsky quarreled in favour of England. Russia foresees the imminent and inevitable Anglo German War, and whether Germany goes to war with England or France is no concern or interest of Russia's, always providing she avoids being the aggressor. Our treaty with France binds us to join her in resisting aggression, but nothing more. England of course will utilise the position given her by M. Isvolsky to turn Germany upon Russia. Therefore the first and foremost duty of all Russian Ambassadors abroad and of Russian Ministers at home is to put all possible pressure upon the Minister of War and of Finance to force the pace at which the Russian Army is being re-equipped for power. M. Isvolsky found things bad enough when he took up office: but he leaves them a good deal worse than he found them." And all this because M. Menshikov is a true-blue Anglophobe of the old school, and the Novoe Vremja finds its profit in providing interesting reading matter written in verjuice, that titillates the ears much as a breath of scandal that reaches one about a friend—not believed, of course, but—interesting.

There is one great and far-reaching piece of work accomplished by M. Isvolsky which deserved from the discernment of the Novoe Vremja a better comment than sneers at the "globe-trotter." M. Isvolsky entirely recast the Russian Foreign Office in one respect: very few of its members nowadays but have seen the world outside Russia and lived the life of that world. In the old days the Russian F.O. was a hide-bound department of ultra-Russian officialdom, knowing as little as possible of anything outside its own four walls. In those days Russia's representative abroad had to fight tooth and nail only too often with their own Department and appeal to the Sovereign when anything had to be done for the advantage of their country: the Sovereign then issuing his autocratic commands to the F.O. All this has necessarily been changed, but it is to M. Isvolsky that must be credited the filling of the F.O. with officials who have served their country in various parts of the world, who can meet foreign colleagues with perfect understanding of both sides of every question, and no longer present the stone-wall face to every new idea that may impinge upon them. M. Isvolsky's predecessor never went a step beyond the frontier!

POSITION OF NEW TURKEY.

The possibility of New Turkey becoming a tool in the hands of the Triple Alliance, practically those of Germany, is causing considerable apprehension among Russian publicists. The first fruits of the new order of things is seen in the extensive armaments by sea and by land undertaken by Turkey. The reply to the new move taken by Turkey is to be found, according to Russian writers, in a federation of the Balkan States. Meantime Turkey is reminded that for whatever purpose her armaments are intended they will hardly do more for her than further to deplete an already almost exhausted treasury. Europe has shown unmistakably that no extension of the Turkish empire will ever be permitted this side the Bosphorus. Nowadays, says the Novoe Vremja, "Europe is divided into two camps, that of the Triple Alliance and that of the Triple Entente: the former proceeds towards its ends by force of arms, and is continually threatening the use of that force. The Triple Entente of England, France and Russia, on the other hand, is based upon the sincere desire for the continuance of peace in the world. Every step taken towards the Triple Entente is a further guarantee of peace. A constitutionally governed and peaceful Turkey is for Russia an essential factor in her own national policy." The warning to Turkey is clear: what will happen if it is disregarded?

RUSSIAN EXPENDITURES

The Russo-British Chamber of Commerce publishes an admirable conspect of the revenue and expenditure of 111 cities and townships of Russia. From this it appears that the budgets of the two capitals, St. Petersburg and Moscow, total nearly half the aggregate budget for the 111 townships. But the most striking figures are those showing the increase in the income and expenditure of townships in Russia in the past five years. Thus St. Petersburg has more than doubled, Moscow has added 55 per cent., and a number of smaller centres have doubled their budget during the past five years. In 1904 there were only 7 towns with a budget of over 200,000 pounds sterling; now there are 9. Between 100,000 and 200,000 pounds five years ago there were 8 townships, now 12, and the increase is maintained all down the line. St. Petersburg in the past 18 years has tripled its budget; its total indebtedness is 9,870,922 pounds sterling, or about six pounds per head of population, largely guaranteed by municipal property, which, exclusive of water-mains and tramways, is valued at 14,770,000 pounds sterling.

A NEW WAR TAX.

The Ministry of War has projected a new scheme for a special tax to be levied throughout the Russian Empire and to be entitled the War Tax. The scheme will have to pass through the Committee of Ministers and be presented to the Duma before becoming law. It is based on the fundamental idea that all subjects of the Emperor owe war-service to their country. Many pay this obligation by actual service. Many more escape actual service in the army by being allotted to various categories of the reserve, some are disqualified by physical unfitness, while whole regions of the Empire, notably Finland, for example, have hitherto neither served in person, nor paid in money in lieu thereof. The scheme proposes to impose a tax of five roubles (half a guinea) per head on all who for whatsoever reason do not serve the Emperor as soldiers at the regulation age. It is proposed to impose the tax for four years, which presumably will imply the fixing of the number of Russia's soldiers also for periods of four years at a time. The amount expected to be paid into the State treasury on account of this tax will be not less than one million sterling per year. As projected the scheme is somewhat draconic: the only absolute exemption from payment is in the case of men so physically helpless as to be incapable of earning any living at all, or secondly, the case of men physically unfit whose unfitness is the result of service already incurred. The tax is to be levied on the parents of young men of service age who for any reason do not serve in the ranks.

THE AVIATION MEETING.

The aviation meeting yesterday was a remarkably successful one in every way. The place of honour must be accorded to Lieut. Piotrovsky, who with a student of the polytechnic as passenger flew from the aerodrome northwest, passing Sestroretsk, and then crossed the sea to Kronstad'. The boldness of the feat is unexampled: it was already late in the afternoon, there was a mist over the sea, and none of the usual safeguards and precautions for an oversea flight had been taken. In landing some slight damage was done to one wing of his Bleriot pattern plane, but if it is repaired in time the lieutenant has announced his intention of returning to the aerodrome to-day through the air. For the first time the great military dirigible made its appearance on the ground after a flight from Gatchina, whither it returned at the close of the day's flying. Among the passengers who took a flight yesterday was the Premier Minister, M. Stolypin, who was taken up in a Farman for a flight that lasted over five minutes round and round the aerodrome at a fair height. The interest of the public in aviation is increasing rapidly in Russia, and flying is reported from half a dozen towns all over the country.

STATUS OF SYNDICATES IN RUSSIA.

The question of Syndicates in Russian business will be settled this Autumn. A Government Commission, which has been gathering evidence up and down the country for some months past, will meet shortly to decide the line to be taken. The civil and criminal codes of Russian Law do not mention Syndicates in any way, and a new clause will have to be inserted. Up to the present the law-codes only recognise what is called "stachka," i.e. a combination, whether of employers or employed, that is detrimental to the public interest; in other words the Russian existing law says that penalties attach either to those guilty of a 'strike' or to equivalent action on the part of employers, a 'lock out.'

The River Lena is now frozen over, and snow has fallen in several parts of Russia already. The abundance of game reported in the near neighbourhood of St. Petersburg at a date considerably earlier than is usual likewise indicates an early and severe Winter.

The Japanese Prince Tokugawa, President of the Japanese Lower House, is at present in St. Petersburg. Yesterday after making visits upon the Ministers he inspected the Tauris Palace where the Duma will be in session next month, paying particular attention to the Chamber itself now undergoing extensive alterations.

A police-officer named Golovko has been sentenced to death by the court of Ekaterinodar for having shot down and caused to be shot down prisoners whom he was escorting to gaol in 1908. He explained the death of his prisoners by saying that they were shot down in an attempt to escape from their escort, which consisted of police, armed, of soldiers, and of mounted Cossacks. There were three prisoners!

A number of seventeenth century frescoes in a fair state of preservation have been discovered under many layers of paint on the walls of the Cathedral of the Assumption at Moscow. The "Coronation" Cathedral was buried many inches deep in whitewash up to 1896. The inside is now yielding up discoveries even more interesting than those then made on the exterior of this most ancient Russian Church.

The wildest rumours are current here about the assassination of the notorious Azeff, who is reported variously to have been killed at half a dozen different watering-places in France and Germany, always by the same three persons who persistently kept on his track in every kind of disguise. It is likewise reported that the assassination is a "diplomatic murder," the news of its having been passed about by Azeff himself who is in St. Petersburg.

The tramway employees have struck at Warsaw for more pay and shorter hours. The tram service has been maintained imperfectly by various devices. Not only have the instructors and other superior classes of employees been pressed into service as drivers and guards, but a select number of strikers—all of whom are either in prison or expelled to their country homes—have been escorted daily to the depots by soldiers, planted on the driver's seats between two soldiers and compelled to do a normal—perhaps an abnormal—day's work: in the evening they are taken back to gaol. It is not expected that the strike will last long under these hard but decidedly humorous conditions.

After two days without a case or a death from either form of plague at Odessa a case occurred to-day followed by death with such suddenness as to suggest foul play, says the telegram reporting the recurrence of the more virulent form of the plague.

The trade returns for the first six months of the current year show a total increase of six million pounds sterling. Both imports and exports increased, the balance of the latter over the former leaving a profit "in favour of Russia" of some twelve million pounds sterling. In exports nearly the whole increase is accounted for by bread-stuffs, though a notable increase is recorded in tobacco in leaf, timber, iron ore and manganese; the only notable decrease is in the export of sugar.

Pending the revision of the entire Russian Consular service, orders have been issued circularly to all Consuls to place themselves in direct communication with the Ministry of Commerce and Industry on all matters connected with trade opportunities for their respective districts. The Ministry of Commerce and Industry is preparing for issue to all consular officers a handbook containing all matters upon which the new duties laid upon them necessitate instruction and reference.

The Russian Imperial Aero-Club has collected four thousand pounds sterling by public subscription throughout Russia towards the cost of providing an "aerial war fleet for Russia."

Advertisements are appearing in the official press of Russia calling upon all holders of shares in the Lena Goldfields Company who are Russian subjects to register their names with a view to ascertaining what influence upon the affairs of the company can be brought to bear by the Russian shareholders. The latter are believed, says the advertisement, to hold about 70 per cent. of the shares, whereas the affairs of the Company are administered from London, and prices are quoted only on the London and Paris Exchanges.

The Finnish-Diet farce is summed up by the Novoe Vremja in the following words: "Finnish patriots may apprehend the loss by Finland of her autonomy. But the only basis for any such apprehension lies in the Finns themselves and the Swedo-Finns. If Finland shows due respect for the Imperial and national interests of the Russian Empire the Finns may rest easy about the privileges that have been accorded them."

The Novoe Vremja, the property of M. Suvorin is to be converted into a company with 800 shares, of which M. Suvorin for his family retains 500, the staff will take 100 and the rest have been privately sold, a prominent Moscow member of the Duma taking fifty.

The manoeuvres of the Russian Black Sea Fleet continue to be marked by serious mishaps, which in the small number of ships engaged become painfully significant. Following upon the news of a collision between torpedo boats comes the intelligence of a burst cylinder on board the warship Tri Svjatileli causing serious injuries to several men.

The estimated cost of an overhead electric railway deriving motive power from a waterfall seventy miles away from St. Petersburg has been put at five million pounds sterling. The project, which is one of many that have been discussed for years without a decision being arrived at, is to be realised only by the aid of foreign capital.

Notwithstanding the extremely large number of specialist schools of late years established throughout Russia, their doors are this Autumn besieged by an overwhelming number of applicants for every vacancy. In former days it was mainly the pupils of the socially inferior Real-Schools who provided the students of these special technical and scientific finishing establishments. To-day the flower of the youths at the gymnasia of Russia generally endeavour to secure a vacancy in the higher special schools. This is taken to be a symptomatic sign of a great change coming over Russians: in the old days a general education was regarded as ample for all purposes, and only the well-to-do were able to get this much. Nowadays the tendency is all towards specialisation. At the same time foreigners are struck in Russia with the views now so commonly accepted on higher education, which is carried so far on into life that little time is left for doing the work of the world. It is no uncommon thing to meet a man of parts aged from 25 to 30, or even a few years over, who has spent all his time since childhood in one school or another, passing each in turn successfully, and still hoping to do some work in the world when he finishes just one more special school!

ANNEXATION OF KOREA.

[TRANSLATED FOR THE "JAPAN MAIL."]

In the October number of the Chūō Kōron appears a very lengthy article on the above subject from the pen of Mr. Yosaburō Takekoshi. The following is its verbatim translation.

The Japanese Government has at last effected the amalgamation of Korea, placing it under the control of the Governor General, and establishing the prefectural system all over the Peninsula. Nobody can see the Government, with sword in one hand and open purse in the other, trying to set up critics and controversialists to roars of applause for what it considers a grand achievement, without being reminded of that theatrical scene where our Ichikawa Danjūrō, the most distinguished actor of the old school, representing a rough warrior Fukushima, brandishes a sword in a manner most appalling. The performance our Government played in annexing Korea was a dramatic scene no less sensational than that of Fukushima, but at the same time it was a drama as historical as the latter, which must account for the Government's failure to command so much loud and enthusiastic applause as it expected. So far as I have heard, the Government at first intended to annex Korea in the early part of October so as to force its way toward the coming session of the Diet with an overwhelming demonstration. But the amalgamation was executed even prior to the Government's coming to any definite decision on the flood-relief measures. This is interpreted in political circles as solely because the Government desired to resuscitate the depressed hearts of the general public consequent upon the recent floods. However that may be, I, for one, cannot but consider that the annexation of Korea was in every point premature, in view of the incalculably bad effects it is to work on our financial conditions. According to the report, for instance, made in the English language by the Residency General last winter, the annual expenses Japan defrays for Chosen amount to some 32,000,000 yen, which in detail stand as follows:

For Residency	1,523,180
For Afforestation	300,000
For Colonisation Company.....	300,000
For Patent Office.....	43,915
For Railways	7,691,533
For Communications	2,276,695
For Navy and Army	15,229,116
Money advanced	5,259,580

Total 32,624,019

In this connection we must observe also that the total amount of the mutual trade aggregates no more than 33,900,000 yen, of which Japan's portion amounts to 21,850,000 yen, and Korea's to 12,080,000 yen. In these circumstances, for our Government to spend 32,000,000 yen for Chosen means pouring out the aggregate amount of the mutual trades. Where then can Japan find her funds? Since to every purse there is a certain limit, every country has some standard for its expenses to be invested in its own colonies. The common standard is in most cases a fraction of the total amount of the commerce transacted between a country and its colony; some countries, for instance, disburse 20 per cent. of the amount of the mutual trade, some 50 per cent., and so forth. But no country has ever poured out on its colony the whole amount of its commerce. Of course it may sometimes be found necessary for a country to invest in its colony even double the total amount of the commerce; but such defrayment is justified only on the assumption that its colonial policy is in the first stage of progress. The case is quite different with Japan. The rather long period Japan has been administering the affairs of the Peninsula can only convince us of the ruinously detrimental effect on our country's welfare, of continuing disbursements which absorbs the total sum of the mutual commerce. For this reason I could not but wish for curtailment of the present expenditure. But what does the amalgamation mean to our State finance? It means, instead of lessening, almost doubling the present expenditure, since, in the first place, the Government must issue capitalised pension bonds to the amount of 30,000,000 yen for the purpose of conferring due grants on the household of Prince Li, the Yangpan and the Literati in accordance with the new treaty; and in the second place, Japan has to hold herself entirely responsible for the Korean national bonds floated in Japan and other countries, to the amount of almost 41,900,000 yen, which, detailed, would stand as follow:—

	Yen.
Treasury Bonds.....	1,000,000
Consolidation Bonds.....	3,000,000
Gold coin Fund Bonds.....	1,500,000
First Enterprise Capital Bonds	5,000,000
Second Enterprise Capital Bonds	12,000,000
Enterprise Loan Bonds	1,000,000
Money borrowed of Japan	11,682,623
Coin Improvement Fund Bonds.....	8,819,448

Total 44,002,071

To these old public loan bonds, add the aforesaid new loan bonds of 30,000,000 yen, and they total approximately 75,000,000 yen, for which Japan must now accept full responsibility. But this is not all; for by no means small is what she has had to defray under the head of extraordinary expenditure regarding the two divisions of her soldiers posted in the peninsula. When to these are added such future expenses as will be required for the suppression of the possible upheaval of rebellions, and for numerous other undertakings necessary for the complete administration of the new territory, our state expenditure will surely increase to a most colossal amount.

The Governor General is said to have at first contemplated lessening the present expenditure by yen 2,000,000, but to have found it utterly impossible. Now, even if that sum could be saved this year, since the actual condition of things points to the imperative necessity for an increase of the expenditure by 4,000,000 yen next year, and by another 4,000,000 yen the following year, the inevitable result is that the total expenditure of the new territory rises up to some 42,000,000 yen, which means an increase of over 10,000,000 yen in the course of but a few years. Furthermore, since Chosen can not be expected to find herself financially self-supporting before at least 20 years elapse, the total investment Japan has to make during that period, amounts to over 800,000,000 yen. Add to this the 75,000,000 yen of bonds that Japan has taken over, and none can fail to see how really dear was the annexation of Korea. I am of opinion that Japan could have, with the best advantage from financial view-points, left the former Korean emperor and nobles to govern their own country, only holding herself responsible for the general administration of the Peninsula. Now that the die is cast, however, no further comment on such matters can avail.

In the next place, in connection with the annexation of Korea, what presents itself to our mind most acutely is the question of our naval expansion project. The 47th year of Meiji, just four years hence, is the time for us to decide whether to still carry forward the Anglo-Japanese Alliance, and is the time, also, when the canal work at Nicaragua comes to an end, thereby enabling America to station her fleets within easy reach of the East at any moment's notice. Meanwhile, who can tell what significant changes the Celestial Empire may not undergo politically or otherwise, and also what grave aspects the world's political horizon may not come to assume, because of the diplomatic activity that will be shown by the world's Powers in that short course of time? Careful observation, as above, of the general trend of the times, renders all the more conspicuous the prematureness of the amalgamation of Korea, and accentuates the necessity of our navy's enlargement so much that it claims the first care and attendance of our nationals, as the only way leading out of the possible difficulty into which otherwise our country might find herself precipitated hereafter. From the outset therefore I wished for expenditure, if at all, on naval expansion, instead of on the Peninsula, the annexation of which was not within the range of immediate necessity. It is amazing that so few people subscribed to this reasonable proposition, and it is almost incomprehensible that our authorities should have remained so indifferent to this urgent state of affairs. The financial capacity wasted by neglecting it, seems unforgivable to those who realize its absolute necessity if the best results are to be attained. But on the strength of their misguided belief that no increase of our state expenditure would be brought about, all the people welcomed amalgamation. And what was the result? The truth is, our country has had its expenses increased, as we observed before, by no less than 75,000,000 yen, with every promise for further increase a few years hence. Thus the once much ventilated talk of curtailment of State expenses proves no better than an empty assurance on paper. But I am aware that the amalgamation is already executed, and that to discuss it at this moment avails no more than counting, as the Eastern proverb has it, the age of a deceased child. Whether the amalgamation was timely or not, is not therefore what I have in mind at present, but as to how it was made I should like to call the closest attention and observation of cool headed thinkers.

The essential object of an amalgamation lies, in any case, in ensuring the security and welfare of the peoples from a political standpoint. But with regard to Chosen, Japan has already obtained that object, in establishing the protectorate over the peninsula. To annex it, therefore, means no substantial change. It is no more than the alteration of expression—from protectorate into prefecture. But we must note that some statesmen are sometimes mad in their chase of such high-sounding but vague and shadowy names—or what we call vanity, impelled by the raw ambition to command the enthusiastic applause of the general public. On this weak side of their natures I would refrain from wasting any comments; but let me suggest that those who are in charge of our state administration should make it a point to derive even from the use of such a term at least some grains of substantial profits. But what good has Japan been able to glean from that nominal change from protectorate into prefecture? The annexation has brought about no new departure of things. It has gained to Japan no new profits of its own. Whenever other foreign countries execute amalgamations, they never fail, as history proves, to profit themselves thereby by the enactment of new customs tariff law. To cite an example, France on her annexing Madagascar, decided to profit herself by placing the mutual imports and exports on the free list. How, then, about our authorities? One must rather deplore their tremendous stupidity and consider that they have wasted their efforts on what signifies no more than a nominal, not substantial, change, thereby adding to their burdens yen 75,000,000, but grasping nothing wherefrom to derive even an iota of profit in compensation, keeping the Korean conventional tariff unchanged for so long a term as ten years. With regard to this tariff question, several comments seem to be in the mind of the public, and barely kept back for the present, by the satisfaction they feel in having realized the amalgamation. Critics and controversialists at this moment, however, need not hesitate to ventilate their free opinion on the matter. It is one thing to be delighted at the annexation; to discuss the profit or loss attending the means by which the annexation was effected is quite another thing. There is no jumbling of the two. The explanation given by Foreign Minister Count Komura when asked why he decided to leave the customs tariff unchanged for ten years, is sufficiently incomprehensible; being, that it was because the amalgamation was effected not from the economic, but the political, point of view. Chosen long ago lost its existence in the eye of international law. What is more, for the maintenance of its integrity nearly two divisions of our soldiers were stationed there, while our officials of various ranks were stationed throughout the entire length and breadth of the Peninsula. The Korean government in fact had to depend upon instructions of the then Residency General for everything. Under such circumstances what important thing could the Koreans have done even though they had been left alone. If the former ex-emperor liked to adhere to his old intrigue, why, have him reside in our capital and all would go well. We fail to see what there was, from the political view point, that necessitated such a hasty amalgamation. For with such a firm, close grip as Japan had on Korea, if she must view things with so much concern, of what, let us ask, could she ever be free from anxiety? It is a great pity that Count Komura, with vague fanciful term of diplomacy and of administration, tries to charm away the public from the sight of the error be committed in deciding to leave the customs tariff unrevsed for ten years to come. France's amalgamation of Madagascar was made from as much a political standpoint, of course,—but not nearly as independent, as ours is, of an economic view point. Such was also her annexation of Annam and Tongking. In each case France was careful not to neglected benefits for herself by drafting a new tariff law. Nor did England hesitate, either, to reap the full commercial profits, when she annexed Egypt—annexed from the political view point, too. Now the hold, as we said before, that Japan had upon Korea was, from the political standpoint, so secure and consummate that there was no room left for other Powers to interfere with our administration in the Peninsula. The amalgamation of Korea, under such circumstances, therefore presuppose that its motive emanated from economic considerations. With this theory in view, it is manifest that to leave the customs tariff unchanged for ten years is to invert the right relation of things. So far as I understand, it was true that England desired the conventional tariff to be left unchanged for the time being, but it was equally true that the term she wanted to set up for it was a very short period. America was also desirous to have the tariff rates left unaltered, but cannot have anticipated so long a term as Japan set forth. It comes as an irritating surprise to us to find our foreign policy so weak that our authorities should endeavour to ingratiate themselves into the Powers' favour and good will approaching them with so costly a present as the tariff rates unrevised for ten long years. I am one of those who do not wish to employ such terms as "strong foreign policy" or "weak foreign policy" in connection with any diplomatic negotiations or conference. But of this tariff question, the present cabinet, however they may plead, can never escape from the fact that they have been abnormally weak in their foreign policy. Of course in pursuing our own policy in our territory, it is important to give, at the same time, due consideration to the interests of other countries concerned; but it is as much important to note that this never binds any country to refrain from giving preference to its own interests over these of other countries.

The relations, for example, existing between France and Great Britain were, as at present, most cordial and satisfactory. But in the sequel of the former's annexing Madagascar, the latter's product was the sufferer under the new tariff rates. The British merchants lodged a strong protest thereanent, to which, however, France did not listen, carrying at last her point to apply to her new territory her own conventional tariff law.

In the case of Tunis and Algeria also, French statesmen successfully insisted on what they wished to do, notwithstanding the strong protests from British as well as Italian merchants who suffered most under the new tariff rates enforced by France over her new colonies. Due consideration should of course be given to the interests of the Powers in Chosen, but with their universal cognizance of the complete right Japan has acquired in the Peninsula, what is there that justifies our authorities' hesitation in acting up to that right? Not that I insist on the completion abolition at this moment of the conventional tariff so as to have all the Japanese goods to be imported into the Peninsula free of duty, applying to Chosen the Japanese domestic tariff law. Now that Korea is annexed to our Empire, every inch of the land, every person of the populace, claims as much care and consideration as in Japan proper. We should therefore carefully abstain from measures such as would introduce radical change in the economic relations of Japan and Chosen. On the contrary, none could take exception to the enforcement of some specific customs tariff in Chosen for the promotion and encouragement of the Korean trades and industry. For instance, in the peninsula monopolising, as in Japan Proper, such businesses as tobacco and salt, is next to impossible in view of the administrative state of the new territory. In such a case the enactment of some specific customs tariff would be most advisable. Examples of the tariff law modified according to the local conditions, are not difficult to seek in foreign countries also. To Algeria, to begin with, France applies her conventional tariff, but abstains from the tobacco monopoly there, imposing an import duty of 50 centimes per kil. on foreign leaf tobacco, and 2 fr. on cigars and cigarettes. Some articles are taxed at two-thirds of what is imposed in France proper. Alcohol and wines containing over 15.9 of alcohol are taxed at the same rates of duties as in France, while wines imported into Algeria from France proper are also taxed. In Tunis, noted for wine production, special tariff, is also enacted on wines imported into France all being subject to the same import duty as foreign products, so that the French wine merchants may not suffer too much. Then again in Madagascar at first French goods were subject to no import duties while every foreign import was taxed. Later in consideration of local circumstances, consumption taxes were levied on every foreign product, French products being not exempted in this case. But such French products as textiles were assessed at 3 per cent. ad valorem while similar foreign articles paid 13 per cent. ad valorem. This for a time naturally brought about brisk demands for French stuff. Afterwards however, seeing that 13 per cent. was not enough to drive away foreign products, France decided to levy a very heavy tax on them, creating new items of tariff. To observe further, in French Indies, France is applying on the whole her domestic tariff rates, but according to local conditions such articles as hemp cloth and hemp bags that possess but little chance of being imported from France, are placed on the free lists. In France proper, milk and domestic animals are subject to duties, but not in French Indies, nor is there a monopoly on the manufacture of tobacco. As for goods and articles to be exported from French Indies into foreign countries, export duties are imposed on them, but not those coming into France, while such as Chinawares, honey, hides and skins, and wooden wares can be exported free of duty whether into France or other foreign countries. Thus, as is clear from the above observations, France is not applying all her domestic tariff rates to French Indies, but there she is endeavouring to encourage various branches of industry and to ensure the prosperity of every trade and commerce, introducing special customs tariff in response to the requirement of the local conditions. Turning to England, we find her working in the same direction also with regard to her several colonies. For, notwithstanding her wedded belief in the advantages of free trade, she levies in Egypt an import duty of 8 per cent. and export duty of 1 per cent. on every product British or foreign, except tobaccos which should of course be placed under a special tariff rate. As to some Egyptian products going into the interior of the African continent, an export duty of 5 per cent is imposed, while on such as gums a pretty high rate of duty is levied. In India, the uniform rate of 5 per cent is imposed on all imports except live stocks which are on the free lists. As regards exports they are for the most part free of duty with the exception of rice. Thus England it will be observed, does not adopt for her colonies the free trade system wherein she believes so heartily. The French are a people who are fond of uniform systems in regard to every matter. But in Guinea both France and Portugal impose export duties, but no import duties. Later however the tariff rates seem to have been a little modified since France came to place Guinea and Genegar together under one Governorship. In Java, Holland imposes both import and export duties on all products whether domestic or foreign—but under the varied rates of tariff, so much for Java, so much for Sumatra, and so on, according to local conditions in the islands. Such a wise policy speaks eloquently of the talent and wisdom of the authorities. It is a most striking contrast that while every other country thus attaches so much importance to the tariff policy regarding her own colonies, Japanese authorities can remain so reproachfully indifferent toward the tariff policy in the new territory and put aside its consideration for ten long years. We cannot but doubt whether our authorities can ever comprehend what the colonial policy is and also what is the real significance of our possessing the Peninsula. Many are the deplorable failings we can find about the way our officials proceeded in the annexation of Korea, among which the failure in their tariff policy stands must conspicuous and must deal a death blow to our general commerce and industry—I mean that failure which they made in leaving the conventional tariff unchanged for ten years. Not that this is unchangeable, inasmuch as it is no more than their declaration. Yet as a matter of fact it would be almost next to impossible to alter at this moment what they have already decided and communicated as the will of our country to all the Powers, without exposing the country to possible loss of countenance. So all that we can now do is to pity the inability and ignorance of our authorities at large.

The affairs of the state should not be administered with such a simple aim in view as to command the temporary applause of the general public. Farsightedness is the essential quality that makes up an able statesman. Detail is necessary to perfection; but at the same time large understanding must underlie progressive attainment. The valleys must be cultivated, but a general range of view must be sought from hill tops. The execution of the amalgamation that means an additional national burden of yen 75,000,000, and eventually over yen 800,000,000 naturally claims the exercise, to the utmost, of the most careful consideration and calculation regarding the interests and welfare of our State. To launch into any course without exercising due consideration and proper circumspection, impelled by the raw ambition to win, like the "Sōshi" actors, the general public's applause only, is absolutely prohibitive of successful discharge, as good and faithful ministers of State, of that grave, weighty responsibility which devolves upon their shoulders.

It is my most sincere desire that those who may in future be in charge of our State should take warning from their predecessors failures, and bear in mind that any raw ambition aspiring for vague, temporary popularity alone, when given the free rein, will produce in its immediate train such an irrecoverable blunder.

PRESENT PROBLEMS OF TOKYO.

BY PROFESSOR ABE.

(TRANSLATED FROM THE "SUN.")

Problems concerning the general interest of Tokyo city naturally require solution when approached from the view point of the city itself. Partial interest may therefore, with all propriety, be sacrificed if necessary, for the general interest of the city. It is plain the improvement of the city is impossible so long as each ward is ready to consider its own interest alone. We cannot but regret that the various problems of Tokyo as a city spring from nothing but conflicts of interest, general and local, the former too often being sacrificed to the latter. Instances in point are not hard to find; some good illustrations being such problems as "unification of the primary school systems," "fish-market-removal," and also that old question of "tramfare increase."

While the citizens' indifference toward the municipal administration must be a matter of profound regret the decided lack of the sense of public interest on the part of the ward and municipal councils is astonishing. Those elected as honorary members, considering the no small measure of burdens the citizens are bearing for city improvement, should reckon, not the interest alone of each ward they represent, but the general interest of the city en masse. This is the only way for them to prove themselves worthy of the important trust reposed in them by the citizens.

None but the pugnacious and near-sighted who can see nothing ahead but their own interests, would fail to recognize the paramount necessity of unifying the primary school systems. So this problem leaves little room now for any further comment, but we may in brief point out some of the weighty reasons that render the unification imperative.

In the first place, we must notice that there is striking inadequacy in the number of primary school houses for the reception of children who have attained school age. We learn that such elementary schools as are following the so-called "bi-daily instruction" method, number just 69 at present, receiving 30,500 children. This shows that, supposing the whole number of the school-children to be roughly 150,000, one-fifth are being instructed, and that under an imperfect system of education. And since, according to this make-shift method of instruction, one-half of the first-year class children are to attend school in the morning, and the other half in the afternoon, the immense loss to which the latter half are inevitably subjected, is quite obvious. Everyone wishes to study in the forenoon while the brain is fresh, and to take rest or exercise in the afternoon when feeling dull and tired. This must especially be the case with children. Besides, in such a hot month as June or July, children can not attend school in the afternoon without more or less injury to their health, while it must really be hard work on the part of school-teachers, too, to teach daily, as they have to, under the present system, for eight consecutive hours from morning till evening. Of course as they are granted a special remuneration for this extra work, no complaint is heard from the teachers, but this nevertheless produces bad effects upon the children's instruction, resulting from the doubling of the instructors' usual duty hours of 4-5 a day. This is one of the most serious losses children suffer under the present defective system.

In this connection, turning as far back as some ten years, we remember that the Governor of Tokyo-fu instructed the city as to the increased construction of primary schools. Accordingly the municipality, in the 32nd year of Meiji, formed the so-called, "Ten Year Plan,"—or a scheme spread over a period of ten years, deciding to establish new primary schools and affording each ward the necessary funds for the construction. Now the fixed ten years have passed but no more than 74 schools have been added, falling short by 16 of the required number. This situation, coupled with a timely suggestion recently made by the Governor to the municipal assembly for the establishment of 18 elementary primary schools, brings us face to face with the urgent necessity for increased construction of primary schools. To abolish entirely the present make-shift method, so as to give perfect education to the school boys and girls to the number of 30,000, presupposes the speedy construction of at least some 42 schools buildings. When to this we add 15 higher primary schools, that is, one per ward throughout the city, the gross number of school-houses to be built is 57, while the cost of their construction will amount to some £4,000,000. Such an enormous expenditure is far beyond the taxation capacity of the ward. There is, therefore, no way but to leave the undertaking with the competent municipality and thus unify the school system.

Another reason calling for the unification of the school system is found in the decided inequality of the burden of educational expenditure borne by the different wards. For instance the ward of Koishikawa, bearing the heaviest burden of educational expenses, imposes on its residents 20 per cent. additional taxes, the maximum amount permitted by law, whereas such a ward as Kojimachi, only levies 10 per cent. additional taxes.

Then again, we can see a similar range in the salaries of school teachers: a certain principal of a school in Nihonbashi is said to draw a monthly salary to the amount of £75, while one in Azabu receives but £35. We may further observe that the salary of a fully qualified teacher of the elementary primary school in Nihonbashi is 28 yen; in Azabu, 24 yen; and that of the higher primary school teacher is 32 yen in Nihonbashi, but 25 yen in Azabu. Such inequality in the remuneration of teachers in the same city is a very undesirable condition.

Coming on to the subject of school accommodations, some schools have playgrounds paved with asphalt while some others have grounds coated with ballast; in winter season, stoves are provided in some schools, while in others no heating arrangements are provided. A comparison of educational cost, shows that in Nihon-bashi to be yen 14,152, while that in Akasaka, is no more than yen 7,905. All these observations bring into view a great disparity existing in the method of providing for schools. On the strength of our belief that the same education should be given to all children living in the same city, we should most positively stand against such inequality in both school accommodations and treatment of school teachers and maintain that unification of school system be effected by all means. To our regret and surprise, however, this long discussed question of the school system unification at length came up, late last year, crystallizing into the "Bill of Compromise" as it was called, which fixed that:

"The ward, in case of new building, reconstructing or augmenting primary schools prescribed by the Governor, is to have one-third of the construction expenditure supported by the municipality."

"When the ward finds itself unable to meet the above indicated proportion, the municipality is to construct special schools instead."

Thus the question came to an end. And yet we feel hardly relieved of the anxiety as to whether such a partial—for it cannot but be partial—solution of the question can promptly make good the supplementary construction of the required number of schools, and also whether such wards as stood against the school system unification can bear the two-thirds of construction expenses which they fixed for themselves; we fear that the construction of schools may, on many wise pretexts as before, be postponed and protracted. Moreover, as things point, even though the present make-shift method may be dispensed with, and the increased construction of necessary schools be carried out, it means nothing but a partial solution of the primary school problems of Tokyo city, while immediately ahead are the weighty questions bearing on the aforesaid disparity of educational expenses, the inequality in the treatment of teachers, and also in school accommodations.

Now why is it that the members of the ward and municipal councils did not endorse the unification of the school system? The reason is clear. Such anti-unification wards as Nihon-bashi, Kyobashi, Kanda and Kojimachi, hitherto finding more or less surplus in their educational expenditure, anticipated the possible increase such unification, when realised, would add to their taxation. It must have been partly because of this, that they tried to veto the school system unification bill, with every plea and pretext, hung upon whatever peg possible. We should not, however, fail to look deeper into the bottom and find some "bigger" reasons for their dissent.

UNION CHURCH LADIES' AUXILIARY.

In printing the following we acknowledge the courtesy of the Japan Gazette :—

The members of the Union Church Ladies' Auxiliary gave a very successful "social" Monday, in the form of a "house warming" in the Parlours of the new Church. The parlours were opened in the afternoon from four to six, and again in the evening from eight o'clock, when between two and three hundred members and friends were present. The large Schoolroom and the Church Parlours were converted into one large room, which was very tastefully decorated with greenery, etc. Mrs. D. H. Blake with Mrs. L. Pollard and Mrs. A. L. Bagnall, formed a Reception Committee, and welcomed the guests. The various stalls were presided over by the following ladies :—

FANCY WORK—Mrs. A. E. Hinch, Mrs. F. Booth, Mrs. L. Watson, Mrs. J. A. Rabbitt, and Miss Griffin.

HOME MADE SWEETS—Mrs. D. MacKenzie, Mrs. H. S. Stetson, and Miss Colton.

HOME MADE JAMS.—Mrs. Manley, Mrs. W. F. Fellowes Lukis, and Mrs. W. M. Squire.

HANDKERCHIEFS.—Mrs. A. Cabeldu, Mrs. H. Geddes, and Miss Bunting.

POSTCARDS (containing views of New Church Building)—Miss Booth.

In addition to the above there was a Gallery of Famous Paintings—a very artistic arrangement for which Mr. and Mrs. P. A. Holt were responsible, and which was very largely patronised during the evening.

A short musical programme was presented under the direction of Mr. S. H. Somerton (Organist and Choirmaster). To this Miss Booth, Miss Bunting, Mr. J. E. Moss and Mr. Somerton contributed songs, and Miss Moulton a pianoforte solo.

Refreshments were served under the direction of Mrs. E. S. Booth, Mr. L. Pollard, and Mrs. J. L. Dearing, assisted by Miss Manley, Miss Lippett, Miss Graham, Miss Scott, Miss Worden, Miss Hans, and Miss Mitchell.

We are asked by the Ladies' Auxiliary to express their hearty thanks to Messrs. Curnow and Co., Messrs. Vincent, Bird & Co., and Messrs. Lane, Crawford & Co. for contributions; to the ladies and gentlemen who kindly assisted in the musical programme; and to the local Press for assistance.

THE FIGHTING IN LISBON.

REVOLUTIONARY LEADER'S ACCOUNT.

Lisbon, October 7.

Senhor Machado introduced me, writes the special correspondent of the Daily Mail, to a prominent revolutionary, black-bearded professor with dark mane of hair. He gave me the first detailed official account of the fighting in the capital in which he, as commander of the Alcantra district under the revolutionary directorate, played a prominent part.

Alcantra was, as the working men's residential quarter, the hotbed of disaffection, and the leaders of the conspiracy appointed Da Silva to organize the revolution there.

Da Silva said: "According to our arrangement one of three cruisers in our secret gave the signal for the rising by three cannon shots at 1 a.m. on Tuesday morning, and the signal was duly acknowledged by the artillery firing three shots.

"People, hearing the cannonade, went to the barracks of the 26th Regiment of Infantry, crying 'Viva a Republica!' The soldiers fraternised with the crowd.

"The 16th Infantry and the 1st Artillery then proceeded to the Avenida da Liberdade, on the heights near the Edward VII. Park, to take up the positions assigned to them by the conspirators. If at this moment the monarchy had possessed a general of only average ability the revolution could have been nipped in the bud, for of seven regiments in the garrison five were loyal to the Crown.

"The hated Municipal Guard turned out to quell the rising and popular excitement, and fired on the crowd, which retaliated with hand grenades. The 16th Infantry, reinforced by hundreds of citizens with rifles and bandoliers, together with a battery of artillery, drove back the Municipal Guard with heavy loss.

"After the fight in the Rua Saraiva de Carvalho, the Municipal Guard fell back on the Commercio Square, while the Chasseurs and the 2nd and 5th Infantry regiments were entrenched on the Rocio Square.

"The revolutionaries now held two positions on the Avenida Heights and the Marine Barracks at Alcantra, where I was in command.

"At 5 a.m. the 4th Loyal Cavalry passed the barracks. We gave them a hot reception from behind our fortifications, I using my rifle like the rest. The cavalry fled, and then for seven hours there was a truce.

"At noon the Queluz battery made a last desperate attempt to redeem the fortunes of the day. Their six guns bravely challenged our twenty-one pieces. Their half a hundred of men made a splendid, if vain, resistance against our two thousand or more. We drove them back and captured two guns.

"An hour later the 1st and 2nd Infantry regiments attacked our position, but the cruisers in the harbour opened fire, so that the Monarchists were taken between the fire from the Avenida heights and from the river.

"As the royal palace was near and the moment had come for energetic measures, we bombarded the royal residence. Desultory firing continued all day, and at 8.10 next (Wednesday) morning, the loyal troops on the Rocio square surrendered and were disarmed, amid cries of 'Long live the Republic.'"

STATE OF THE CITY.

Lisbon, Oct. 7, 3.20 a.m.

I have just walked through a great part of Lisbon, and the most absolute tranquillity prevails. No serious fighting has occurred since Tuesday morning at ten o'clock, although as late as this (Thursday) evening there were some skirmishes.

Estimates of the dead and wounded vary enormously, but 500 seems to be near the truth. Pickets of troops hold the principal squares, and soldiers, and sailors are posted at street corners.

As I write, sailors with fixed bayonets sit right and left of me in the principal telegraph office. A huge sheet of glass at the counter has been shattered by a hand grenade.

The most remarkable thing about the Portuguese revolution is that on no side is any expression of regret for the monarchy to be heard. People do not even take interest in the fate of King Manoel, whose whereabouts does not seem to be known.

Lisbon, October 7, 3.30 p.m.

Morning impressions of Lisbon after the revolution confirm the fleeting impressions received last night beneath the stars. The capital has resumed its normal life. Save for the red and green cockades seen everywhere, knotted in the soldiers' epaulettes, twisted in the fishwives' hair, fastened on horses and mules, a visitor would never dream that Portugal has just witnessed the passing of the House of Braganza.

Now and again bodies of soldiers in dirty linen uniforms, preceded by a band playing the stirring Republican hymn, pass across the squares, arousing tremendous enthusiasm. But order is nowhere disturbed. In fact, the perfect tranquillity everywhere reigning seems wholly incompatible with the fact that the people has had the capital in its power for the past three days.

I was received this morning by Senhor Bernardino Machado, the new Minister of Foreign Affairs, at his house in the Estrella quarter. The Minister, who had slept only one hour during the night, is a short, bright-eyed lawyer, with a neat white beard.

After assuring me of the desire of the Republican Government to continue the monarchy's traditional friendly relations with Britain, he begged me to assure myself that absolute order was now reigning everywhere, not only in the capital but throughout the new Republic.

"The Portuguese people," he said, "go from one extreme to another. They have long patiently suffered the worst abuses of monarchy, but finally the national pride was roused. The supreme moment came, and it shook itself free of the yoke. But even in the moment of revolution the proud dignity of the race revealed itself. Once the initial resistance was overcome, the people's one desire was not to exact reprisals, but to recollect that all the Portuguese are one race.

"Thus you might have seen the captain of the Municipal Guards, after been overcome, walking about Lisbon unmolested, and on the Rocio square the populace applauded the loyal troops when they surrendered on the triumph of the revolution."

ceeded to the residence of Prince Fushimi. A banquet was given in honour of the Chinese Prince, Marquis Katsura, the Premier, and other Ministers of State. General Oku, and Vice-Admiral Ijima being present. In the afternoon Prince Tsai Hsun visited the Military Academy, where he inspected the training of the students from China, at which he expressed his great satisfaction.

THE PRIME MINISTER'S SPEECH AT THE MEETING OF CLEARING HOUSES, OCT. 23RD, 1910.

(TRANSLATION)

Looking back at the financial and economic changes that have taken place since the meeting held in this place the year before last, it is a source of much gratification to me as, doubtless to you also, gentlemen, to find that, although there have been some deviations, the general course of events is steadily advancing as foreseen.

With regard to the state of affairs that existed at the time when I first set myself to the work of adjusting the finances, it is fresh in the memory of us all that to meet the heavy expenses incurred during and after the war, not only were our national debts abruptly increased, but in the matter of taxation also addition after addition was inevitable, the result being that an uneasy feeling was engendered concerning our finance; our State securities fell seriously in domestic and foreign markets, which influence spread widely throughout economic circles at home, and, happening to synchronise with a period of disturbance in Japan and foreign countries, developed profound dimensions, so that our economics experienced a time of many events and numerous difficulties. Fortunately the Government and the people alike appreciated the roots of the trouble, and uniting their strength, applied it to measures of aid, so that finally we have arrived at the conditions existing to-day. The Government has devoted its energies to adjusting the finances; has had due regard to equilibrium between income and expenditure in the yearly budgets; has consolidated the finances and strengthened them; has carried out a scheme for redeeming State securities; has conducted adjustment during the current year so as to ease the people's burdens; is endeavouring gradually to bring about harmony between finance and economics, and, following the policy of habitual concord between official and private measures of finance, is exerting all its strength for that purpose. Thus our country's finance and economics are mutually and gradually tending to a condition of strength, as is plainly perceptible. Hence it is not only essential and proper that this fixed financial policy should be continued long and thoroughly, but also in proportion as the horizon of the national destiny expands and as the responsibilities of the Empire at home and abroad grow weightier, the bases of our finances and economics must be made firm, so that that most essential desideratum, the country's strength, may be fully developed. Nothing is more imperative, and therefore the Government is determined resolutely to maintain its fixed policy in the matter of finance. It is true that in compiling the Budget for next year many enterprises and institutions present themselves for consideration, but the Government will adhere to its policy.

I. In the general budget equilibrium shall be maintained between outgoings and incomings, and recourse will not be had to loans.

II. The plan shall be adhered to of redeeming at least 50 million yen of State bonds with the object of strengthening confidence in these securities. This policy shall be regarded as fundamental. Not even a partial change shall be permissible, and fullest care will be taken to preserve harmony between the above two courses, while at the same time providing for the necessary expansion of administrative duties at home and abroad and having due regard to expediency. The Budget for next year has been drawn up in accordance with these principles, and you may rest assured, gentlemen, of the fact.

The uniform and cardinal policy of this Empire ever since the opening of the country has been to preserve the peace of the Far East and to guarantee the safety of the State. All countries are now firmly convinced of our earnest desire for peace. Our alliance with England grows steadily closer, and the two countries, walking hand in hand, are labouring for the preservation of peace as a matter of course. Moreover, our relations with other countries are perfectly friendly and satisfactory, which is a matter of sincere congratulation in the nation's interests. Since my assumption of office I have had profound regard for the actual conditions of the Empire, and have considered the history of the past, my resultant conviction being that nothing is more imperative than to preserve peace. Therefore from the outset I devoted all my energies to cultivating a pacific policy, and day and night I have never ceased to toil for the increase of the nation's prosperity. Since then preparedness of the national defence has a large and important bearing upon the preservation of peace, I have habitually paid most careful attention to this point; and in view of the fact that there has been a change in the tendency of ship-building, so that the form of war ships has materially altered, it becomes necessary for the preservation of our country's naval position that we should keep pace with this change in other lands by adopting corresponding alterations. This is unavoidable, and as a consequence alterations have to be made in our plan of naval construction. Fortunately the practical operation of our fixed financial policy has so consolidated it that we find no difficulty in meeting this necessity in the national defences, and while preserving harmony between them and the finances, we are able to provide the required funds out of the ordinary Revenue. Thus in a period of 6 years, commencing from next fiscal year, a sum of 80 million yen will be added to the fixed continuing expenses of the Navy. I am persuaded that it will be fully understood at home and abroad that this step is taken solely with the object of preserving peace and that it will be carried out within the limits of supplementing the naval strength strictly with a view to the imperative dictates of national defence. It also affords me great satisfaction to be able to say that the problem of national defence has been solved without any conflict with the financial policy and that its solution is feasible without producing any effect upon the people's finances.

The floods this year were of extraordinary dimensions and the degree of damage wrought was proportionately large. The greatest sympathy must be felt with the sufferers. It is matter for the deepest thankfulness that all classes showed chivalry in devising and giving effect to measures of relief. The Government also instructed its subordinates to spare no pains in indicating and superintending remedial devices suitable to the emergency. Full investigations have not yet been carried out as to the works needed for purposes of restoration, but the amount required has been ascertained approximately, and the Government has made arrangements for paying out relief funds with all expedition so soon as the examination is concluded. Further, in the case of outlays which will have to be borne by the localities and which will call for the issue of local loans, the Government will give every facility to lighten the result. Since, however, the question of river control has a vital bearing on the permanent well being of the country and on the security of life and property, temporary measures or works of mere restoration can not by any means be deemed sufficient. Therefore steps will be taken for investigating the problem in all its bearings and carrying out some permanent and sufficing measure. To that end a committee of investigation has been appointed and on receipt of its recommendations the Government will give due consideration to the subject.

With regard to the annexation of Korea, you doubtless gathered his Majesty's intentions from the Rescript issued on the 29th of August, and as you are already acquainted with the subsequent course of events I need not detail them. It is enough to say that annexation was effected without any disturbance whatever, and that it has contributed materially to the cause of peace in the Far East. That by this measure more than 10 millions of persons have become direct subjects of His Majesty and are placed in a position to enjoy the blessing of his rule as well as to promote their own prosperity by adopting the appliances of civilization, is an unprecedented achievement. I venture to trust that my countrymen, appreciating His Majesty's intention, will treat their new fellow-subjects with kindness and consideration. As for the expenses of administration in Korea, it is true that they will have to be borne by this Empire, but as considerable sums have already been advanced under various headings and as the Chosen outlays are to be included in a special account, while, at the same time, every precaution has been taken to make them go as far as possible, a small amount by way of supplement to the outlays hitherto made will suffice. It is thus expected that Korea, after annexation, will not prove to be any incubus on the general finances. As for the bonds and other pecuniary obligations incurred by the Korean Government, means of redeeming them had already been devised, so they will not constitute any new burden or exercise any influence on the Empire's finances. In a word, while the political relations resulting from amalgamation are large, the financial bearings are comparatively small, whereas the developments of the Peninsula's resources in future are of great financial importance to Japan and demand careful consideration. It is to be sincerely hoped that you, gentlemen, will, by earnest investigation and effort, establish constantly closer economic relations with the new territory, hasten the assimilation and amity of its people and thus consummate the purpose of the amalgamation.

With regard to the consolidation of bonds commenced this year, extraordinary progress was made owing to your great assistance, so that, up to to-day, out of the bonds whose redemption period had arrived, some 500 million yen have already been dealt with. The success of such a great undertaking as consolidation cannot be predicted until a long time has passed, but that such a large number of bonds have been dealt with in the short space of half a year, and that the new four-per-cent. are keeping their value in the market is a clear proof that consolidation has progressed favourably thus far. It is the Government's intention to proceed similarly with the high interest bearing bonds. Having once commenced this work, it is only right and proper to carry it to completion. But as some misapprehensions appear to exist, I take this opportunity of making a definite statement.

In connexion with consolidation it is of course important not to disturb the market by the introduction of large blocks of foreign capital. As a matter of fact the total sum thus introduced hitherto does not exceed 20 millions, and I bespeak your attention to the obviously insignificant effect that such a small sum is capable of producing. Nevertheless it cannot be doubted that because of consolidation an unexpectedly large movement of capital has been witnessed at home, and as a result there has been an increase of idle capital in the domestic market. Unceasing attention has been devoted to this subject and measures have been taken to call up a part of the unemployed capital; as by floating industrial debentures which constitute an avenue of distribution; or by endeavouring to equalize the rates of interest throughout the country; or by issuing exchequer bills, and by other devices. Happily up to the present, in spite of continued dullness of the money market, no evil phenomenon has hitherto presented itself. The Government, fully conscious of the many factors that influence the money market, will continue to exercise the utmost circumspection. The history of finances in our country shows a tendency to localization, and endeavours will now be made to distribute the surplus capital lying idle in the great centres to the provinces so as to equalize the rate of interest and encourage the spirit of enterprise. The finances of the localities are still in an undeveloped condition and means of correcting that defect so as to promote the progress of agriculture and industry are still needed.

As to economic conditions, examination of facts and reference to statistics show that beyond question sound enterprises are developing and strengthening their bases. From January to September this year, the sums devoted to increasing and establishing banks and companies reached a total of 363 million yen. This indicates a really great rate of development. Especially when we observe that the above total includes 60 millions on account of enterprises started during the era of industrial fever, and temporarily abandoned until taken up again this year. These facts make it easy to perceive that the economic conditions are undergoing a change. Issues of debentures are also numerous. They reached 60 millions in the above period; a most significant figure when we observe that the total issue of such securities at the close of 1909 was only 130 millions. Moreover, the rate of interest showed marked decline. On every side evidences are visible as to the strength of the financial position and the ease of the money market. The evil state of affairs which we had all to lament some time ago, has now made way for the dawn of a better era. It must be observed, however, that the unhealthy elements of our economics do not come from external causes only: they are derived also from want of confidence in our business-men and from the nature of their enterprises. It is therefore to be earnestly hoped that every effort will be made to correct what is defective and strengthen what is worthy, so as to promote the development of the country and consolidate the national strength.

ASIATIC SOCIETY OF JAPAN.

A General meeting of the Asiatic Society of Japan was held in Tokyo on October 19.

The Secretary reported as elected to membership:—Montgomery Schuyler, Esq., American Embassy, Tokyo; M. T. Paske-Smith, Esq., H.B.M. Consular Service; Rev. J. J. Chapman, Nara; H. Ball, Esq., (Japan Herald); Miss Katherine M. Ball, San Francisco; Rev. J. C. Pringle, Hiroshima, Rev. W. A. Richards, St. Andrew's House, Tokyo; M. D. Dunning, Kyoto; R. M. P. Austin, Esq., Tokyo.

The Chairman, Rev. Arthur Lloyd, then introduced G. B. Sansom, Esq., of the British Consular Service, who read his Translations of the Lyrical Drama (Nō) as follows.

TRANSLATIONS FROM THE NŌ.

I have ventured to preface these translations with the following observations on the value of the Nō, which I should have spared the Society, had there not recently fallen into my hand a translation of Sumidagawa, in the Trans. R.S.L. xxix., where one of the translators, Dr. Marie Stopes, sets forth in some detail her estimate of these plays—an estimate which appearing in such a place, I felt ought not to pass unchallenged.

It is a commonplace of literary history that critics are often in danger of overpraising works in a language foreign to them. They do not realize their imperfections, and they see their beauties veiled, distorted, and sometimes magnified in a mist of incomplete understanding. In this present case the danger is increased by more than usual divergence of language and customs, by wider difference of time and space.

LANGUAGE OF THE NŌ.

It is hardly necessary to premise that the text of the Nō can be roughly divided into prose and verse. The prose is in a stilted mediæval dialect, with free use of sōrō, and rather compressed in form. The verse varies from flat descriptive portions, roughly divided in the 5- and 7-syllabled phrases, to more correct and lyrical passages. There is no definite line between the two, but the actual spoken prose is invariably the "sōrō bun" above mentioned, while some of the chanted portions are really nothing but prose with some metrical phrasing. The following quotations will serve to make this clear:—

(SHOSON).

Benkei, speaks. Sara ni mono-mōde no keshiki wa niyennu yoshi mōshi sōrō.

Yoshitsune, speaks. Moto yori kakugo no maye nareba

Nanihodo no kotono aru beki zo to Benkei, chants. Sono mama yagate on za wo tachi

Shidzuka wa kisenaga mairasu-u

Yoshitsune kore wo mesaretsutsu

On hakase wo totte shidzu shidzu to Chumon no ro ni ide tamai and so on. The first spoken sentence is purely colloquial, a little high flown, perhaps, but prose. The next is roughly phrased, and the succeeding descriptive passage, sung in strophe and antistrophe by actors and chorus, is in fairly regular 7-5 succession. I insist upon this point, because Dr. Stopes renders the prose speeches into a sort of blank verse which strikes me as being particularly inappropriate. The reason is that "English prose is too prosy, and a very different thing from the Japanese prose chants in the originals." Certainly English prose is different from the Japanese prose. It does well to remain prosy, and not to usurp the functions of verse. But it is quite untrue to assert that because these spoken words are "well nigh indistinguishable from the songs," they are any the less prose. The solution is that some of the songs verge on the prosaic. Hence the similarity of prose and verse.

To come to details regarding the style of the more important part of these plays—that is, the chanted lyrical portions—the chief features may be set forth as follows:

CLASSICAL QUOTATIONS.

- (1) Wealth of classical allusion.
 - (2) Classical quotation, and generally unstinted borrowing of phrases and passages from older literature.
 - (3) The play on words, in all its manifestations.
- Of (1) and (2) it need only now be said that the reverence for antiquity, which has always been a sterilizing influence in Japanese literature, makes of plagiarism and wholesale adaptation a literary virtue and not a crime.

WORD PLAYS.

Coming to word plays of all sorts. These occur with great frequency. There are numbers of regularly recurring puns which the experienced reader can always foresee. Thus in the michiyuki, or passages describing a journey, an almost sure find is some phrase like

Omoitatsu tabigoromo

hi mo haru baru koshiji no suye where tatsu has the double sense of 'to set out' and 'to cut out' (garments), while hi mo refers both to 'days' and to 'cords' (for tying up garments).

Take such a passage as the michiyuki from Hanjo. "Mata tachi kayeru Tabigoromo Urayama sugite Mino no kuni Nogami no sato ni Tsuki ni keru." It is laden with word-plays. Tachi is there, the inseparable companion of Tabigoromo, Ura, the lining of a garment, mi, the body, no, linen. The plays baffle with them and in some editions the less obvious ones are carefully pointed out by the editor.

ALLITERATION, ETC.

A similar form of ornament is, strangely enough, one which is considered a blemish by us—the repetition of a sound at close interval. Thus Akatsuki goto no aka no midzu,

Awake yo ni awaba ya,

Shinobu ni nitaru Shinowara no,

Mi no hakanasa yo Sayohime ga,

...Nanwa Na ni wa Yejima to inagara,

where we have a sort of perverted internal rhyme, and Kami wa Kamogawa, Shimo wa Shirakawa.

Tasuke tamae ya, tabi bito yo.

with alliterative effect.

CONVENTIONAL EPITHETS.

The conventional epithet is used freely. Now it is the ordinary pillow word, and now a less stereotyped phrase, as where, in order to introduce the word nori (law) we have the preliminary sentence about mounting (nori) on stilts,—of complete irrelevance.

Chikuba ni izaya nori no michi

Of course these had long been favourite devices in Japanese verse and prose. The Heike Monogatari, for instance, (the immediate source of much that characterises the language of the Nō) swarms with pivots, puns and pillow words, with conventional epithets and stereotyped phraseology. In the face of the great popularity of the Nō among the educated class it is useless to deny that there is a certain attraction in this welter of literary stratagems. The charm exists, it is true, and even the foreigner, who attends with sympathy, cannot fail to be interested. There is a pedantic pleasure in piecing together scraps of classical learning, and a thrill, no doubt, on recognizing apt quotations from some ancient favourite. But this is the charm of the curio shop, not the beauty of language and thought.

TO WHAT EXTENT JUSTIFIABLE.

It may be objected, that, after all, rhyme itself is artificial, and constricts the limits of expression in verse, and that it is therefore illogical to condemn mechanical ornaments which are as much the natural outcome of the spirit of this language as rhyme and metrical ornament of another. All this is a question of degree, in deciding which it must be remembered that our finest verse is neither rhymed nor charged with metaphor. Its sole essentials are rhythm and elevation.

The gentlemen who have favoured me with instruction in the various branches of the Nō have all insisted upon its suggestiveness and some have pointed out that it was excellent moral discipline. It speaks, they say, not to the ear, but to the heart. The meaning does not lie in the words, which are few, but outside them; and this is the secret of their beauty. In theory this is excellent, for we know the success which attends this principle of suggestiveness in other domains of art, but here I mistrust the genuineness of much of the sensation evoked. Conventional stimulus will produce conventional response. Generally speaking the Japanese claim for the Nō these beauties—compression, elevation and suggestion—which they derive from the methods sketched above.

ATMOSPHERE.

The other components of the style are naturally such as defy classification and, unluckily, vanish in translation. Over many pieces there seems to breed an indescribable atmosphere of melancholy, a weird feeling of woe and disaster. This is a distinct charm, but I imagine it to be due more to the fine restraint of stage setting, much assisted by the monotony of the chant and the solemn, impassive gait of the performers, than to any qualities of the text.

MUSIC.

As for the music of the Nō, which is really all-important, the chanting of the chorus is most effective, though at times monotonous. It is as a rule both impressive and appropriate and has, on occasion, a stirring rhythm. The orchestral music, accompanied by shrieks of "Ha-O" with variations, I confess to hearing with resentment. At times the flute strikes in with a long drawn note that has a strange and moving quality of sadness. But so has the amina's pipe in quiet streets at midnight, or, for that matter, a siren from the heart of a sea fog.

DR. STOPES' ESTIMATE.

Such being roughly the features of these plays, we may now examine the statements in the work of Dr. Stopes above quoted. Speaking of the Nō in general she says "There is in the whole a ring of fire and splendour, of pain and pathos, which none but a cultured Japanese can fully appreciate, but which we Westerners might hear, though the sounds be muffled, if we would only incline our ears. I have knelt for eight hours at a time at a Nō performance, listening to sounds which seemed to me to express more perfectly the poetry and unutterable sadness of life than any other combination of sound man has devised, Wagner's musical dramas included." I can truthfully say that I have inclined my ears (more particularly in the early days of my enthusiasm for the Nō) and listened to more than one performance with sympathy and enjoyment. Few of us have sufficient staying power to cope with eight hours of even the finest literature and music in the world; from which I infer that there must have been something outside the Nō which held Dr Stopes' attention—the comparative novelty, the exotic speech and surrounding, the mystery of the half-revealed? Frankly, I must admit I never heard the ring of fire and splendour, nor did I discover any perfect expression of the poetry of life. But it sounds reasonable to say that none but a cultured Japanese can appreciate these beauties to the full. Let us hear what a cultured Japanese has to say on the subject. According to Mr. Tanaka Sōhei:—

JAPANESE ESTIMATES.

"From every point of view it is one of the pre-eminent arts of the world. It is the flower of the Yamato stock. Every art reflects the spirit of a given people at a given time and remembering this, we must hold it remarkable that the affections of our people should be retained by an art which arose 600 years ago. In the West there is no art with such a pedigree. This shows that the Nō represents the national spirit, and is complete in every respect. Its endurance for 600 years is moreover a gratifying proof of the flourishing growth of the Yamato race."

One is breathless before such criticism. He continues

"The use of old Chinese and Japanese poems is frequent. This from an artistic point of view, is a very effective device. These classical quotations suggest ideas. They are a sort of token or tally, the use of which brings connected scenes and facts before the eye. Similarly with the word-plays. They allow of great compression in the style, they are terse and yet full of elegance and feeling."

Mr. Ōwada Kenjū, a well-known scholar and a most prolific editor and commentator of the Nō, says of the use of certain catchwords and catch-phrases in the enacted dialogues that

"On the one hand they assist the harmony, on the other make them easy to learn by heart."

He points out as a praiseworthy feature the skilful manner in which the dialogue is kept from wearisome length by one of the parties' purposely changing the subject. Thus (Tamura):—

Waki,...and what is yonder temple, whence comes the noise of people thronging in?

Shite,...That is Onodera. But see, how from behind the ridge of Otowa the moon emerging shines, etc.

And so on throughout.

One cannot be expected to adopt such principles of criticism as these, though it is sometimes urged that any one literature must be a law unto itself, and that its achievements must be judged by their approach to its ideals. This is to deny the existence of absolute standards of taste, and I know of no warrant for assuming that beauty is a question of geography. No less than in matter, there is an orderly evolution in standards of art and letters, and it is plain enough that we have an early stage of progress in a style whose chief merit lies in verbal dexterities, limited alike in number and scope, in the iteration of an unvarying set of moral and aesthetic sentiments, and in an abundant display of classical lore; where the learned sock may not be taken off, and where freshness of thought and expression is regarded almost as impertinences.

It would be idle to deny any value to these works. They have considerable beauties, and having regard to the period and the environment in which they were produced, are not unworthy monuments of Japanese literature. The point I wish to make is that there is no need for Schwaner, and that their extraordinary popularity during the last few years is hardly merited. It is, moreover, likely to influence production adversely. Dr. Stopes says "I found that many of the most intellectual men in Tokio were deeply interested in the Nō," and that they are studied by "University professors, leading lawyers and statesmen, men who would scorn to enter a theatre door." A little more interest in the modern theatre door, and a little less attachment to the productions of a mediaeval priesthood, would perhaps help to raise the Japanese stage to its proper place as a power in the national life.

SECTIONS FROM BENKEI-IN-THE-SHIP, (FUNA BENKEI) ARGUMENT.

Both this and the following piece deal with incidents in the career of Yoshitsune, one of the most romantic in Japanese history, and a strange compound of success and failure, of honours and persecution. It is a favourite theme of the Buddhist priests who compiled the Nō, for it gives them ample scope for dilating on the uncertainty of life and the impermanence of rank and power.

It will be remembered how, fresh from Dan-noura, Yoshitsune came in person to Kamakura to announce his victory. He lay at Koshigoye, only a mile or so away, for three long weeks; but Yoritomo would not meet him, for his ready ear had been poisoned by Kajiwaru Kagetoki, who could never forgive Yoshitsune's successes at Ichinotani, at Vashina and now in the Straits. It was then that he sent to his unrelenting brother (or rather to Oe no Hiromoto, that he might communicate its purport) the letter, of which the priests of Koshigoye still claim to have the draft, begging for justice, and urging his innocence of all the misdeeds imputed by his enemies.

"Here am I," he wrote, "weeping crimson tears in vain at thy displeasure. Well was it said that good medicine tastes bitter in the mouth, and true words ring harsh in the ear. This is why the slanders that men speak of me remain unproved, why I am kept out of Kamakura unable to lay bare my heart. These many days I have lain here and could not gaze upon my brother's face. The bond of our blood-brotherhood is sundered. . . .

But a short season after I was born, my honoured sire passed to another world, and I was left fatherless. Clapsed in my mother's bosom, I was carried down to Yamato, and since that day I have not known a moment free from care and danger. Though it was but to drag out a useless life, we wandered round the capital suffering hardship, hid in all manner of rustic spots, dwelt in remote and distant provinces, whose rough inhabitants did treat us with contumely. But at last I was summoned to assist in overthrowing the Taira house, and in this conflict I first laid Kiso Yoshinaka low. Then, so that I might demolish the Taira men, I spurred my steed on frowning precipices. Careless of death in the face of the foe, I braved the dangers of wind and wave, not recking that my body might sink to the bottom of the sea, and be devoured by monsters of the deep. My pillow was my harness, arms my trade." . . .

So he goes on. But the letter never reached Yoritomo, for it was pocketed by Hiromoto, who saw there was no purpose to be served by its delivery. At last Yoshitsune turned away from Kamakura, and made his way to Kyoto, where he tried to assemble forces and work up a rising against Yoritomo. Finding the Capital more frightened than sympathetic, he set off to see what could be done in the way of collecting followers in the Western province. It is a part of this journey that forms the theme of Funa Benkei.

Accompanied by his mistress Shizuka, his henchman Benkei and a few trusted followers he arrives at Daimotsu (now Amagasaki) on the coast of Settsu, meaning to take ship to Shikoku and there to live in retirement, so as to prove his innocence of all design on Kamakura. (This is the romantic view. Actually he had been persecuted out of all loyalty, and was only kept from active rebellion by insufficient following). In a bold speech Benkei advises him to send Shizuka back. She leaves him regretfully, after a song of farewell, a dance and an improvised chant, foretelling a turn in her lover's fortunes. Then the boat puts out. A high wind arises, and wraiths of women come clinging to the sides, omens of disaster. Presently a great host of spectres rises from the waves. They are the ghosts of the men of the Taira clan, drowned in the great seafight at Dannoura. The young Emperor is there, the nobles, the generals, the captains, and at their head is Tomomori. He in a loud voice names himself, and advances upon Yoshitsune to avenge as a spirit his defeat while in the flesh.

Yoshitsune would defend himself with mortal weapons, but Benkei pushes to the front, and by dint of prayer exorcises the unfriendly ghosts. They withdraw, and yet approach again, but, bending to their oars, the boatmen drive the ship on, leave them at last behind, and again the shore.

THE CHORUS.

Deep in the night⁽¹⁾ yet the moon from the cloud-vault coming forth from Miyako is sad, and loth to leave, unlike that other time when he set out in former years from Miyako pursuing them of the Taira host, to-day he leaves stealthily with but half a score of men in the ship to bear company, the ship that sails and rocks rising and falling as the sea and the clouds unfixed and uncertain
as the Fate of Men.

"Ye of the world cannot tell,⁽²⁾

"Ye of the world cannot tell,

"The Rockspring's waters

"Be they clear or troubled,

"Only the Gods may know."

Thus he passes,
bowing low before the God's great shade
he goes on his way, and straightway as he goes lo! the spirit of travel rises in him, the tide of his grief and the waves recede together—

Now he has come to the shore

to Daimotsu no Ura

Now he has come to the shore

to Daimotsu no Ura.

YOSHITSUNE.

Benkei, set wine before Shidzuka.

BENKEI.

Yea, my Lord.

(TO SHIDZUKA).

Here I reach thee out the winecup, the chrysanthemum winecup, to drink at my Lord's outset, wishing him a Thousand Years of Fortune on the way before him.

SHIDZUKA.

O! at parting from my Lord helpless am I with grief, blinded with tears and can but sob with weeping.

1 A typical example of the "dissolving-view" style. The passage is almost meaningless in the original, and a translation can only hope to preserve the same degree of vacuity. It is constructed as follows:—

Mada yo fukaku mo	Although yet deep in the kum i no tsuki	night
idzuru mo oshiki	the cloud-vault moon miyako no nagori	even emerging is sad regret for the capital where idzuru pays a double debt, and kumo is a punning repetition of the preceding syllables.

2 Th's verse, attributed to Hachiman, is supposed to pass through his mind as he goes by the shrine of Iwashimidzu (Rock-spring) dedicated to that deity.

BENKEI.

Nay, nay,—'tis well. Sing but a song of setting out on a sea-journey, Sing but a verse, he presses her,
and Shidzuka uprising sings straightway in the season's time and tune⁽¹⁾

SHIDZUKA.

"The ship from the haven goes as the wind drops, the place of exile shews as the day clears over the wave-tops."

BENKEI.

Here is an Eboshi. Pray put it on.

SHIDZUKA.

It is not seemly that I unworthy should rise and dance

CHORUS.

Even the fluttering of my sleeves is shame to me.

A PAUSE. SHE DANCES AND CHANTS.

I have heard tell how the prince Hanrei⁽²⁾ went up with Kōsen, and, shut in the fastnesses of the mount Kwaikai, how they revolved
a multitude of plans, and in the end achieving Kōsen's purpose
o'erthrew the King of Go.
So the tale runs.

THE CHORUS TAKES UP THE CHANT.

But though Kōsen took again the reign of power and wiped out the shame of Kwaikai, still with Hanrei lay the glory.
Yet though he, a prince of Yetsu, had in him to rule a nation, rich in wealth and high in honour might have wrought whate'er he listed, he, holding it the law of heaven fame reached and great deeds done to leave the business of the world, rowed away in a frail boat and lived contentedly in a far isle of the lake Goko.

1 Each season of the year having its appropriate style of music.

2 The story of Hanrei (Fan-li) and Kosen (Kou-chien) is a favourite in Japan, as a classical example of great services rendered by a subject to his sovereign. It was to their story that Kojima Takanori alluded in the verse he carved on the cherry-tree. Briefly, it is as follows:—

In the 5th century B.C. the powerful state of Wu (Go) had frequent wars with the neighbouring kingdom of Yüeh (Yetsu). In 493 the Wu forces, under Fuch' ai, penetrated into the enemy's country, and surrounded Kou-chien, King of Yüeh, with his picked troops, in their fortress on Mount Kuei-chi (Kwaikai). Yüeh was forced to sue for peace, which was made on fairly easy terms, thanks to a present of eight beautiful damsels to Fuch' ai's ministers, with a promise of more to come.

Kou-chien now began to prepare for revenge. Fan-li, his trusted counsellor, cast about for a plan. Remembering, perhaps, the effect of the eight beautiful damsels, he took the lovely Hsi-Shih, and had her taught all manner of graces and accomplishments, carefully attended, gorgeously dressed. Then, after three years of such preparation, he accompanied her to Wu, where he presented her to the king. The result was what he had foreseen. Fuch' ai abandoned himself to dalliance with his new toy, his people were neglected, his army went to ruin; and he was soon attacked and utterly defeated by his wily neighbour.

When, on the return march, the victorious army reached Lake Tai-hu (太湖), Fan-li took leave of his astonished sovereign, jumped into a small boat, rowed away towards the middle of the lake, and was never heard of more. A different version, hardly so romantic, is that he transferred his allegiance to another king, in whose service he amassed great wealth; and indeed, the name Tōshiūkō, by which he is mentioned in the original passage of Shidzuka's song, is used in China as a synonym for 'millionaire.'

RETAINER.

Truly, truly, thou art right, everywhere are foemen and the evening waves¹

BENKEI CHORUS.

rising and clamouring the boatmen cry Eiya Eiya as they launch the ship on the evening tide.

BENKEI.

Ah! Woe is me! The wind has changed.
With the breeze that blows down from yonder Mukoyama² and the storm that comes from the peak of Yuzuriha there is no means of reaching the shore in this ship. Pray, all of ye, pray from your hearts.

(Here ensues a dialogue between the occupants of the boat and the sailors, which does not appear in the text, but is always introduced at representations of the piece. The boatmen beat down the evil spirits with their poles, all the time, according to the superstition, pretending they are waves, and avoiding the word ghost). Finally—

RETAINER.

Musashi Dono, there is a sea spirit clinging to the ship.

BENKEI.

Be still! Such things may not be said on shipboard.

But lo! How wonderful!
Looking over the sea behold arising floating on the waters
all the men of Taira that we defeated in the West
Well might they seek this present moment for revenge.

YOSHITSUNE.

Ah Benkei.

BENKEI.

I stand before thee

YOSHITSUNE.

There is no cause for fear. What though evil spirits should threaten to wreak vengeance on us, how can aught happen?

The whole house of Taira sunk by the will of heaven in the sea for piled-up perfidies and disregard of Gods' and Buddhas' holy grace.

THE CHORUS.

First his High Majesty and the moon nobles and the cloud-guests like mists on the mountains have appeared floating over the waves.

TOMOMORI'S GHOST.

This is I,
Offspring of the Emperor Kwammu
in the ninth generation, Taira no Tomomori
his ghost!

Lo! Yoshitsune, 'tis thou! Strangely met.¹

CHORUS.

Just as Tomomori sank so he would overwhelm Yoshitsune in the waves the floating waves around him his long halberd in circles like the tomoe, splashing in the tide,
breathing vile vapours.
Their eyes grow dizzy their breasts perturbed their senses gone almost.

YOSHITSUNE.

Then Yoshitsune, all undismayed,
Then Yoshitsune, all undismayed,
drawing his weapon and as one facing a living foeman would with him strive.

1 An attempt to represent in the translation one of the 'pivot' constructions. 'Rising and clamouring' refers both to waves and boatmen.

2 The present Rokko-zan.

But Benkei arising thrusts him aside and as he cries
Here will sword-work nought avail!
grasping his rosary rattles the beads between his palms.

"On the East Gosanze
"On the South Gudariyasha
"On the West Dai Itoku
"On the North Kongo Yasha Miao
"In the Middle Daisho, Fudo Miao."

He casts the bond around them,⁽¹⁾ he conjuring, they conjured, the evil spirits
draw ever further from them, and Benkei aiding the boatmen they drive the ship forward on towards the water's edge.
And still again the vengeful ghosts come clinging round them and they beat them back and drive them off with prayer till once again rocked and driven on the falling flood rocked and driven on the falling flood they are swept away and vanish with the white waves leaving never a track behind.

[End.]

SELECTIONS FROM ATAKA (BENKEI AT-THE-BARRIER).

CHORUS.

Then here in the mountain shade we tarry, sit softly in a ring, and let us drink wine on the hill-path, chrysanthemum wine.⁽²⁾

BENKEI.

Oh merrily, launched on the mountain steam, the wine-cup on the current borne floats down the winding waters,⁽³⁾ where we plunge our hands to catch it and with flowing sleeves
I'll dance a dance.

For Benkei knew the priestly dance of old, therefore he sings the song they chant to the dance of Lengthening Years.⁽⁴⁾
Here as the mountain stream falls booming on the rocks beneath

CHORUS.

"Tis the sound of the cataract's waters".....

BENKEI.

Ah, I am drunken. Let me, the Guide, pour out wine for thee.

WARDEN.

I thank thee, I will take some. But, Sir Guide, wilt thou not dance for us now?

BENKEI.

As thou wishest.

CHORUS.

"Tis the sound of the cataract's waters."

BENKEI.

"Tis the sound of the cataract's waters."

.....

..... (Dance)

.....

Up! Up! Tight strung as the bow, let not your care relax.
The barrier guards take leave, and they, feeling as men who've trod scatheless upon a tiger's tail or 'scaped the serpent's poisoned fangs, shoulder their chests, and cry farewell, and down to Mutsu make their way.

[End.]

1 Referring to the rope which Fudo holds for the binding of evildoers.

2 Wine drunk at chrysanthemum time, some times flavoured with the petals. Often used to mean 'a farewell drink'.

3 In allusion to the "winding-water banquets" where the Courtiers, seated on the banks of a winding stream, catch a winecup as it comes floating down. Each, as he catches, and drinks from the cup, must make an impromptu poem.

4 Danced at the great festivals at Hiyei-zan, and therefore well-known to Benkei, who had been acolyte and priest there. 延年の舞

SELECTIONS FROM SAKURA GAWA.

The waters flow, the flowers fall,⁽¹⁾ forever lasts the Spring.
 The moon shines cold, the wind blows high,
 the cranes do not fly home.
 The flowers that grow in the rocks are scarlet, and light up the stream.
 The trees that grow by the caverns are green and contain the breeze.
 The blossoms open like brocade, the brimming pools are deep and blue.

WOMAN.

My straying footsteps brought me here.

CHORUS.

to the river that rouses a longing within.
 "The shade of a tree, the flow of a stream"—⁽²⁾ Alike the name, alike the place, they must be together bound by a Link of former Life.

CHORUS.

The water is the mirror of the flowers, but as the year grows old and blossoms fade and fall, then can ye say the mirror tarnisheth?
 What shall we do,
 well knowing that the blossoms fade and later turn to dust?
 'Tis vain to hold then blossoms which in truth are dreams.
 For from the treetops scattered and come to nought they fall, fall on the waters, and, alas, vanish as bubbles and are gone.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—While I entirely agree with the main argument of the recent articles contributed to the Mail on Rationalism in Europe, I feel that the references to the French Revolution are quite too narrowly limited to the Terror, and tend to convey the impression (all too prevalent among English people) that the Terror was the Revolution. As a matter of fact the Revolution as a whole was beneficent; its real work was constructive. People talk of the reign of Terror, of the massacres of the innocent, the cruelty of proscription, the uprooting of old institutions, even of the murder of the King and of the Queen. All these happenings do, indeed, strike terror to the heart, and they give colour to the charge of anarchy, made just now once more by your Contributor.

But, what about the age-long cruelties, miseries, outrages, inflicted upon the people of France? What about the oppressions, the trumped up wrongs they endured? What about the legal injustices, the robberies, worked out under the shelter of Privilege, which shut the door upon opportunity, which forbade redress? What about the bankruptcy of the French nation? Anarchy, does some one say? Was not the France of l'ancien régime the victim of anarchy?

The Revolution brought all France under the rule of one law for every man, administered with even justice. Before, there was no law but local custom, and there was a system of exemption even from the force of custom, by innumerable special privileges. And the system of privilege was especially felt in the matter of taxation, for the exemptions and the imposts were so made that the heaviest burdens lay on the lowest labourers, on the inhabitants of the miserable villages, and on the small farmers. The fiscal system of the Old Regime was so oppressive that the people as a whole welcomed the revolutionary movement as soon as it was seen to be strong enough to be capable of demolishing the old tyranny.

Any thoughtful man can see that I need add no more. If one law is now equally applied over all France, all that seething confusion of the Terror marked merely the forces needed to bring into being justice. I do not condone or justify the deeds of the Jacobin Clubs;—they were damnable. But, bind down volcanic energies beneath a mountain mass, and then suddenly pour in upon those imprisoned fires the boundless sea. Will that burst of steam come to th with the soft whiper of my lady's teakettle at 5 o'clock to-day, or will it stun the world with the overwhelming shock of a secular cataclysm?

2 "To shelter under the same tree, to dip one's hand in the same stream." Even such trifling affinities as these are preordained, so that there must be some previous cause from a previous existence connecting Sakurago with the Sakuragawa. The Japanese view of life was strongly coloured by the Karma doctrine.

I might add much more, but will conclude with these remarks: The growth of privilege in America under no better claim than that of wealth is one of the most disquieting features of recent days. A well known political agitator there spoke once of "malefactors of great wealth." Yet though the phrase was vitriolic he himself, in the day of his power, never dared sacrifice himself in order to make away with the corrupting system which erects though wealth a barrier of privilege, to the destruction of the Commonwealth.

In that way lies danger; for privilege sets those free from the reach of law who most need its restraints.

And in Russia it is the same. Nothing can be more opposed to social order, to social justice, than the government of organized plunder there. Just now the powers of unrighteousness are in the ascendant. They need not weep or complain if one day they learn the exceeding bitterness of the cup they have given to a simple, kind hearted people to drink.

But men need not look to find liberty, equality, and fraternity under any Lord but one, or in any society but one. That Lord is Christ, that Kingdom of peace is the Catholic Church. C.

CHRISTIANITY IN EUROPE AND JAPAN.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Looking through a contributed article entitled "Rationalism in Europe" which appeared in your valuable paper of the 19th inst. I find that the Christian apologist has created a misunderstanding as to Rationalism and that the truth is completely obscured by this misunderstanding. This old fierce antagonism which is entirely beside the fact is again in this century raging among us. These tempests in the mental world are ordained by the same all-wise and all merciful God who sends the atmospheric storms. This God ordained Christian priests to butcher many people in 1212, in the south of France, some of whom had their eyes put out, others had their teeth pulled out. From love of Christ and his maiden mother Christians made war on innocent people and depopulated towns, districts and whole provinces. In answer to the atrocious summons flocked many devout Christians from all Europe. This pious Christian leader gave orders, saying 'Lay waste every field, slay every human being and blessing will be with you.' Soon word was sent that Christians could not distinguish the orthodox from the heretics; the answer came back; 'Slaughter all; God will know his own.' These persecutions were all by the Catholics. But even after the Protestants gained the ascendancy, there was not much abatement of those cruelties. Luther and Calvin, while claiming the utmost liberty of conscience for themselves, denied it to others. Luther denounced Copernicus. As for Calvin, after a controversy with Servetus on the dogma of the Trinity he had him arrested, brought to Geneva, tied to a stake, green wood piled around him and a fire applied, where Servetus was slowly roasted to death on Oct. 26th, 1553.

Now Christianity never pays any respect to the National faith. According to the Christian doctrine they deny the existence of any authority higher than their God and their Jesus, Myths, and therefore deny the faith on which Japanese loyalty and patriotism rest. Consequently Christian religion is noxious to the public peace and the public morality of Japan. We can not take the Christian God as the head of the World or of Japan. What evidence can we find, if we are absolutely honest in the history of the world, that this universe is presided over by an infinitely wise and good God?

There are many things in Christian doctrine that we, pure Japanese subjects, cannot accept. Our objection to orthodox religion is that it destroys national patriotism. They say, leave everything and follow Jesus. This is a very dangerous doctrine. We cannot agree with these noxious doctrines. We can not receive Christianity. We will stay with our patriotism; loyalty to our own country is better than fidelity to Christianity. You know Christianity urged to seek first the Kingdom of God (Matt. Vi. 33; Luke Xii. 31). It forbade the laying up of treasures upon earth (Matt. Vi. 19-21). Christianity demanded of those who wished to join them to sell all their possession and to divide it among the poor brethren (Matt. Xiv. 21; Luke. xii. 33). Christianity put all its members on the same level, forbidding the exercise of authority of one over another, and enjoying mutual service (Matt. XX. 25-28, Mark. X. 42-45) Jesus commanded his disciples to call no man master upon the earth (Matt. XXIII. 8-10). Many other evidences that Christianity is Socialism might be shown, but these are sufficient to show that Christianity and Socialism are one and the same. I do not wish to war against such a big man who is capable to misunderstand the truth, but I only advise him to investigate the truth and the fact and to avoid God's everlasting fire.

Enclosing my card, I am, Sir, Yours truly.

A JAPANESE RATIONALIST.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The writer of the article "Rationalism in Europe," contributed to your paper of the 19th inst., which I only read to-day, in his scathing condemnation of Rationalism, thought it opportune to refer to the Revolution in Portugal, which he considers the outcome of Rationalism, in the most disparaging terms.

Whatever his political creed might be—however much he might abhor Rationalism,—to ascribe to the latter the birth of the Revolution in Portugal, only to treat its leaders as a band of assassins, is to go beyond the mark.

The assassination of King Carlos and the Crown Prince was condemned by the Republicans and it is not fair to connect their names at this late hour with that foul deed.

To all who have followed the trend of events taking place in Portugal since then, the present form of government is welcomed as the only means of saving the country, and on this account—all praise and honour to the men responsible for its success.

Any attempt to besmirch their names should not go unprotected—hence this letter, for the publication of which you will greatly oblige.

Yours, etc.,

RATIONALISM.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—So much surprised was I when I read your recent article on Rationalism, that I thought the word might have some other meaning than that which I had always attributed to it. I therefore looked in the latest dictionaries and encyclopædias, but I found that the word still has the same meaning as when Lecky explained it as "A certain cast of thought, or bias of reasoning . . . that leads men on all occasions to subordinate dogmatic theology to the dictates of reason and of conscience, and, as a necessary consequence, greatly to restrict its influence upon life. It predisposes men, in history to attribute all kinds of phenomena to natural rather than miraculous causes; in theology to esteem succeeding systems the expressions of the wants and aspirations of that religious sentiment which is planted in all men; and in ethics, to regard as duties only those which conscience reveals to be such." In the article to which I refer, you "ask the Rationalists whether they are prepared to claim that their attitude to life has had any moral influence on the world," a very naive question from one who poses as an authority on Rationalism. You will find yourself fully answered if you read Lecky's History of the Rise and Influence of Rationalism in Europe and Buckle's History of Civilization in England. In these two books the claims are set forth clearly and supported by much evidence. Other books which might with advantage be read are Leslie Stephen's History of English Thought in the Eighteenth Century and Draper's History of the Intellectual Development of Europe and his History of the Conflict between Science and Religion. Space would not suffice for me to more than point out that the greatest moral effects of rationalism have been the decline of the spirit of persecution with all its attendant cruelties, and the growth of a hatred of hypocrisy. Can it be that the belief in witchcraft and the horrid persecutions of witches had no moral effect? Yet the decline in the belief in witches, according to Lecky, works the rise, and its destruction the first triumph, of the spirit of rationalism in Europe. The Protestant Reformation, in so far as it was a protest against the dogmatism of the priests and a claim that each man might read and interpret the Bible for himself, was a rationalistic movement. Milton, that ardent Protestant, says: "If a man believes things only because his pastor says so, or the assembly so determines, without knowing other reason, though his belief be true, yet the very truth he holds becomes his heresy."

Furthermore, sir, you say: "It can truly be said of Rationalists that for every upright member there are a thousand bad members among the revolutionaries, the criminals and the law-breakers o the world." This, sir, is a vile slander. In Japan many upright rationalists must be known to you and few criminal ones. Without their consent I would not publish men's opinions. But the Editor of the Japan Herald, the Editor of the Japan Chronicle and the learned writer of the Monthly Summaries in the Japan Mail reveal themselves as rationalists. If there is such a large proportion of upright publicists who are rationalists, is it probable that in other lines of life there is a very small one? You must have referred to Europe and America, but with these continents you can have no modern personal acquaintance.

The Cristian Church is not well served by those who make blind vituperative attacks on unbelievers. She is best served by those who are poor in spirit, who judge not that they may not be judged, who, while that they are valiant for the truth, upon the earth, in meekness instruct those that oppose them, who think no evil. Happily there are many such to serve her.

Yours truly,
October 24th.

THE ATTACK ON RATIONALISM.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The dead silence with which three articles on Rationalism recently published in your columns have been received by all your readers is a sure indication that the general opinion is that the writer of these articles is suffering from obtuseness that is incurable. Sometimes silence means consent, but in this case it certainly is to be interpreted as unequivocal dissent.

It is not my intention to go into all the silly nonsense which the Rev. I Bryan has given the reading public on the alleged connection of Rationalism with bloodshed. I say Mr. Bryan, as I feel quite sure he is the writer of the articles referred to. One would have supposed that the murders which the Church of Christ committed in the name of religion centuries ago, and a very recent murder in Spain, supported and approved of by leading Christians, would have taught him that ordinary caution required him to keep silent on such a subject. But no, he is the sort of gentleman who "rushes in where angels fear to tread."

As Mr. Bryan has tried to represent the Rationalistic movement in a very unfavourable light, your readers will be interested to have before them a list of some of the foreign gentlemen living in this country who in a most open manner have shown their strong sympathy with this movement. They are all either members of the Rational Press Association, or without being members are subscribers towards its work, or they purchase large numbers of the cheap Rationalistic books which that Society has been pouring out of the press for many years. Here then is the list:—

Messrs. G. J. Anderson	R. Young
B. H. Chamberlain	W. Dening
H. V. Heison	Dr. C. H. H. Hall
J. Carey Hall	Dr. N. G. Munro
Jones—	Dr. J. N. Seymour
J. Kennedy
W. B. Mason
G. H. May
J. Murdoch
M. Ostwald

This list is by no means exhaustive. Many important additions might no doubt be made to it.

As an authority on modern Western thought, Mr. Bryan's name carries little weight when placed side by side with many of these gentlemen, despite all his bluster. And as to Japanese thought, of that his first article showed the most profound ignorance. Rationalism is not coming here as a new thing. It has been rooted here for centuries and has been immensely strengthened by the influx of Western literature, and nobody need be anxious about its future in this country.

As to the wild statements made in Mr. Bryan's three articles, into those I decline to go, as it is quite evident they are not of a character to do any harm to so strong and well-supported a movement as that carried on by the Rational Press Association of London, in Great Britain and her various colonies. These articles are plainly not worth discussing seriously.

Yours, etc.,

"X.Y.Z."

BRITONS AND GERMANS: A SUGGESTION RELATING TO THE INTENDED VISIT OF THE GERMAN CROWN PRINCE.

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—Prolonged residence in China and Japan has brought me into contact with a great majority of German residents in these countries, with the natural creation of sincere, disinterested, and, I trust, lasting friendship between English and Germans, the latter being as fine a race, intellectually and physically, as can be found in any part of the world. When Germans and Englishmen meet on neutral ground they quickly learn to value the good qualities with which both peoples are happily endowed. If any proof were required to support these assertions I would cite the evidence afforded by Hongkong, the Straits Settlements, and other British colonies, which, open to all people, give particular welcome and hospitable reception to Germans, who in return identify themselves with the best interests of their adopted places of abode where they participate in public duties and are held in general respect and esteem. It is most gratifying to realise that between the German and British peoples in lands foreign to both the feeling of esteem is genuine and lasting, founded, as it is, on the rock of mutual respect.

These few words are intended as a preface to a suggestion I desire to put forward for consideration. As at present arranged His Imperial Highness the Crown Prince, son of the German Emperor, grandson of Queen Victoria, nephew of King Edward VII. and cousin of King George V, is to visit Japan in the latter part of April. Among foreign residents in Japan the British preponderate, and it would be an act of graceful courtesy and kindly feeling towards our German fellow residents if the British community were to extend to his Imperial Highness a respectful, cordial and genuine welcome on his travels. The form this movement should take can only be decided after consideration by a committee to be specially appointed for the purpose, which would have the advantage of conferring with the leaders of the German community, and between them something might be devised which would give pleasure not only to the Imperial visitor but to the German Emperor himself, who has more British admirers than the British people care to confess.

As I do not wish to put myself forward in the matter I do not append my signature to this communication; but if there should be any response to the suggestion I will gladly communicate with others and take my share in the promotion of this act of respect, courtesy and kindness.

Yours etc.,

BRITANNICUS.

THE RATIONALISTIC "CREED."

(TO THE EDITOR OF THE "JAPAN MAIL.")

SIR,—The more one reads the more one sees that the whole rationalistic creed (?) is a menace to society at large. When one has read a book dealing with the subject, one is apt to say at the finish "words, plenty of words," but nothing convincing, for or against. After all is said and done, how can it be convincing?

Each man, nowadays, is entitled to his own opinions, good or bad; but to try to lead others in the same path by a series of specious pleadings is where danger lies.

Yours truly,

STUDENT.

Resigns.

(a) The capture of the pawn, accepting the Danish Gambit, is good enough, as it should give Black a won game after a somewhat troublesome but temporary attack.

(b) The Queen is liable to attack at Q 4, as in the Scotch Gambit.

(c) P—Q R4, as played subsequently by Dr. Smith against Wainwright, is much better and gives White a telling attack.

(d) P—B 4, followed by Q—K 3 would be the alternative.

(e) A pretty manoeuvre, which leaves White without a defence.

We hope the movement in England to recognize in a practical way the services rendered to Chess by Mr. Blackburne will meet with the success it deserves. A national testimonial to this veteran player would be a fitting reward for the fifty years he has devoted to maintaining the standard of British Chess. A few years ago the Yokohama and Tokyo Clubs might have responded to such an appeal; to-day it is doubtless idle to make even the suggestion.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

THE WORLD'S LARGEST STEAMER.

London, October 21.

The White Star liner "Olympia" 45,000 tons burden, the largest steamer in the world, has been launched at Belfast.

COMMENTS ON THE PERSIAN SITUATION.

Commenting on the Persian note the Turkish newspapers abuse Great Britain and Russia and accuse them of being the joint authors of the Anarchy in Southern Persia.

THE ANGLO-RUSSIAN ENTENTE.

The new Viceroy Harbinger has been banqueted in London. He paid a tribute to Lord Lansdowne and Sir Edward Grey for negotiating the Anglo-Russian entente. He said that the Convention had already stood the test of practical trial and had been of incalculable advantage to India. This happy issue was largely due to King Edward and the Czar. The latter, to his personal knowledge, had always been a strong advocate of the most friendly and peaceful relations with Great Britain.

BRITISH NOTE TO PERSIA.

London, October 20.

The British Note to Persia has made a profound impression in Turkish circles and the Press, and is regarded askance by Turkish and German papers. The Persian Government will probably reply to Great Britain on Friday or Saturday.

Later.

Tehran.—The President of the Mejliss has telegraphed to Nasir el Mulk begging him to return to Persia without delay and to resume the Regency.

London, October 23.

Tehran.—Persia has replied to the British note pointing out the improvement of conditions owing to the new regime. The Government while suggesting an additional charge of ten per cent. on Customs in connection with the proposed loan cannot agree to the presence of British officials in the Country. The note dwells on the increase of general trade and adds that consequently foreign merchants have no right to complain.

SITUATION IN PORTUGAL.

Reports of a Portuguese ministerial crisis are viewed as of some importance. A rigorous censorship continues, nothing certain being known of the present situation, but notable dissension appears to exist.

Later.

Lisbon.—The Government, desirous of pleasing the Socialists, has promulgated decrees abolishing all exceptional laws restricting the freedom of the press.

THE PORTUGUESE BISHOPS.

TSAR AND KAISER.

It has been settled that the Tsar will visit the Kaiser at Potsdam on the 4th prox., return to Darmstadt on the 5th.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

THE SEQUEL TO THE RAILWAY STRIKE IN FRANCE.

London, October 21.

Paris.—The Premier states that all public services are resuming normal activity. Viewing the unpopularity of the strike movement among the humbler classes, the Socialist and Radical parties in the Chamber are likely to find their difficulties greater than those wherein the Government may be involved in consequence of past imprudent utterances of some members.

HOPES OF PORTUGUESE REPUBLICANS.

London, October 22.

Lisbon.—It is hoped by the Portuguese that Great Britain will soon recognize the Republic. Differences of opinion between the adherents of two cabinet ministers prevail. Ambitious revolutionists are impatient at the retention of Royalist officials. It has been decided that the six Royal palaces are national property.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

The Asahi Shimbun's London Correspondent reports a highly interesting special conversation with Commissioner General Wada in reference to immediate results of the Anglo-Japanese exhibition from the standpoint of commercial, industrial and social relations between the two allied empires.

Mr. Wada declared that the visit of large numbers of influential Japanese has already produced an appreciation of the English character; various mistaken ideas have been corrected and the countries will now know each other better. He also considers that great results ought to accrue from the knowledge thus acquired of the requirements of Great Britain and Japan. Mr. Wada expressed the belief that there will be a great increase of imports and exports after the close of the exhibition compared with the volume of trade prior to its opening.

BRITAIN'S DEFENCES.

The British shipyard lockout is not yet settled. It has lasted seven weeks and cost £350,000.

SPECIAL FROM PORTUGAL.

Lisbon.—A special dispatch to Reuters states that the ex-Dictator Franco has been summarily relieved of financial controller-ship. By a government order there is to be no religious instruction in state schools.

PROTEST AGAINST BRITISH NOTE TO PERSIA.

Constantinople.—At a crowded meeting to protest against the British note to Persia it was resolved to ask the Kaiser again to be the saviour of a Mohammedan state as was previously the case with Morocco.

THE GREEK MINISTERIAL CRISIS.

London, October 25.

Athens.—Although the new premier Venizelos has withdrawn his resignation, he expects the Chamber to express complete and unreserved acquiescence in the declaration of the Government. The impression prevails that a dissolution is imminent.

STORM OFF NAPLES.

Rome.—A violent storm has caused terrible destruction at Ischia. Heavy loss of life is feared.

SPANISH MAJESTIES VISIT VALENCIA.

Valencia.—The visit of the King and Queen to this home of republicanism has been a triumphant success. Their Majesties joined heartily in the battle of flowers, and were everywhere cheered. The visit is a personal triumph for the premier and a good omen for the Liberal Government.

INTERNAL DISSENSIONS IN GREECE.

October 26.

Athens.—The King dissolved the Chamber, the Premier considering collaboration impossible in view of the lukewarm attitude of many deputies. The old political parties are greatly exasperated and denounce Premier Venizelos as a dictator and deny the right of the Crown to dissolve the Chamber.

PERSIA'S REPLY TO BRITISH NOTE.

St. Petersburg.—The terms of the Persian reply to the British note evoke amazement not unminged with indignation. The Novoye Vremya wonders how the Persian Government could seriously assert that the presence of Russian troops in the North creates lawlessness in the South. Persia's promise to restore order is regarded as perfunctory and meaningless.

KAISER'S VISIT TO BELGIUM.

Brussels.—The visit of the Kaiser was received by the population with marked absence of enthusiasm; also the elaborate police precautions caused annoyance.

PERSIA AND THE NEAR EAST.

GERMAN PRESS CAMPAIGN.

London, October 27.

Berlin.—A press campaign on Near Eastern and Persian affairs is in full swing. Copious references are made to the necessity of helping Turkey in not tolerating the Anglo-Russian action in Persia, which is described as intended to raise a great Eastern crisis. It is reported from Constantinople that further Turkish troops have been sent to the Persian frontier.

THE ANGLO RUSSIAN AGREEMENT.

St. Petersburg.—The Novoye Vremya is printing a leading article which prominently emphasizes the beneficent results of the Anglo-Russian agreement, and declares inability to understand the attitude of Germany.

THE SITUATION IN GREECE.

Athens.—The country seems to approve of the King's action in dissolving the Chamber. There are indications of improvement both in the internal and in the external situation.

AUSTRO-ITALIAN NAVAL CONTROVERSY.

Vienna.—High naval officers are conducting a candid controversy in the press whether the Austrian navy is doomed to defeat or has a good chance of victory whenever it engages Italy.

Berlin, October 24.

The programme of the tour of the Crown prince to the Far East has finally been fixed as follows:—

Departure from Genoa on Nov. 3rd and arrival at Colombo on Nov. 20th, from whence a visit with the Crown Princess to Kandy will be carried out. On Dec. 14th the Crown Prince will arrive at Bombay and a tour lasting two months through India will follow. The departure from Calcutta is fixed for the middle of February and the arrival at Singapore will take place on Feb. 20th. From here Bangkok, Batavia and Hongkong will be visited. The Crown Prince will arrive at Shanghai on March 31st and stay at Tsingtau until April 4th. After visits to Peking and Tientsin the Crown Prince will arrive at Yokohama on April 24th and pay visits to Tokyo, Nagasaki and Kobe. The return voyage will be begun on May 16th from Vladivostok and a visit to Petersburg from Moscow will conclude the whole tour.

DEATH OF SIAM'S KING.

King Chulalongkorn of Siam is dead. The German Press expresses the greatest regret as to his death and says that the Crown Prince would have been much pleased to visit him on his tour in the Far East. It further states that he was very well versed in European matters and had taken great efforts to establish good relations between Siam and the other foreign Powers.

GREEK CHAMBER DISSOLVED.

The Greek Chamber has been dissolved by the King. New elections will take place in November.

MEETING OF SILK FABRIC ASSOCIATIONS.

A combined meeting of the silk fabric associations in Kanagawa and nine other prefectures, was held on Wednesday at the Social Club in Yokohama, over 130 persons being present. Baron Oura, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, attended the meeting, when he made the following speech:—

"I have pleasure in stating my views with regard to the silk business before the gentlemen who are influential in this line of business. Now is the time to carry on the post-bellum programme. There are many things to be improved. Above all the improvement of the industry at home and the development of trade abroad are the most important. As armaments are indispensable for a country, prefectural policy should also be given earnest attention. Every locality should develop its proper industry in accordance with a fixed policy. When I was on an inspection tour abroad last spring, I asked the opinion of habutae merchants at Lyons, and was told that the Japanese stuffs which were exported during the first half of last year were of inferior quality, while those shipped towards the later part of last year and the beginning of this year, were better in quality. It then occurred to me that when I inspected the habutae business in Fukui prefecture during May last year, dealers had complained of too much strictness on the part of the prefectural government in conditioning habutae. At that time I advised the habutae dealers in the prefecture that the conditioning of habutae should be conducted with the greatest strictness. It seemed to me that habutae which was strictly examined in Fukui prefecture gained a good reputation in the market of Lyons. This shows how important is the examination of habutae. When I reached London the representative of the Chamber of Commerce in that city called on me and stated his view on the Japanese habutae, mentioning in the first place that the Japanese stuffs are not well glossed; secondly, many stains are found on the stuffs; and thirdly, the silks are generally shorter in length and in width than the samples. Therefore it seems to me that morality in commercial circles in Japan is far more rudimentary than in England. From this point of view I am ashamed to visit Europe again. Another thing which struck me in journeying through Europe and America, was that the Europeans and Americans are full of vigour and perseverance in carrying on their business. I hope you will endeavour in developing this line of business, to follow the example of foreign countries. Should commercial morality be slighted and only immediate small profits be craved, the business will end in great loss. In the meantime the Government is undertaking to make up estimates for conditioning habutae, and it is hoped that it will produce a satisfactory result in the interests of you and all merchants dealing in habutae."

The revised law with regard to the election of the members of the House of Representatives, which had obtained the Imperial sanction on the 24th instant, was published in Wednesday's Official Gazette.

MONTHLY SUMMARY OF THE JAPANESE RELIGIOUS PRESS

It is very surprising to find a Japanese Doctor of Divinity, who, it goes without saying, has studied various religious creeds and the history of the origin of each separate form of faith still adhering to the belief that the Japanese people have one advantage not possessed by any other nation—they are descended from gods. In the April number of the Yūben (Elocution) we find a full report of a speech made by Dr. Hiraiwa last February entitled Shinsei naru Shinkokumin (Real People of God). Parts of that speech we propose to reproduce here in an abbreviated form for the sake of showing how tenaciously highly educated men cling to theories which a very large number of Japanese regard as wholly mythological. Looking back over our history, says Dr. Hiraiwa, we find that at the commencement, when our State was founded by Amaterasu-ō-mikami there was no difference between gods and men (Sunawachi Kani to hito to no sabetsu ga nai yo (世) ga aru). It was not until Ninigi-no-mikoto was begotten that the difference between gods and men began to appear and by the time of the Emperor Jimmu this distinction may be said to have been thoroughly established. We see then that our early ancestors were gods and that at one time this country was governed by gods that came down from Heaven Waga kuni wo osame tamau tokoro no mono wa Ten yori kudarete tokoro no kata de aru to kangaeremasu ni yotte, kono kuni wa Kani no osame-tamau tokoro no kuni de aru. It is because of this that we Japanese call our country Shinshū (神洲) or Shinkoku (神國), God's Country. This Divine origin of our nation is something of which we may well be proud. But it carries with it great responsibilities. More may reasonably be expected from a people which has such an illustrious origin than from ordinary nations. It is in vain for us to boast of our ancestry while doing nothing to show that we are a superior race of people. When the Jews boasted to Christ that Abraham was their father, he retorted "If ye were Abraham's children, ye would do the works of Abraham." Now, it seems to me that there are at least four characteristics which a nation that boasts of its Divine ancestry should possess: (1) It should have strong religious faith. It should be known throughout the world for the sincerity of its belief in God. (2) The life of such a nation should be marked by purity and holiness. The relations of the sexes should be pure. In mind and body all contamination should be avoided. (3) Seeing that benevolence is Divine, our people should be distinguished for their kind-heartedness and brotherly feeling. A certain generosity of nature and general friendliness are certainly to be classed among the original endowments of our people, but in recent times, partly perhaps as a result of our wars, an anti-foreign spirit has displayed itself among us. This is anything but godlike. (4) A nation which is descended from gods should have high ideals. Japan talks too much about her past. A glorious past can never make up to us for the want of a glorious future. Satisfaction with our recent achievements even is not a feeling that should be encouraged.

* * *

By far the most powerful writer in the Shin Bukkyō is Mr. Katō Totsudō, one of the most eloquent of living Buddhist priests. In the October number of this magazine the opening article entitled "A Glance at the State of the World and Human Affairs" is from his pen. We have no space for a full epitome of the essay, but in order to show how keen-sighted an observer of the world's passing show Mr. Katō is we will make a few quotations from his article. In all times men have been controlled in the main by their interests or their tastes. The great changes that have taken place in the world may all be traced to the influence of special interests or special tastes. Common interests and common tastes bring families, friends, communities and nations together and enable them to accomplish great things. But on the other hand it is the conflict of interests that causes so much suffering in the world. Where the demand is large and the supply small, competition that kills off the weak is bound to set in. The inequalities of human lot would be unbearable were there not three different agencies engaged in ameliorating the condition of the majority of mankind. These are (1) Governments, which administer justice, make laws, and devise means for promoting the general welfare of subjects; (2) an economic system which arranges for the collection, and distribution of raw produce, and for the development of various industries, and (3) education and religion whose function it is to teach men how to behave towards each other, to sow the seeds of kindness in the human heart and thus to diminish somewhat the amount of suffering among mankind. The more perfectly these three agencies do their work in each country the happier are the people living there. Happiness depends on the realization of all lawful desires. It is desire that supplies the impulse to all human action.

In an article on Religion in Korea published in the October Shin Bukkyō Mr. Z. Abe says that Buddhism there is in a deplorable state. The priests are ignorant, idle and irreligious. Confucianism, though accepted by the upper classes, nominal exercises next to no influence over the lives of educated Koreans. Christianity is at present by far the most active religion there is in Korea. The Roman Catholics have about 42,000 converts and the Protestants some 6,000*. A few other creeds are professed in Korea, but they are comparatively insignificant.

The Shin Bukkyō has always advocated the abolition of what are deemed by sensible Japanese to be useless customs. In an article entitled Bad Japanese Customs that ought to be discontinued, Mr. D. Suzuki enumerates and discusses at some length six different practices that he thinks should no longer be followed. Most of them are probably so familiar to our readers that we need do little more than call attention to them in a brief manner. (1) Visiting and giving presents to sick persons. The custom of insisting on seeing sick persons widely prevailing among us is a bad one, as it often does much harm to patients. The presents of food given to sick people do not usually consist of articles they can eat and so are useless. (2) The custom of giving and taking presents common among us is most troublesome and useless. The occasions on which presents are expected to be received are so numerous that those who are punctilious in such matters and whose circle of friends is large have to busy themselves in purchases all the year around. (3) The custom of regarding all help given to subjects of the empire by officials as acts of grace on their part ought to be discontinued. This is a relic of feudalism. During the recent floods the whole bearing of officials was not that of men who felt sympathy for fellow-citizens who were unfortunate, but that of superiors condescending to help inferiors. (Kami yori shimo wo awaremu to iu sensei-teki taido ni idetari.) Real autonomy has yet to come in this country. The high sense of self-respect which spurs the notion of becoming the object of official charity is as a rule wanting among our people. (4) It is high time that the reign of the ideographs should cease. The ideographs are to us no more than symbols of thought. Since it is thought that is important and not the symbol which stands for it, it becomes plain that symbols which are easily acquired are infinitely to be preferred to those which take years of study to master. To the remark that the Chinese character is a work of art, we reply that with the majority of people who use these signs their beauty counts for nothing. The age calls for simpler symbols both here and in China. (5) The habit of using such out-of-date Chinese dictionaries as those to be seen in our libraries to-day ought to be given up. Though Giles' Chinese Dictionary is far from perfect, it is an immense improvement on any work to be found in this country. The fact is we have no dictionary worthy of mention. (Nihon genzai no Kango Jiten ni itatte wa kataru ni tarazu). Our dictionaries give the meaning of single characters and of a few compounds consisting of two characters only, but of terms made up of three or four ideographs there is as a rule no explanation given. The difficulty of studying Chinese is immensely increased by the unscholarly fashion in which our dictionaries are compiled. (6) The indifference we show to neighbours and foreigners ought to be abandoned. Here in our own country we are only polite and deferential to relations and friends. Neighbours are neglected and there is little sympathy shown with the weak and the oppressed. In foreign countries, in China and Korea, for instance, the manners of our people when associating with aliens are anything but deferential, as was pointed out in an article which appeared in the Tōkyō Asahi Shimbun on Sept. 12 entitled Shinajin no Nihonkwan. Is it not a fact that Chinese students who have attended our schools become intensely anti-Japanese when they return to their own country? This is nothing but the natural result of the treatment they have received in Japan.

The two first copies of the Junri (Rationalist) have reached us. This is the Japanese organ of the Rational Press Association of London, which for a series of years has been doing magnificent work in Great Britain and her colonies by supplying the reading public with millions of cheap editions of eye-opening books. The October number of the Junri contains English letters from Professor B. H. Chubb, Mr. W. B. Mason, and Mr. C. A. Parry* all expressing strong sympathy with the promoters of the rationalistic movement in Japan. Mr. Robert Young, the scholarly editor of the Japan Chronicle, also welcomes the publication of the new journal and wishes it success. It is as yet a very tiny monthly, but it will no doubt gain in size as time goes on, and we are told that it is to eventually become a Weekly. Among the Protestant journals there are several which are pronouncedly rationalistic in character. Such as the Rikugō Zasshi, the Michi, the Shinjin, the Universalist and the Kiristokyō Sekai. The Kaitakusha publishes rationalistic articles from time to time, and it goes without saying that magazines like the Taiyō, the Tō-A no Hikari, the Waseda Bungaku and the Chūō Kōron welcome articles which advocate free thought.

Hence it may be questionable whether there is room for another rationalistic journal. But if the Junri devotes itself to the task of translating articles which appear in the Literary Guide and of drawing attention to the rapid progress of thought on religious subjects in England, it will be serving a very useful purpose.

* * *

Pressure of other matter has prevented our noticing Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō's organ the Tō-A no Hikari for several months. As we indicated some little time ago, the matter which appears in that Magazine almost exclusively consists of reports of speeches delivered before the Tō-A Kyōkai, a learned Society connected with the Tōkyō Imperial University, with a very large and influential membership. Both religion and morality as well as philosophy are constantly discussed at the Society's meetings on broad lines by well known scholars. Notwithstanding his great age, Dr. Katō Hiroyuki is still able to make long speeches on his favourite topics. The August number of the Tō-A no Hikari contains a full report of one of these on evolution and selection in morality. Dr. Katō traces the development of morality through three different stages—that of natural selection, artificial selection and what he calls individual selection, based on personal character and power, somewhat as follows:—(1) When a nation begins to emerge from a state of barbarism it overhauls its many customs, reasons about them, and judges them by its standard of knowledge. This leads to the rejection of some and the retention of others. As a rule the fittest survive. This is what I call natural selection. (2) The next kind of selection is brought about by rulers, religious teachers or learned men undertaking to furnish a moral standard to the masses, to act as guides to ordinary people. This is artificial selection. (3) In recent times quite another kind of moral development has been going on. Men and women have become their own instructors and their own guides in morality. Each individual chooses his or her path and refuses to be dictated to by others. Self-control, self-guidance, self-development, self-culture—these are prominent to day. This is the latest and in many ways the finest of all the stages through which morality passes in its onward march. What is right and what wrong, what is desirable and what undesirable, what is superior and what inferior each man determines for himself, nowadays. Unenlightened and ignorant people only bow to the authority of priests or ministers of religion. Religion may be necessary for such persons; for the enlightened it is certainly not necessary. (Shūkyō wa koto ni muchishiki shakwai ni nomi hitsuyō de aru to iu koto wa dangen suru). The history of Christianity in modern Europe seems to show this quite plainly, says Dr. Kaō.

In the September number of the Tō-A-no Hikari appears the report of a very interesting lecture delivered by Dr. Inoue Tetsujirō to the Tō-A Kyōkai on (聖人) Seijin. This term has been rendered sage, wise man, philosopher, saint, holy man and perfect man, and is one of the titles by which Confucius is known in China and Japan. (Dr. Inoue rightly contends that since it is Chinese in origin it is only by consulting Chinese books that we can settle on its precise signification. Dr. Williams gives the signification of sei as "instinctively wise and good, possessing universal knowledge, holy, sacred, sage, unattainable by common mortals." Dr. Inoue is of opinion that neither sage, Weiser or Weltweiser is a correct rendering of seijin. The first is the equivalent of kenja (賢者), the second of chisha (知者) and the third of tetsugakusha. By the definition Dr. Inoue gives of the term Seijin it will be seen that it stands for certain intellectual and moral qualities, combined with didactic talents, exemplified in conduct of a very superior order. Here are the eight characteristics of the Seijin as stated by Dr. Inoue. (1) A Seijin is a man whose virtue far surpasses that of ordinary men. Cæsar, Charlemagne, Napoleon, Bismarck and our Hideyoshi were all great men, but they were not Seijin, as they were not conspicuously more virtuous than other men. (2) A Seijin must be a man with a great personality, with character that occupies a higher level than that of ordinary men. Confucius tells us he was born wise. (Ware umarete shikōshite kore o shiru mono nari). Without extraordinary natural endowment no man can become a Seijin. (3) A Seijin must be a teacher of men. A seijin is the teacher of a hundred generations of men," says Mencius. We may add that he is the teacher of ten thousand generations. He teaches morality, but he may not confine himself to that. (4) A Seijin practises what he preaches. He is not a mere expounder of moral principles or doctrines. In his life he exemplifies what he teaches. He is invariably a man of strong will who is prepared when occasions call for it to take an active part in human affairs. (5) A Seijin is always a man of great intelligence. His knowledge of subjects bearing on human life and conduct surpasses that of ordinary men. Technical knowledge of the scientific kind he may not possess. He may be no astronomer, no chemist, no mathematician, no physicist. That seijin are all-wise and all-powerful (zenchi, zennō) is of course untrue. There are things they do not know and things they cannot do. (6) A seijin must be a man of great influence over other men. This influence comes from a powerful personality. Men readily subject themselves to one whom superior virtue qualifies for leadership. The influence of seijin extends to distant generations and to remote countries. It is almost illimitable. (7) The Seijin fulfils a great function in the world's history. Every man who is worthy to be called a seijin is the author of a moral revolution, the opener of a new era. Take the world's four great Seijin, Confucius, Socrates, Shaka Muni and Christ. They were all born at a time when men's minds were prepared for an abandonment of old ways, theories and principles and for the reception of new teaching. They were the creators of new worlds of thought, of new forms of civilisation and so men have regarded them as messengers of Heaven, sons of God, as intrusted with a Divine mission, and they themselves, while displaying the most wonderful humility; gave abundant proofs that they fully realized the loftiness of their aims and the exalted character of the function they each filled. (8) Seijin are hasteners of the coming of new epochs (Seijin wa ichi tenki (轉機) wo unagasu mono nari). Such men come into the world at a time when society is eager for a change, when new demands are being made. The great power they wield is partly the effect of the superiority of their knowledge and partly the result of the adroit use they make of the spirit of the times. Mencius says that the utilizing of tendencies counts for more than the possession of knowledge. The age and the man are the counterpart of each other. Remarkable ages have brought into existence remarkable men. The ripeness of the age for the inauguration of great changes and the appearance of a man with sufficient force of character to sway the minds of men and predispose them for reforms, are necessarily the complement of each other.

Now, a question which suggests itself to us is this. The world's four great Seijin lived some nineteen hundred or over two thousand years ago. Has the appearance of Seijin among men ceased. Rather than admit this is it not more reasonable to suppose that Seijin have been appearing all along, though in type they have differed from the four great men named above? Is not the term Seijin applicable to men like Kant and Darwin? Dr. Inoue Enryō observed once that the world's four Seijin were Confucius, Buddha, Socrates and Kant. If Darwin is to be included among the world's greatest men, it is owing to the theories which he succeeded in establishing and not on account of superiority of character or on account of the bearing of his teaching on morality. Kant did write much on morality, but he was more of a philosopher than a mere moralist and hence differed from the four ancient Seijin named above. Though successful in a certain class of charitable work, "General" Booth can not be considered a Seijin on account of the deficiency of his knowledge. Tolstoi fulfils the ancient ideal in a greater degree than Booth, but his eccentricities, morbid sentiments and tendency to run to extremes disqualify him for rank among the world's greatest men. He is an apostle of Christian renaissance rather than an advocate of radical reform. It is perhaps allowable to apply the term Seijin to great poets like Dante, Shakespeare and Goethe, or to great painters like Raphael and Michelangelo, or the founders of religious sects, in a limited sense, and the term Seijin has been applied to enlightened monarchs and also to local magnets, such, for instance, as Nakae Tōjū (1608-1648) who is known as the Ōmi Seijin. But there are only four men, or, if the names of Kant and Darwin be added, certainly only six whom the whole civilised world regards as Seijin.

The four greatest men the world has produced each has his own special merits; so to accept the guidance of one and reject that of another is not the proper course to follow; for by so doing we should miss certain benefits to be derived only from one or other of the four. Since each of these men was a very great personality and very highly endowed intellectually, to learn from them does not imply attainment to the standard they reached (Seijin wa taijin, tai tensai ni shite, kana-razu shimo mananda itarubeki mono ni arazu). But not to study the life and teaching of each of these is to dwarf the development of one's own powers. It may be beyond our powers to imitate these great men in many things. But to have a good model before one even if it be too difficult to imitate thoroughly is conducive to progress. If we can't proceed a thousand miles on a given course, we can perhaps manage a hundred. We must not come to the conclusion that all that we have to learn can only be learnt from the four men named above. In all times and in different countries there have been talented and far-seeing men who have in various degrees embodied in their speech and their lives the highest wisdom the world has known. At the feet of such men too should we sit. Butsu Sorai says:—"One must be a seijin oneself in order to understand a seijin." Though this is true to a certain extent, yet seijin are still men, and so we and they have much in common. Mencius says Seijin ware to rui wo onajū suru mono "The seijin is of the same class of beings that I am." In as far as we cultivate the higher parts of our nature, so far shall we find that we have much in common with seijin. The conditions which conduce to the appearance of great moral heroes are the same everywhere. Riku Shōsan says: Tōkai seijin arite, izu; kono kokoro onajiki nari, kono ri onajiki nari. Sūkai seijin arite, izu; kono kokoro onajiki nari, kono ri onajiki nari. Whether a seijin appear in the Eastern Sea or the Western, the mental state and the reasons which cause him to appear are the same. We all have the germs of greatness in us, but to develop those germs to the extent of producing a personality that shall command the homage of our fellow-men far and wide is an extremely difficult task. The title seijin is one which can only be correctly applied to the very greatest men and we should beware of misusing it in any way, as this can only lead to confusion in the spiritual world. In order to make clear what is really signified by a term which is often employed in various senses I have delivered this speech thereon.

* * *

The Koe (Roman Catholic) maintains a high standard of unworldliness, or other-worldliness, which is comparatively rare among Christian journals. Year in and year out this magazine protests against the secularization of Christianity habitually practised by the members of certain Protestant Sects. In an excellent editorial which appears in the October number of this organ entitled Demand and Supply in the Propagation of Religion the subject is thus discussed:—"The law of demand and supply not only holds good in the business world, it is applicable to the dissemination of religious doctrines, with certain limitations. Merchants, in order to get rid of goods, have to consult the tastes of their customers. In religion this can only be done to a very small extent. Evangelists have a fixed message to deliver; they are not at liberty to alter doctrines in order to bring them into agreement with the spirit of the age. But this is just what is being done by Buddhists, Shintoists and numerous Protestant sects. In order to attract the lower orders, gross superstitions are retained and made the most of by certain priests. With the object of making religion palatable to certain minds, Pantheism, Buddhist philosophy or Confucianism is taught or various works of charity are relied on for creating an interest in the workers and gaining adherents for their sects. We do not mean to say that works of charity are not to be carried on by the Church. No church perhaps has done more of this sort of work than the Catholic Churches of Europe and America. But this kind of effort can never be regarded as not the chief object religious teachers have in view. On every hand we see much trimming to the times, much lowering of standards in response to the demands of the public. Now we do not for a moment say that the aspirations of mankind are not to be considered by religious teachers and efforts made to satisfy them when these aspirations are of the right sort. Everything depends on the attitude of various minds to the religion we preach. If it is a friendly attitude, then care should be taken to inquire into the nature of the demands made and to satisfy them as far as possible. But in the case of persons who absolutely refuse to bow to the authority of the church or to accept its teaching, who demand entire liberty to settle on their own creed and accept or reject what doctrines of Christianity they please, they must be told that this is an improper attitude for them to take to God's messengers. But before unbelievers it is as a rule impolitic to be dwelling on the authority of the church. Appeals have first to be made to the conscience and to reason and attempts made to show that the religion of Christ is adapted for satisfying the higher aspirations of mankind. Among the demands made by worldly persons some are reasonable and to be encouraged, others deserve no encouragement. To alter his creed to suit inquirers, to trim to the times and to prevailing opinion whatever it may be, this can only be done by the man who has no deep religious faith in his soul.

* * *

The Kirisutokyō Sekai publishes a letter on Family Worship written by a Japanese lady whose husband is a Christian. She says that the family worship in her house lasts less than 15 minutes. The whole family assembles at 6.45 a.m. around a table that will sit about 10 people. Each person reads his verse of scripture in turn, the little children and the servants often making rather amusing mistakes. (Kodomo ya jochū no yomi-mawashi ni wa zibun mendo kusakattari okashikattari suru yō na koto mo arimasu). Each member of the household has his or her morning for choosing a hymn. After the scripture reading is over, the master of the house explains the meaning of certain verses and chooses a text to be taken as a motto for the day and makes a few simple remarks thereon. Each member of the household takes it in turn to pray morning after morning. The children's prayers are very very short, but impressive in many ways, and the way the servants repeat the same prayers day after day is rather funny. Whatever happens in the house family prayers are not given up. Every member of the household is prompt in getting ready for the morning meeting at the breakfast table to worship God. "As you know," says the lady, "my good man is a bit of a sleepy head and often the children go into his bedroom and remind him that the time for worship is at hand (Otosan mo jiki o atsumari yo!). Our family worship has made us all punctual and has made us early risers, as after breakfast the children have to go off to school. When the head of the house is away I conduct the expository part of the ceremony, giving simple explanations of texts of scripture. Mothers of families should follow this practice.

AEROPLANES AND WIRELESS.

An aeroplane equipped with telegraphic apparatus by means of which it can communicate with the land is an auxiliary in warfare which far surpasses the aeroplane without it. Ascent and descent are not always an easy matter in uncertain or awkward country, and an airman reconnoitring for an army is at a great disadvantage if, having flown ten or twenty miles to ascertain the enemy's positions, he must return that distance and descend in order to communicate his information.

During the recent Army manoeuvres, when recognition of the aeroplanes was somewhat tardy, it occurred to me, writes Mr. Thorne Baker in the Daily Mail, that if the machines were fitted up with wireless they would immediately assume an importance which could not be ignored. A day afterwards we were carrying out experiments on Salisbury Plain.

Many problems of intense interest to the general public arise out of such experiments. Only a few weeks ago a public demonstration was given of an aircraft being directed by wireless. This means that power can be controlled in the aeroplane by people on the earth; and though the advantage of such a thing appears somewhat problematic there is no doubt that it demonstrates the possibility of operating apparatus in the aircraft which could be used as a means of receiving messages.

STRICTLY WIRELESS

Wireless telegraphy from air to earth is a very different problem from ordinary wireless, though to the lay mind it would seem simple enough. In an ordinary wireless station there is a mast, from which depend one or more aerial wires; but there is also a very strong connection with the earth (or the metal sides of a ship, or even the sea, in the case of a station afloat), which acts as an essential complement of the aerial and forms a vital part of the wireless system.

Now, when you are in the air there is obviously neither earth nor water; one has to deal with wireless in the strictest sense of the term, and signals sent from the aeroplane are liable to die out very quickly when it gets any distance from the receiving station. This absence of an "earth" is the stumbling block to wireless telegraphy from the air, but, like most other electrical difficulties, it can be overcome. In the apparatus used by me at the recent experiments on the War Office flying ground, two separate aerial elements, or antennae, were employed: a wire of special construction, very large superficially, but very light, ran from each side of the airman to the extreme side of the front planes or the machine, and thence backwards to the tail; in this way two equal aerial wires some forty feet long were obtained, one of which performed the same office as the "earth" would in an ordinary wireless station. A powerful, but small, sparking coil was fixed in a light wooden box to the passenger seat, behind the airman, and in this box also was the whole of the apparatus necessary to generate the electric waves.

VALUE OF WIRELESS TO THE AIRMAN

Needless to say, extremely careful calculation is necessary in order that each component part of the apparatus shall work in with the others: it is possible, for example, to waste a great deal of energy by not having the aerial wires of a length suited to the generator of the Hertzian waves, and so on. For long distance work it will be possible greatly to increase the efficiency of the apparatus without necessarily making its weight much greater. The Morse key, with which the airman taps out his messages, is fixed to his seat at his side, and with his left hand he can keep up communication in comfort with the army to which he is attached.

Signals of distress are already being discussed for airmen whose machines will be fitted with wireless. Consider the advantage of the system in a long flight overseas, when the aeroplane, by reason of its speed, may get a long way ahead of a tug or ship following it, and may then, through some accident, fall into the sea; a short, quick code signal—and it is known that the airman is in danger. It will even be possible, when directive wireless systems are a little further advanced, to locate with good approximation his actual position.

Some experiments were carried out a month ago in America from an aeroplane to a land station, when Mr. James McCurdy sent a message to a wireless operator from Barren Island to Sheephead Bay race track; in this instance a long aerial wire trailed behind the machine, fifty feet in length, weighed down with a lead bob. Such a system, however successful it might be, would be very dangerous for serious work. Any loose wire might get caught in the propeller, which would instantly be smashed owing to its high speed. The aerial wires must be fixed rigidly, yet they must not touch either the wooden stanchions or the steel wires of the aeroplane itself, as any contact would greatly diminish the efficiency of the apparatus.

THE OBNOXIOUS GRASSHOPPER.

A few words relative to the receiving apparatus may be of interest. The amount of electrical energy received from wireless signals even a few feet away from the sending apparatus is of such an exceedingly weak character that most delicate instruments are required to "pick it up." Two long wires suspended parallel to and about fifteen feet above the earth run north and east from one antennae and two more run south-west from the other. These wires are attached to the ends of a little coil of fine copper wire wound round a tube of glass, through which an endless band of fine iron wires travels, driven by clockwork; over the coil is wound another coil, the ends of which are connected with a pair of delicate telephones, which are kept to the ears by a spring iron band fitting over the receiver's head. Two small steel magnets are placed together opposite the glass tube through which the wire band is travelling, and the net electrical result is that when a "wave" is detected by the aerial wires a dull buzz is heard in the telephones. Long and short buzzes correspond to the dashes and dots respectively of the Morse code. This electro magnetic detector, as it is called, is one of the most successful pieces of apparatus invented by Mr. Marconi.

An experienced ear is required to hear these signals, and one has to make a strict convention with one's conscience not to be misled by sounds in the telephones which might easily be mistaken for real signals. Forunately, with my scheme of aerial wires, there are practically no noises heard due to atmospheric or ground effects: but lying on the ground at Salisbury Plain the other day the grasshoppers' buzzing sounded in the telephones so like the actual signals that it was necessary to stand up to receive and have the effect of the noise of the wind in one's ears instead. In subsequent experiments a portable sound-proof telephone box will be used for the receiving operator, though in actual warfare it would be essential to have the receiving station very portable and not incommoded with such a thing.

It is probable that within the next few months wireless communication with aeroplanes over considerable distances will be practicable, more especially since the Marconi Company have expressed their desire to coöperate in this latest branch of the wonderful science of telegraphy without wires.

COMPULSORY MILITARY SERVICE.

When one sees the fine results of military service in Germany, which is not only a training for war but an education and discipline which fits men better to enjoy the life and occupation of peace, it is hard to understand the almost universal objection to such a system in Great Britain and the United States. The horrible expression is often heard "what waste three years of the life of every young man?" Such an exclamation is far from the truth. The German boy comes out of the army—after his few years of discipline and service—a man. Our boys spend twice as long, many times, in their wayward independence, ruining themselves financially and physically to accomplish the same result.

A Canadian paper surprises us with a little editorial which shows a full understanding of the fact, which appreciation, is unfortunately, not general in Canada or her big neighbour. The following is taken from the Victoria Colonist and indicates that more or less discussion has taken place on this subject.

"The Montreal Gazette very truly says that compulsory training will require more support than has yet received before it can be brought about. The British people are averse to the principle of compulsion, and it will take a good deal more than has yet been advanced to convince them that they must adopt it in respect to military training. The Colonist would like to see every person reaching man's estate fitted to bear arms in the defence of his country. Indeed it is unable to understand why any healthy man should object to so qualifying himself. To us it seems a poor sort of spirit that relies upon some other else to defend his home, his family and himself.

Hence our strong advocacy of the cadet and boy scout movement. We are familiar with the claim that such things encourage militarism, but to our way of thinking it would be about as reasonable to say that a fire department is an encouragement to incendiarism and a police force to rowdysim. In Canada we have a rich land. If we publish to the world that, because we are opposed to militarism, we will not fit ourselves to defend it, we invite thereby other nations to come in and possess it, for surely, being opposed to militarism ourselves, we would not ask military people to defend us. Yet we are not going to advocate compulsory military service in Canada for two reasons. One is that it ought not to be necessary and the other is that it would be useless at the present time. It ought not to be necessary, because our militia system, supplemented by the youthful organizations above named, and rifle clubs, that ought everywhere to be organized, should be sufficient for the defence of the country."

The final paragraph of the above article shows however that lack of full appreciation of what up-to-date war really means; England, Canada and the United States all show excellent militia organizations, but men of experience know well that the militia of either of these countries would prove sadly deficient if thrown against the solid wall of the German or Japanese armies. It would be the old story of impulsive courage against scientific organization.

In this connection it is exceedingly interesting to note that a Japanese expert recently made the statement that it takes twenty years to make an army division. It may take twenty years to make a perfect machine, but it has been proved again and again that a good enough one can be made in a year. The point is—there might not be that year to give, for in the present state of the world many things could happen in a year.

A recent writer in an English magazine, whose article showed him to be a man who knew what he was writing about, prophesied that within ten years compulsory military service would be established in both Great Britain and the United States. Such a statement is surprising, but by no means impossible.

FIRE EXTINGUISHER EXHIBIT AT CRICKET GROUND.

An exhibition of the Star Chemical Fire Extinguisher was given at the cricket ground last night to Chief of Police Ikariyama and Fire Chief Morgin. A large crowd of both Japanese and foreign business men also attended. The "house" consisted of a large box 14 x 6 x 5 feet, covered with coal tar and filled with loose paper, shavings, straw and kindling wood.

Mr. Baring, the demonstrator, waited until the fire was going merrily and Chief Morgin gave the word, when he succeeded in extinguishing it in a matter of a minute or so, much to the surprise of the spectators.

MR. MORGIN'S OPINION.

Mr. Morgin expressed his appreciation of the extinguisher and said that he thought it would be especially useful for hospitals and schools on account of the ease with which it could be handled by women. He says that it is the best thing of its kind he has ever seen, especially as he understands that the chemical being dry will do no damage to furniture, clothing or carpets on which it might fall while extinguishing a fire.

CONSULAR APPOINTMENTS.

Mr. W. B. Cunningham, British Vice-Consul at Osaka, being transferred to the Consulate General at Manila, Mr. F. C. Greatorex, assistant in the Kobe Consulate-General, has been ordered to act for Mr. E. H. Holmes, the newly appointed Vice-Consul at Osaka, until the latter assumes the office. Student Interpreter Mr. R. M. Austin belonging to the Embassy in Tokyo, has been ordered to proceed to Kobe to temporarily fill the place of Mr. Greatorex.

Austro-Hungary having no Consulate at Dairen, the British Consul at Dairen has been entrusted with the interests and protection of the Austro-Hungarian residents in Dairen and Port Arthur.

Mr. Thomas J. O'Brien, the U.S. Ambassador, having gone home on leave of two months' absence, Councillor Mr. M. Schuyler will be the Charge d'affaires ad interim of the Embassy.

BASEBALL AT KOBE.

The first of the series of Baseball matches between Waseda University and Chicago University, arranged by the Osaka Mainichi to be played at Koroen, was played this afternoon in excellent weather conditions and before a crowd of six or seven thousand, says the Kobe Herald of the 25th inst. The result of the game was 8 to 4, in favour of Chicago University. The score by innings being as follows:

	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, NOV. 5TH, 1910.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

It is reported from Shanghai that a large silver mine has been discovered in Szechuan province. Mining has already been set about, and the ore is of good quality.

A HANKOW telegram says that British merchants there are actively engaging in exporting bean-cake. The exportation of sesame and raw cotton has also commenced.

AT 3.21 a.m. on Monday a slight earthquake shock was felt in Yokohama, lasting 56 seconds. The oscillations were principally in a south-south-easterly and north-north-westerly direction.

ON the 31st ultimo the summit of Mount Asama in Nagano prefecture was covered with the first snow of the season. The function of closing the ascent to the mountain was held on the previous day.

THE Exhibits Association of the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition reports that the Association has taken up the management of affairs in connection with the opening on a small-scale of an Art Exhibition at Budapest in Hungary. The Exhibition is to be held in a building (some 380 tsubo) in the national Art Museum there, charges for transportation within the frontier of Hungary to be borne by the government of that country.

ABOUT one o'clock on Tuesday morning a fire occurred at Irihune-cho, in Otaru, resulting in the destruction of 62 houses and other buildings. The loss of a lumber yard which was burnt out, is estimated at 20,000 yen or more.

MR. GRAHAME-WHITE in his aeroplane astonished the officials at the White House, Washington, on the 14th ult., by alighting on the roadway in a narrow street from a height of 800 feet, and afterwards reascending, an even more difficult feat, without touching lamp-posts or railings.

IT is reported that a mercantile firm has been established at Hamburg with a capital of 1,000,000 marks. The chief object of the establishment is to import soya-bean from Manchuria, having a branch office at Harbin. The German Government is said to be giving great aid to the firm.

THE Karafuto Government has decided to receive 300 immigrants in 1911 from various prefectures in Japan Proper, and the expenditure for this purpose is added to the next budget for that office. Each prefecture is getting this favour, while the western sea shore districts are properly prepared for it.

A DESPATCH from Seoul states that the Bishop of the Church of England in Korea, Rt. Rev. A.B. Turner, who has been receiving treatment in the Chemulpo Hospital, succumbed, after a short illness, on the 29th ult. The cause of death is believed to have been blood poisoning.

IT has been agreed between the Japanese Department of Communications and the Great Northern Telegraph Company, of the United States, that the submarine cable between Tsushima and Fusan will be bought by Japan at a cost of 150,000 yen. As a result, a reduction in the telegraphic charges will be made.

WE are in receipt of an elaborate pamphlet published by the Lighthouse Bureau, containing two lists of foreign vessels coming to Japan, one showing the names of vessels arranged alphabetically with other particulars, and the other representing the same classified according to the nationality of ships.

IN Karafuto 74,000 koku of trout was caught during the fishing season this year, against 30,574 koku in last year. The catch of salmon, having so far amounted to over 10,000 koku, is expected to reach more than double the amount of last year (7,000 koku) by a month from now, when the fishing season closes.

THE German armoured cruiser Gneisenau (Commander Captain von Usslar) will leave for the Far East on November 10. The cruiser squadron in the Far East will thus be increased to two armoured cruisers, the Scharnhorst and Gneisenau, with three smaller cruisers, Leipzig, Nurnberg, and Emden. All are of the most modern type.

THE well-known French Tyre factory "Michelin & Co.," for which Mr. L. Suzor of Yokohama is General Agent, offered a prize of 100,000 francs for the first aviator who would fly from Paris to the summit of the "Puy de Dome," a mountain about 5,000 feet high, situated in the Centre of France. This flight is to be performed in a maximum time of 6 hours, and the aviator must also carry one passenger with him. Mr. Wey-mann tried to win this prize on the 8th of September, and had to stop his flight, at about 4 miles from the summit of the mountain, on account of dense fog. The result of the first successful flight will be communicated to the papers by cable.

THE Russian Government, it is reported, proposes to hold an international exhibition of commercial and industrial lines of business at St. Petersburg. It seems probable that Japan will participate in the exhibition.

THE projected establishment of a gas company in Hokkaido has been sanctioned by the Government. A meeting of the promoters will be held in the course of next week in order to have a consultation. The work, says a promoter, will show so rapid a progress that a considerable part of the Hokkaido will be furnished with gas light by next winter.

THE total number of the military cadets to be entered this year is reported to be 508. The following is the classification:—

Infantry	314
Cavalry	34
Field Artillery	75
Heavy Artillery	15
Engineers	23
Commisariats	47

THE FOURTEENTH MEETING of the Constitutional Conference was held at the Treasury on the 12th ult., and lasted about two hours. All the members were present—Mr. Asquith, Mr. Lloyd George, Lord Crewe, and Mr. Birrell (representing the Government), and Mr. Balfour, Lord Lansdowne, Lord Cawdor, and Mr. A. Chamberlain (representing the Opposition). It is understood that further meetings are in contemplation.

A LONDON TELEGRAM, transmitted from San Francisco, says the Kokumin, indicates that the British forces in Egypt are being organized on a war footing, and that the officers are rejoining their commands. The War Office fears an uprising on the lines of a Mahomedan holy war. It is expected that Sir Eldon Gorst, British Agent and Consul-General in Egypt, will be recalled, his successor being Sir Reginald Wingate, Sirdar of the Egyptian Army and Governor-General of the Soudan.

THE penetrating power of the 12-inch gun was recently demonstrated at Sandy Hook, when a concrete wall twenty feet thick and heavily reinforced with steel beams was pierced by a 12-inch shell fired at high velocity. The equivalent penetration for this shell would have been twenty-two inches of armour. Although the concrete was mastered by the gun, the way it stood up to the attack was, we understand, gratifying to the authorities and confirms its fitness for use in coast fortifications.

THE long-prevailing depression over the Japanese raw silk market seems to have gradually cleared away, and a marked activity has recently been witnessed. A certain Government official is quoted as saying that the recent briskness of the raw silk market is due to restoration of the American financial world from its depression, and to the increase of demand for silk. The summer and autumnal sericultural industry in Japan was estimated to show an increased output of cocoons, but the recent floods and bad weather afterwards caused the output to decrease, making it almost the same as that of last year. Despite these circumstances, however, the future prospect is believed to be bright.

THE TARIFF.

Saturday, October 29.

Count Hayashi is quoted by all the leading newspapers of Tokyo as speaking very emphatically on the subject of the tariff. He claims to have some knowledge of the character of Englishmen, and that knowledge induces him to declare that British objections to the new rates are based on a firm conviction of commercial necessity, and have nothing to do with domestic politics. His Excellency considers it inevitable that unless some concession be made to England's legitimate requests, an injurious effect will be produced upon the Alliance, which result would be an international calamity. He therefore urges the Japanese Government to draft for presentation to the Diet a duly amended tariff, accepting all the responsibilities for such a step. Possibly these responsibilities may be unpleasant, but that is a mere question of domestic politics, a question between the Legislature and the Administration. It is not to be compared in importance with the international problem involved. As to the plea that to reduce the rates on certain English staples would represent a privilege of which other States would necessarily take advantage under the most-favoured-nation clause, the Count insists that the staples in question are specialised goods, not supplied or suppliable by other producers.

The Mainichi Dempo undertakes to set forth the views of the various political parties with regard to this question. It quotes the Seiyu-kai leaders as declaring that some concessions to British merchants are absolutely necessary, and that if a suitably amended bill be introduced in the Diet, the Seiyu-kai will pass it, but will at the same time carefully differentiate between the question of domestic and foreign policies. The Katsura Cabinet en bloc will not be held responsible, but the resignation of the present Minister of Foreign Affairs will be expected.

The Popular Party, that is to say, the quondam Progressists, are represented by the same newspaper as adopting a still more resolute attitude. That was to have been expected. They take the line that the Diet will be humiliated if it is asked to amend a bill almost before the ink on it is dry. For bringing that humiliation upon the National Assembly the Katsura Cabinet must be held responsible, and must therefore be required to resign. The Popular Party's leaders apparently ignore the obvious fact that they themselves are subjecting the Diet to much greater humiliation when they represent that body of legislators as having obeyed the Government's instructions without subjecting them to anything like due scrutiny.

The Central Party takes the just line that the Diet and the Cabinet must divide the responsibility equally between them and that there need not be any occasion for resignations.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun continues to take an extreme line. It contends, in effect, that nothing can be done until the Cabinet resigns.

The Asahi Shimbun makes a suggestion. It starts by pointing out that if always, since the days of Sir Harry Parkes, English fiscal interests and Japanese have seemed to clash, the explanation is not that any unfriendly feeling is entertained by England towards Japan, but simply that Great Britain's free trade policy places her in a specially vulnerable position. In the present instance there is right on both sides. English merchants are right in endeavouring to protect their own interests and Japan is right in maintaining that if concessions be made to England, they will have to be made to other Powers also. In these circumstances our contemporary suggests that the Japanese Government should adopt the course pursued by the United States in 1894 with regard to salt. On that occasion the Washington Government announced that certain tariff privileges would be granted to any Powers which admitted American salt duty free. Why should not Japan now announce that she will reduce the rates upon certain fixed products of any Powers which give certain privileges to Japanese goods? Then if it were arranged that the specified products included those on account of which Great Britain is particularly interested, the problem would be solved. The Asahi advances this proposition with all deference, but we fear that our contemporary's idea is untenable for the simple reason that the most-favoured-nation clause is unconditional. It provides that any privilege, favour or immunity which either contracting party has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the Government, ships, subjects or citizens of any other State, shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the Government, ships, subjects or citizens of the other contracting party. The notable fact is that Great Britain has always been a staunch upholder of this unconditional clause, although she herself is least qualified to benefit by it.

The Chuo thinks that after due consultation with the British Government a suitable arrangement will be elaborated and submitted to the Diet next February. The Chuo calls for the resignation of the Cabinet en bloc.

Monday, October 31.

There continues to be much talk about the tariff question. The Shogyo Shimpō discusses it in two leading articles. In the first it denies that the problem has really been invested with a political character by the British Government. It is true that attempts have been made to extract party capital out of a purely fiscal programme, but the British Government is not likely to be swayed by such devices, nor will the British nation fail to recognize that Japan's action was inevitable in connection with her emergence from the era of conventional tariffs into that of statutory. An earnest effort should therefore be made to explain the situation fully to the English Government, and if that be unsuccessful our contemporary suggests one of two courses. To ask the Diet to amend a law which has just passed and which has not been tested by even one day's operation is of course out of the question. What is wanted is some method of materialising for the purposes of special negotiation the free trade policy pursued by England towards all nations. The Shogyo thinks that among England's many colonies and over-sea dominions it should be possible to find some means of making to Japan concessions which would serve as an equivalent for a modification of the new Japanese tariff. But if that also proved impossible, there remains one resource, namely, to ask the Diet to pass a supplementary law providing that the duties imposed by Japan on imports from any country which practises free trade shall be determinable by Imperial Edict irrespective of the General Tariff. If that were done, concessions could be made to England and the situation would be solved. But the Shogyo Shimpō thinks that even then the resignation of the present Minister of Foreign Affairs will be inevitable. For our own part we are inclined to doubt the possibility of reconciling the Shogyo's suggestion with an unconditional most-favoured-nation clause.

It is interesting to observe that Japanese publicists, while deprecating the notion that a political aspect should be imparted to this question by Englishmen, pervert it themselves into a palpable political weapon. Attacks upon Count Komura are made from all directions, even leaders of the Seiyu-kai being now included among his assailants. One comfortable feature of the commotion is unanimity in asserting that the Anglo-Japanese alliance must be preserved, coûte qu'il coûte. The incident, unpleasant as it is in itself, has at least served the useful purpose of showing how deeply rooted is Japan's loyalty to the alliance.

Wednesday, November 2.

Our readers may remember that some time ago several Tokyo journals, evidently inspired by one of those delightfully untrustworthy sources of information, a news agency, attributed to Mr. Abe, a Secretary of the Foreign Office, certain statements about the tariff. He was made to say that a portion of the tariff would be amended, and that the responsibility for that step would have to be shared by the Diet as well as by the Government. It now appears that Mr. Abe said nothing of the kind, though so far as the Diet is concerned he might have said it with perfect propriety. The Hochu Shimbun, however, is now up in arms. Another news agency claims to have interviewed the Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs on the 1st instant and to have been assured by him, apparently in Mr. Abe's presence, that the words attributed to the latter had not been used. The Hochi waxes quite irate over this incident. It frames an indictment from which there is no possible escape. One count is that Mr. Ishii insults the press when he accuses it of publishing incorrect matter; the other count is that if Mr. Abe did not speak in the sense reported, steps should have at once been taken to correct the error. This is really quite comical. The idea of the Tokyo press girding against the insult of being supposed to publish incorrect news can scarcely be received with any show of gravity. As for the contention that anything left uncontradicted must be regarded as true, it is a plainly unpractical argument. To carry out such a principle would virtually amount to editing the whole of the newspaper press. Newspapers have a certain measure of responsibility. Their first business is to tell the truth and to avoid misleading their readers. In no really civilised country are the Authorities held accountable for contradicting any erroneous statements made by the press, and among no sensible persons is the truth of a statement assumed because it is not contradicted.

It must have been recognized by this time that a number of Japanese party politicians are diligently endeavouring to make capital out of this tariff question, and that they would rejoice exceedingly could they convert it into a weapon for overthrowing the Ministry. Some of their methods of compassing that end do not appeal to any high canon of fairness or moderation, but these are qualities which seldom make their presence very conspicuous in party politics.

COUNT HAYASHI.

Count Hayashi is again quoted as affirming that the only practical course for Japan to pursue is to lower her tariff rates with regard to special British manufactures. Concerning the apprehension that difficulties would then arise with other States under the most favoured nation clause, the Count thinks that such a fear is idle. Japan would merely have to say, "All right; if you claim the same privilege, it shall be extended in your case also to the same goods." Inasmuch, however, as the articles mainly in question are confined to British manufactures, other Powers could not qualify. Count Hayashi appears to us (Japan Mail) to overlook the fact that other Powers might interpret the most favoured nation clause as entitling them to concessions for their own special manufactures if concessions were made to England for hers. His Excellency's solution is too simple, in our opinion.

In this context we observe that the Fiji Shimpō makes a practical suggestion. It is that the Government should adopt for its policy in negotiating with other countries a reduction of the import duty on cereals. The tariff as originally presented to the Diet, provided for a duty of 15 per cent. on rice, that being the equivalent of 64 sen per picul. But at the instance of the Seiyu-kai the figure was raised to one yen. It is plain that for a country like Japan which is yearly consuming more food stuffs than it produces, a tax upon the import of these is very unwise, especially as it will hit the import of rice from Korea, which is now a part of the Japanese Empire. The Fiji sees here a margin for negotiating with foreign States. This does not refer to England, however. In her case the Fiji continues to advocate frank reduction of rates.

The Nippon observes that if English iron continues to be admitted on the present easy terms, the chances of the Edamitsu Foundry becoming an independent and prosperous concern are very small, and if the Government asks the Diet to make special concessions to English iron, then the proposed appropriation for extending the Foundry must be at once struck out of the budget.

THE CHINESE PARLIAMENT.

It is now stated that a memorial has been addressed to the Throne by all the Viceroys and Governors in combination. The Asahi Shimbun's Peking correspondent undertakes to give not only the gist of this memorandum but also its motive. The gist is that if a National Assembly be opened, the Empire will immediately become strong and its finances plentiful. This, the memorialists think, is proved by the experience of Japan, which prior to the opening of the Diet had a revenue of only 80 million yen, whereas her income now amounts to 600 millions. The motive ascribed to the memorialists is said to have been furnished by the resolution adopted by the Mukden Local Assembly and other public bodies in the sense that only in national union can safety be found against the dangers consequent on the Russo-Japanese alliance and the annexation of Korea. It appears that this memorial was forwarded telegraphically, and there is collateral evidence that it actually was presented, for in an Imperial message, read to the Senate on the morning of the 28th instant, allusion was made to the fact that such a memorial signed by four Viceroys and other high officials had reached the Throne. The message further convoked a meeting of Privy Councillors and other State magnates to be held in the Palace for the purpose of considering the question. It is alleged that public opinion inclines to the belief that this problem will receive a speedy solution.

It must be a time of intense anxiety to Chinese statesmen, as it is indeed to all friends of the great Far-Eastern Empire. It has been well said that China for many centuries has been a constitutional though not a representative country, inasmuch as her Sovereigns have held the sceptre practically by the fiat of the people. But between an autocracy which can only be disturbed by a rebellion and a government elected by the representatives of the people there is an immense interval, and no country has ever tried the experiment of bridging that interval in a night and a morning, as China is now asked to do.

THE CHINCHOW-AIGUN RAILWAY.

It would seem that the new Minister of Posts and Telegraphs, Mr. Tang Shao-yi, is not at all disposed to abandon the project of the Chinchow-Aigun Railway. The telegrams say that, at a recent meeting of high officials from the Department over which Mr. Tang presides as well as from the Waiwupu and the Department of Finance, the question came up for discussion in immediate connection with the raising of a loan in America for the purpose of building the line. Mr. Tang is said to have represented that the railway was originally planned by the former Viceroy of Manchuria, and that it had been shelved owing to Russia's opposition. Mr. Tang, however, considered that result very regrettable and intimated that he had a plan of his own for restoring the situation. The meeting therefore decided to leave the matter in his hands.

According to the Mainichi Dempo the Governments of the United States and China are equally reluctant to abandon the construction of the Chingchow-Aigun Railway. It is now an open secret that Mr. Secretary Knox's proposal for the neutralization of Manchuria was never intended to be anything more than a stepping stone to the consummation of the above railway project. In Washington the belief is evidently entertained that the most effective method of preserving the open door is to have open avenues passing through it. We can well understand, therefore that Mr. Secretary Knox desires to see this Chingchow-Aigun road built, and is reluctant to abandon the project on account of one rebuff. The latest phase of the affair, according to our Tokyo contemporary, is that the projectors are now agitating for the construction of a road from Chingchow to Yaonang, with the intention of subsequently carrying it to Aigun, not via Tsitsihar but by some more circuitous route. Inasmuch, however, as no route can possibly emerge at Aigun without having previously crossed the Russian railway, it is not apparent that this partial change of programme can accomplish anything towards eliminating Russia's objections. The Mainichi Dempo nevertheless affirms confidently that the Chingchow-Yaonang scheme has entered the region of practical politics and that it includes the building of a harbour at Lienshan.

A TOKYO THERSITES.

The Nippon, under the editorship of an ex-official of the Bank of Japan, is curiously conspicuous at present for intemperate criticism of everything connected with the Cabinet. Nothing that savours of officialdom can be right in the Nippon's eyes, and among other polite suggestions it bids the Japan Mail hold its tongue, as insufficiently informed. Practically the whole policy declared by the Prime Minister and endorsed by the leading bankers at the recent meeting of the Clearing Houses is denounced by the Nippon as either a sham or a blunder, and our contemporary has not sufficient respect for the reputation of its own country to refrain from accusing its financiers of deliberate chicanery. Thus it asserts that in connection with recent Conversion operations the Treasury announced public subscriptions to the extent of 130 million yen, whereas 100 millions of that sum were in reality put up by the under-writing syndicate of bankers; and it extends the same slander to the case of the Seikoshō loan, to which it affirms that only 3 millions were really subscribed by the people, and 10 millions were put up by the banks. Consequently, whereas the issue of the transaction is reported to have been a total subscription of 13 millions odd, the real result was that the syndicate of banks will themselves have to take up 7 millions out of the ten required. We imagine that if any foreign journal were to charge Japan's leading bankers and Ministers of State with gross deception such as the Nippon deliberately accuses them of, that journal would be the first to denounce the foreign traducer.

THE "SEIYU-KAI" AND THE GOVERNMENT.

The Kwanto section of the Seiyu-kai held a meeting on the 1st instant in Maebashi, and if we may judge from a speech made by Mr. Matsuda Masahisa, the big Party is assuming an attitude of hostility to the Cabinet. The principal accusations preferred against the Ministry are that instead of reducing the taxation, it proposes to spend a large sum upon implementing the navy, and that it shows no disposition to deal drastically with the problem of riparian works. According to Mr. Matsuda's calculation, the losses annually incurred owing to inundations amount to a sum which if capitalized at 4 per cent., would reach 700 million yen, whereas these ravages might be effectually guarded against by an outlay of 200 millions. The Seiyu-kai leader did not hesitate to denounce the Katsura Cabinet as the Military Party and to declare that the administration of the Empire's affairs was rapidly drifting back to the conditions which existed in pre-restoration days.

Dr. Hatoyama is reported to have spoken in very strong terms against the idea of changing the Empire's tariff to suit the convenience of a group of foreign merchants. But we suspect that the stenographer did not take down the Doctor's words with thorough accuracy.

THE CHINESE LOAN.

The Jiji Shimpō has a telegram from Washington saying that China's proposals for a loan of 50 million dollars (gold) have been accepted by a syndicate in the United States under the leadership of the Morgan Bank and the Standard Oil Company represented by Messrs. Kuhn, Loeb and Company. The loan is to carry 5-per-cent. interest and will be issued at par, so that the sum actually received by China will be about 48 millions. Nothing whatever is stated as to the purpose to which the money is to be applied, neither is there any mention of security. It may be, as the Jiji suggests that for the sake of appearances the loan will be called a capital fund in connection with the new currency system, but the fact that the amount corresponds almost exactly with the deficit in the budget suggests very plainly that the proceeds of the loan are to be devoted to general finance. Such a policy, however, is almost incredible. It would be recklessly shortsighted on China's part to enter the market as a borrower for the purpose of making up a deficiency of revenue which, according to present appearances, will recur every year. The shrewd American financiers who are reported to be negotiating this transaction do not appear at all likely to put their hands into their pockets in such circumstances, and in spite of the explicit nature of the Jiji's telegram, further confirmation is required.

There appears to be no longer any room for doubt that the Chinese Government has concluded a loan of 50 million dollars (gold) with the syndicate represented by Mr. Straight. The document was signed on the 28th ult. and was ratified on the following day. Ten million dollars of the total are to be applied nominally to developing productive enterprises in Manchuria, the remaining 40 millions are for railway purposes in China and for forming a fund to secure the new paper currency. The security given is said to be the customs duties and the revenue derived from likin, but as the customs duties are already hypothecated up to the hilt, it is evident that this security is of the slenderest description. The prevalent report in official circles is that a large part of the money will go to clear off the mortgage on the Kin-Han (Lu-Han) Railway, but on the whole the conviction is that the proceeds of the loan will be used to make up the deficiency in the revenue. We stated in our last issue that China would probably receive $36 for each 100-dollar bond, but it appears that she is not to be quite so well treated as that: the net sum coming to her will be 95, and, as the rate of interest is 5 per cent., such terms cannot be considered at all favourable. In our opinion China has embarked upon a very hazardous policy when she contracts such an obligation. The only saving clause is that her vis à vis is the United States of America. Washington's foreign policy has always been distinguished by a spirit of moderation and justice. It may therefore be reasonably hoped that the aggressive potentialities of such a transaction will be reduced to a minimum in this case.

The Peking correspondent of the Jiji Shimpō says that this loan had been virtually under discussion from the beginning of the year between the Prince Regent's commissioners, on the one hand, and the United States Legation and Mr. Straight, on the other. The loan includes a provision for Manchuria's needs, so that the negotiations hitherto carried on at Mukden by Mr. Cloud may be said to have fallen through. The correspondent adds that, according to current belief, the attitude taken by the President of the Board of Finance when presenting the budget to the Senate was dictated by a desire to obtain public approval of the projected loan. On that occasion Mr. Tsai, after insisting that reliance on increased taxation was impossible, went on to advocate the speedy opening of a National Assembly, his aim being to secure the approval of the Senate when the loan came upon the tapis. The transaction, however, is said to be regarded with strong disapproval by the representatives of the other Great Occidental Powers, who consider it to be essentially an affair of political finance.

This subject is of such importance that great interest attaches to the outlines of the budget, as telegraphed by Mr. Ishikawa Hanzan, the well-known correspondent of the Hochi Shimbun in Peking. The statement has evidently undergone some mutilation in transport, but on the whole it is intelligible enough. The figures are as follow:—

REVENUE.		Taels.
Land tax	48,101,346

It will be understood that the above figures relate to the Central Government only.

From Mr. Ishikawa's account it appears that things are not so hopeless as they have hitherto been represented to be. So far as the expenditures are concerned, it is alleged that they have already been reduced to their lowest possible point, and that to bring them to the figures shown in the budget has needed untiring exertions on the part of the President of the Board of Finance. The important point is, however, that the Government never had any intention of asking the Senate to endorse a budget wherein the expenditures exceeded the income by nearly 30 million taels without proposing any contrivance to make ends meet. There has been talk of the impossibility of increased taxation, but the Minister of Finance, with the approval of his colleagues in the Cabinet, has drafted a bill to meet the situation by increasing the taxes on samsu (sake) and business and by imposing a new tax upon incomes. This bill would have been presented to the Senate simultaneously with the budget, had not the question of a National Assembly been given precedence, and the Government then conceived the plan of acceding to the petition for the immediate opening of a National Assembly on condition that the Senate agreed to vote the necessary financial measures. Mr. Tsai is reported to have said that as China is frankly following Japan's example in the matter of an income tax, the law relating to that impost has been taken en bloc from the Japanese original. There is a difficulty about meddling with the land tax, inasmuch as a rescript issued by the late Emperor pledged the Government not to augment that tax, but investigations have been commenced with a view to a State monopoly of tobacco. At all events the Chinese Government is not behaving in the unpractical manner described in previous telegrams. It has a definite plan for balancing the budget. The mystery remains, however, as to previous financial management. If the utmost exertions of the Minister of Finance were needed to reduce the deficit to 30 million taels, in the budget, what can have been done to tide over similar situations in the past? We know that the Imperial Household, at all events, can never have been in urgent need of money inasmuch as the late Empress-Dowager left behind her a treasury containing 100 million taels.

It appears to be a fact that the new Chinese loan of 50 million dollars gold is unsecured. There is no hypothecation of any Chinese asset, but there is an important provision that an American financier shall be appointed to oversee the monetary affairs of the Chinese State. There are rumours that recent changes of officials in the Central Government as well as the visit to Europe and America paid by Prince Tsai Hsun were all preliminary to this transaction, but such stories are apt to be circulated in the first excitement caused by an event so momentous.

Shanghai telegraphs that the loan is to be repayable in 45 years, that it is absolutely without security other than the promise of the Chinese Government, that it carries 5 per cent. interest and that China is to receive 95 per bond. From the same source we learn that only one million dollars of the money is to be diverted to Manchuria, and all the rest will be employed to make ends meet in the budget. Of course it is evident that Shanghai has no special qualification to speak with authority on this subject.

Nothing is more remarkable than the secrecy which has been successfully observed throughout all the preliminary processes of this negotiation. The almost invariable rule when transactions of such importance are on the tapis is that rumour far outruns fact, but in this case there has not been even a whisper of America's intention. We say "America," but of course it must always be remembered that the Washington Government is not a direct party to the loan, and therefore the arrangement cannot properly be called international, the creditors being simply a group of private American capitalists. Nevertheless experience has shown that these same capitalists have immense power in their own country and can always sway officialdom in any given direction provided that justice is not sacrificed. Moreover it seems plain that the United States Representative in Peking has lent every legitimate assistance to the agents of the syndicate.

A very interesting point is the probable attitude which the other Powers will assume with regard to the loan for railways in the Yangtze valley. Great patience has been shown in the matter of this transaction. The foreign financial agents are fortified by a distinct pledge from the late High Chancellor Chang Chih-tung, and nothing has restrained them from insisting on the practical observance of that pledge except the plea that popular sentiment in China, as represented by the rights-recovery party, is implacably hostile to contracting any monetary debts to foreign countries. Was that merely a specious pretext? We are almost constrained to answer in the affirmative, for the rights-recovery party seems to have faded altogether out of sight so soon as its disappearance was dictated by the convenience of the Central Government. Of course it may be pleaded that no security is given by China in this instance. But against that has to be set the doubly humiliating condition that China's national finances are to be under the supervision of an American expert. If the rights-recovery party quietly swallows that pill, it must have a much stronger digestion than the public supposed.

Another reflection is that had Sir Robert Hart been in Peking this transaction would never have been completed. And indeed we are disposed to think that it puts an end to all hope of Sir Robert's return, for at his time of life and in view of the services he has rendered to China, it is not at all likely that he will consent to resume his functions under the supervision of another foreigner.

We repeat that in our opinion the only bright feature of this incident is the nationality of the creditor. It is possible for the world to be quite sure that no Government occupying the seats of power in Washington will agree to pervert to any evil purpose the power that the United States has now acquired in China.

It might have been predicted confidently that the newsmongers would place Germany on the stage sooner or later in the financial drama which is now being acted at Peking. Therefore we are not surprised to find that, according to a telegram to one of the leading Tokyo papers, the pending visit of the ex-Minister of Agriculture and Commerce of Germany and of the Commander-in-Chief of the German Naval force in the Far East is associated with some loan transaction on Germany's part, and with a settlement of matters relating to railways in Shantung. The message is very brief, but reading between the lines, one can easily perceive that the intention is to ascribe to Germany a desire to compete with the United States as a lender of money to China. We do not place the slightest faith in this rumour, but the circulation of such stories cannot be without significance in Chinese eyes as well as in Occidental.

Washington telegraphs under date of the 31st ultimo that the United States Secretary of State has made a declaration with regard to the Chinese loan. He is quoted as saying in effect that the furnishing of this money to China will enable her to discharge her obligations towards America, England and Japan, and will also enable her to proceed with her new currency scheme on a sound basis. His Excellency concludes by observing that as the details of the transaction are still under consideration by the financiers concerned, he refrains from any explicit statement about that part of the affair.

This statement is somewhat vague but it could scarcely have been expected to be more definite. At all events it suffices to show that the Washington Government is content to associate itself indirectly with the loan. Such at least would be the interpretation attached to a similar declaration on the part of a British Minister of Foreign Affairs.

PEKING.

As a somewhat novel experience the intelligence telegraphically received from Peking during the past few days is confirmed from point to point. The meeting of the Senate on the 26th instant will be classed among the important historical events of the Chinese Empire. Thirty-two Government delegates were present and 171 Senators took their seats, while the audience numbered over a hundred, including several members of the Corps Diplomatique. It will be remembered that the attitude of the President of the Board of Finance towards the question of shortening the period of parliamentary probation was represented in two very different lights. According to one account, Mr. Tsai Tsz opposed all concessions in that direction; according to another account, he strongly endorsed the people's petition. The latter version is now confirmed, and it is added that Mr. Tsai had previously obtained approval of the Prince Regent for his utterances. His allusion to the question of a National Assembly was made at the conclusion of his speech introducing the budget. It is to be noticed again that although the figures of the budget, as now telegraphed, tally with those previously given in these columns, no explanation whatever is forthcoming as to the methods hitherto pursued to make ends meet when the separation extends to such a sum as 74 million taels. No questions appear to have been asked on this important topic at the first reading of the budget, and the only partial explanation we can find as to the sudden deficit of revenue is that 20 million taels stand for losses incurred on account of the anti-opium legislation. The Finance Minister in introducing the budget is represented as merely having dwelt upon the necessity of retrenchment, and as having announced that all high officials would be instructed to confine their outlays to the assets actually in sight. But that suggests itself as a mere platitude, for if the budget be adopted by the Senate and approved by the Throne, its details will have to be carried out by the administrative officials. It was in the sequel of this speech that the President of the Board of Finance announced his approval of the immediate opening of the National Assembly, and, as stated above, rumour credits the Excellency with having echoed the sentiments of the Prince Regent, who is reluctant to oppose the wishes of the people. A striking feature of the subsequent debate on the petition for a National Assembly was that one Senator solemnly declared that should the petition be rejected by the Throne, the only feasible course for the Senate would be to resign en bloc.

There is another point to which attention must be paid in considering this Peking budget. It is that the estimates for the provinces are based on statistics relating to the 39th year of Kwang-su, and cannot therefore be taken as conclusive with regard to the immediate present. So far as we can judge, none of the Viceroys has submitted a local budget to a provincial assembly, and these bodies are reported to be urgently insisting that no time should be lost in supplying the defect. It is believed that the present state of the provincial finances is worse than the budget now before the Senate represents it to be.

It is telegraphed from Shanghai that his Excellency Yuan Shu-hsun, Viceroy of the two Kwang provinces, has resigned and that his resignation has been accepted. Illness is the cause assigned, but we suspect that the true reason is to be sought in the recent difference of opinion between the Viceroy and the Local Assembly with regard to the prohibition of opium smoking and of gambling dens. It will be remembered that the Assembly resigned en bloc because the Viceroy refused to forward its petition to Peking. Subsequently news came that the petition had been forwarded and that the Viceroy had courteously urged the Assembly to continue its session, but probably the incident overstrained the relations between the Assembly and his Excellency.

THE MACAO QUESTION.

It has probably occurred to many of our readers to speculate on the effect the change of polity in Portugal is likely to exercise upon the problem of Macao. There exists a written promise by which the King of Portugal pledges himself not to surrender Macao to any foreign Power without China's consent. But with the disappearance of the monarchy this pledge ceases to have any validity unless or until the new Republican Government in Lisbon engages itself to observe all the foreign obligations previously contracted by the Throne. In view of this state of affairs the Chinese society for the conservation of the Macao boundaries is said to have memorialised Peking in the sense that Portugal should be approached with a demand for the surrender of Macao. Such a memorial is tolerably sure to elicit a negative reply, if it gets any answer at all. But we cannot wonder that the people of China feel some anxiety. Macao would undoubtedly have been reckoned among the outlying properties of which a certain German newspaper lately proposed the partition between Germany and Great Britain. Of course such a proposition did not represent the opinion of either nation, but the fact that it was put forward gravely and with some insistence can scarcely have failed to inspire the Chinese with alarm.

THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

The telegraph reported on Friday last that a banquet had been given in London to mark the closure of the Anglo-Japanese Exhibition, and we learn from a report published by the Exhibition Committee in Tokyo that telegrams of congratulation were despatched by Prince Fushimi to Prince Arthur of Connaught and by Baron Oura to the Duke of Norfolk and Mr. Kiralfy. We read in the report that out of the 2,080,000 yen granted by the Japanese Government no less than 870,000 yen went to Mr. Kiralfy. The total number of visitors was 5,260,000, being 180,000 more than the number at the Anglo-French Exhibition, and the goods sold aggregated 464,500 yen. It is stated that the fine-arts exhibits will be subsequently sent to the expositions at Budapest and Rome.

CHOSSEN.

Friday, October 28.

The Korean residents of Washington are keeping up their curious agitation against the sale of the building which has hitherto served for a Korean Legation in that city. They insist that the ownership of the building cannot be legally determined until after the annexation of Korea by Japan has been placed beyond all reach of reversal. Doubtless they have found some barrister willing to endorse this idea, but to us it seems very quaint. To carry it into practice would mean the indefinite postponement of any step for finally dealing with the property in question. Probably the Legation was originally purchased with Korean money, but since Japan has now made herself responsible for all the financial obligations of her new dominion, there cannot be any doubt that the Legation building at Washington becomes Japanese property.

Saturday, October 29.

More than once of late we have taken occasion to observe that the some-time unquiet in Korea has been replaced by a complete dearth of insurrectionary news. One hesitates to interpret this in an over-optimistic manner, but we may quote the following paragraph from the Seoul Press :—

Signs point to the complete suppression of insurgents whose existence has constituted so great a counteracting element in the ever-increasing prosperity of Chosen during the past few years. Of late we have heard nothing of insurgents, and reports available from those provinces formerly disturbed lead us to believe that there is now little fear of seeing a revival of insurrection. Many causes may have combined to bring about this prevailing tranquility, and among them one must not overlook the value of the studiously precautionary measures taken by the Police force since its late re-organisation. On the other hand, it seems, the majority of insurgents have come slowly to understand the reliability of the Japanese administration and to appreciate the liberal principles of the new regime, concurrently with which fact some or other influential members of the yangpan class on whose secret backing many of the insurgent bodies relied, withheld their support from a similar reason. Indeed the liberal measures of the new Government evidently satisfied all Koreans, and the literati and men of local fame whose influence has had much to do with the insurrection are stated to be exceedingly glad over the recent revival of old local educational institutions. Under such circumstances the recent tranquility appears to be based on very sound ground.

Sunday, October 30.

It is stated that the amount which will be paid in the form of gratuities to widows, orphans and persons distinguished for filial piety in Chosen is 200,000 yen. The distribution will take place on the Emperor's birthday, and the gratuities will range from two to ten yen per head.

The Korean tourists, numbering 61, arrived at Shimbashi at 4 p.m. on the 29th instant, and were met by a party of 30 bonzes representing the Nichiren Sect and by a party of ladies belonging to the Aikoku Fujinkwai. The tourists proceeded to the Hotel Metropole and the Okamoto Inn. Presumably accommodation for such a number was not obtainable at the Imperial Hotel.

Countess Yi Wan-yong and Baroness Chou were interviewed at Shimonoseki by a representative of the Jiji Shimpō, and on being asked what had struck them most on arrival in Japan, they are quoted as having replied the mountains, the trees, the quantity of washed garments hung out to dry, the women working in the fields, and the mothers who, with babies on their backs, push carts along. These ladies shrewdly observed that such industry on the part of females is doubtless one of the sources of Japan's prosperity. Viscount Cho, formerly Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, explained to the same reporter that among the ladies was one who had acted as nurse to the Korean Prince Imperial now in Tokyo. The ex-Minister's son is one of those forming the Prince's entourage.

Audience is to be granted by the Emperor and Empress to the members of the party on the 4th proximo, and they will afterwards be entertained by Viscount Watanabe, Minister of the Imperial Household, at luncheon in the Shiba detached palace.

Monday, October 31.

It is confidently asserted that his Imperial Highness, Prince Li Junior, will visit Japan next spring, and that the necessary investigations are now in progress. At the present rate it will soon be necessary to make special provision in the Japanese budget for the expense of entertaining foreign dignitaries. Prince Tsai Hsun is to-day receiving a most costly welcome, and his visit will be followed in quick succession by those of the Prince Imperial of Germany and the ex Emperor of Korea. It is commonly rumoured that the entertainment given to the Chinese Prince at the Kabuki theatre on the 27th instant cost altogether 70,000 yen; but unfortunately folks like the Directors of the South Manchuria Railway are not always available for such purposes, and the resources of the Imperial Household Department are limited.

We may mention here that the Korean tourists are evidently having a fine time in Japan. Early on the 30th instant they were driven in carriages of the Imperial Household to the Emperor's Palace and to the Palace of the Prince Imperial to write their names, after which they proceeded to the botanical gardens in Shinjiku where the carriages were admitted to the grounds as a special concession to the Korean ladies, whose accomplishments do not include pedestrianism. Thence they proceeded to the mansion of the former Prince Regent of Korea, and finally drove to the Sanyentei, where they lunched with the Prince. The ladies are said to be greatly pleased and interested, and it appears that they are driving about with their faces uncovered, which is very unusual on the part of Korean females.

Tuesday, November 1.

The correspondent of the Jiji Shimpō has just paid a visit to Hongju in the south of the province of Chungchong-do. He reports that the behaviour of the Korean Auxiliary Gendarmes and of the Korean police in that district is very arbitrary and offensive. He thinks in short that they are a veritable case of men clothed in a little brief authority and that they stand in urgent need of efficient restraint.

We gather that Chosen has now attracted the earnest attention of speculative Japanese, and that enterprises of various kinds are being busily promoted there. In fact something like a mania seems to exist, for it is stated that the Authorities, while sedulously avoiding any interference with the legitimate expansion of industry, have drafted a law for the better control of such enterprises.

There is talk of engaging Japanese

Buddhist priests for the purpose of imparting religious education in Korea. For centuries back the Buddhist clergy in the Peninsula, owing to causes which have never been clearly analysed, have fallen into such a state of ignorance and corruption that they have come to be regarded not as moral guides but as mere parasites. Certainly the part they act in encouraging the growth of a religious conscience may be said to be virtually nil. The Japanese Authorities are therefore said to be thinking of asking their countrymen at home to send duly qualified Buddhist teachers to the Peninsula.

There is a story that over 50 of the Yangpan claim to have been accidentally omitted from the list of those entitled to gratuities. They are accordingly drawing up a petition for presentation to the Governor-General. But it is said that these men have no real grievance, and that they are acting at the instigation of agitators.

Wednesday, November 2.

A telegram received in Tokyo from Seoul says that the result of investigation shows the number of Yangpan and Literati who are entitled to gratuities to be 8747. All these are at least 60 years of age, and a very few have reached the great age of 107. The gratuities begin at 25 yen and go up to a hundred. It will be understood that these figures relate solely to aged folk.

According to semi-official accounts, Yi Pong-yun, who is mentioned in another paragraph, is now in the hands of the Russian Authorities. Nothing has been settled yet as to handing him over to the Japanese, but as his apprehension was an act of good will on Russia's part, some means will probably be found in the end for giving him up.

PENSION BONDS IN KOREA.

When pension bonds were issued to the members of the new nobility and to other deserving persons in Korea, it was enacted that no sales or assignments of these securities would be permitted. The object of this policy was evidently to avert incidents such as those that took place in the case of the original Japanese pension bonds, which were freely sold and hypothecated by their inexperienced holders who thereafter found themselves reduced to dire straits. The veto in Korea's case has now been slightly modified by the issue of an Ordinance declaring that in special circumstances pension bonds may be disposed of, provided that the explicit approval of the Governor-General has been obtained; and provided that the bonds are sold to the Bank of Korea which will take them over at par value. It is plain that the recipients of these bonds, finding themselves placed in unwonted possession of the equivalent of a large supply of ready money, might easily be tempted to realize a part of these securities, with the result that the market price of the bonds might be seriously depreciated, and something like a panic might occur. No precautions calculated to avert such a misfortune can be deemed excessive. On the other hand, it is easy to conceive cases where inability to dispose of the bonds might constitute a great hardship. Hence the discretionary power of sanction now given to the Governor-General.

THE VICEROY OF MANCHURIA.

From Tsingtau in Shantung comes news that the Viceroy of the Three Eastern Provinces has appealed to the Governor of Shantung for assistance and coöperation. The Viceroy evidently labours under obsession by the Russo-Japanese bugbear. He represents to his Shantung colleague that Russia from her basis in Siberia, and Japan from her foothold in Korea, plainly menace the integrity of the Three Eastern Provinces, and that Shantung and Mukden must join hands to avert a huge catastrophe of territorial aggression. His Excellency explains that Manchuria, being of wide extent and very sparse population, is ill equipped for purposes of self-defence, and that the only effective remedy appears to lie in immediate colonization. With that idea in view the Viceroy has been investigating the measures taken by Japan for the colonization of Hokkaido, and having found in them a good model, he proposes that Shantung and Manchuria shall combine to operate a similar system. We should hesitate to agree that Japan's policy towards Hokkaido has been always of an exemplary character, but undoubtedly a large measure of success has attended it; and as the Viceroy is doubtless right when he claims that Manchuria offers to agricultural settlers many more advantages than Hokkaido does, he may accomplish with the aid of Shantung something even more signal than Japan has accomplished in the case of Hokkaido. But there is one great essential, namely, money. Japan spent large sums on the development of Hokkaido and was freely ridiculed by foreign critics at the time. When the late Count Kuroda was Governor of the island, a sum of a million yen yearly was granted to him with a perfectly free hand as to its expenditure, and if the total sum spent by the Japanese Government on the development of the northern island were set down, it would probably give the Viceroy of Manchuria something to think about. Needing already 10 or 15 million taels to establish budgetary equilibrium, his Excellency must be very sanguine if he puts his hand to the costly work of encouraging colonization.

YI PONG-YUN.

This disturber of the peace has at last been apprehended by the Russian police in Nikolaievsk. It has been evident from the outset that the Russian Authorities in Siberia were anxious to render every possible assistance to the Japanese in averting any riotous results of the annexation. They accordingly made things so hot for the Korean agitators who had their head-quarters in Vladivostock that these gentry found it expedient to clear out. Of course the break up of their head-quarters meant a serious check to their propaganda. But this did not satisfy the Russian Authorities. They evidently instructed the police to maintain a vigilant attitude, and the final result has been the apprehension of Yi Pong-Yun, who has long been known as the leader of the Korean insurgents in the north-east. At the time of Prince Ito's assassination there were several indications that the crime had been assisted, if not planned, by the Vladivostock revolutionists. But unfortunately sufficient evidence was not forthcoming. That defect may now be remedied. The telegraph does not say whether any of Yi's accomplices have been seized at the same time.

THE YALU LUMBER ENTERPRISE.

The public has been regaled with all kinds of rumours about the Yalu Lumber Company. On one day we have been assured that the affairs of the enterprise are in an almost hopeless condition, and on the next we have been told that things are moving quite satisfactorily and profitably. The latest story is that the Company is seeking to extend its market to Shanghai, and has floated down a large number of rafts with that object. But thereafter the message becomes somewhat mixed, for it says, in one sentence, that owing to the inundations this year business has been greatly interrupted; and, in another, it asserts that the Company will pay a dividend of 5 or 6 per cent. This is the first we have heard about damage caused by floods along the upper reaches of the Yalu.

Items of news about the Yalu Lumber enterprise constantly come across the wires. They are nearly always unfavourable in their accounts of the undertaking, but in no instance have they received official confirmation. The latest story is that the building of a spacious store-house at Antung was projected some time ago and should have been commenced in the spring of the current year. The S.M. Railway Company granted, free of charge, the use of a plot of land measuring 250 acres and further agreed that a branch line should be built to connect the store house with the main road. It was found, however when the work was about to be commenced that the plans for the store house were defective from an engineering point of view, and so far from commencing the building at the appointed time, nothing whatever has been done about it and nothing seems likely to be done even next spring. In these circumstances an agitation has been set on foot with the object of restoring the property and the conduct of the enterprise to private management.

THE CHINESE CONSTITUTION.

There have been so many conflicting accounts about the prospects of a National Assembly in China that the public must be perplexed to decipher any grains of truth anywhere. Some time ago we were explicitly informed that a meeting of the Council of State had taken place in Peking at the Palace, and had resulted in a determination to sanction the convention of a parliament in the year 1914. Thereafter this news was explicitly contradicted, and the whole affair was wrapped in an atmosphere of doubt. Now, however, comes a distinct assertion that at a meeting of the Council of State held on the afternoon of the 30th ultimo from 2 to 5 o'clock, the matter was carefully debated, with the result that the Council decided to recommend to the Throne the year 1913 as suitable for the opening of parliamentary institutions. This resolution was to be submitted to the Prince Regent on the 31st ultimo, and up to this moment of writing (Tuesday morning) the result has not been telegraphed. It may be mentioned that according to the original plan the National Assembly would not have been opened until 1916.

It is to be noted that the Provincial Assembly of Amoy has memorialised the Throne in the sense that parliament should be opened a year hence and the Viceroy has forwarded the memorial.

THE OIL COMPANIES.

It is now very plainly hinted that the Japanese oil companies, namely the Hoden and the Nippon, are concocting a plan to save the situation by recourse to a protective duty. When two huge companies like the Sun and the Standard engage in rivalry, it becomes impossible to fix any limit of their contest. But the Japanese companies, which are conducted on a much smaller scale, and have comparatively petty resources, find themselves in danger of annihilation from collision with such giants. The only visible resource is to put upon imported oil a duty sufficiently high to leave a margin of profit for the home industry without setting any limits to the competition of the foreign companies. The directors of the Hoden and the Nippon are said to be now agitating with that object in view.

The two principal Japanese Oil Companies, namely the Nippon and the Hoden, have decided to place their oil upon the market at 2.21 yen per box, which is the price now asked for the Rising Sun's staple. Tokyo journals state that this price cannot possibly leave any margin of profit, and that the prospect is extremely gloomy, considering that the season of great demand is in sight.

The acts of the competing oil sellers read like a page from a work of fiction. Prices were supposed some days ago to have reached their bottom, but that was evidently a premature conclusion, for further reductions of various kinds are said to have been devised until the actual receipts per case have fallen to the neighbourhood of one yen. This means that the oil is practically being given away, and Japanese producers are completely driven out of the field. We hear nothing more about restoring the situation by means of a protective tax. Of course this is affecting the paraffin wax industry. Paraffin being a bye-product of kerosene the foreign wax has fallen so sharply in price that the domestic vegetable product finds practically no market.

THE INCOME TAX.

Several publicists have attacked the Government for not bringing forward during next session of the Diet the promised bill for amending the income tax. But on behalf of the Government it is explained that this bill was withdrawn last session in deference to the Diet's clearly expressed wish that precedence should be given to reduction of the land tax. Nevertheless the income tax bill would have been re-submitted in the approaching session had not unforeseen expenditures presented themselves. Special grants had to be made in aid of the inundated regions; extraordinary outlays had to be incurred in connection with the annexation of Korea, and a fund had to be created for implementing the navy. All these special items are unavoidable. As to the first, no demonstration is required. As to the second, to withhold the necessary funds would be tantamount to disapproving annexation; and, finally, the naval appropriation is dictated by the necessity of keeping Japan up to international standards. If the bill for amending the income tax be introduced, money to meet the above expenses will not be forthcoming. There is no alternative.

MANCHURIA.

No settlement has yet been reached in the matter of the Tael trouble or in that of the Korean settlers at Hsinmintun. It is unnecessary to repeat the details of these complications, as they have already been made familiar to our readers. But we may say that their settlement ought not to involve so much time and trouble as the Chinese Authorities appear to find necessary. The telegrams now represent the Japanese Consul-General, Mr. Koike, as having made a strong representation to Mr. Han, Chief of the Foreign Affairs Bureau in the Mukden Government. The Consul-General is quoted as having pointed out that, in their dealings with Japan, Chinese officials seem to be largely influenced at present by sentiment, which is a dangerous guide in international affairs. Mr. Koike therefore conjures his Chinese colleague to see to it that a different mood is entertained. He promises that if any legitimate fault can be found with the conduct of the Japanese officials, it shall be remedied on due representation, and, on the other hand, he entreats the Chinese officials to deal with questions on their own merits quite apart from feeling or prejudice.

This is decidedly an unusual course, and if it has really been taken, we must infer that Mr. Koike, who has hitherto proved himself a very competent official, sees good reason to protest against the methods of Chinese diplomats in Manchuria. It is in these frontier problems that we have to seek the danger of strained relations between the two neighbouring Empires. The hospitality lavished on a Chinese prince in Tokyo has little practical meaning after all.

It is said that a decision has at last been arrived at with reference to the relative advantages of the competing projects for building a line of railway from Tieling to Hailungchen or from Kaiyuan to Hailungchen. The decision is in favour of the former route. That the Hailungchen district should be brought into communication by rail with either Tieling or Kaiyuan has long been recognised, but choice between the two lines has been deferred until the present. The comparative proximity of the Liao river is said to have proved a determining factor. Tieling is almost on the banks of this great river, whereas Kaiyuan is considerably remote from the water-way; and it is thought that the new line, if carried to the latter place, would serve simply as a feeder of the South Manchuria railway and would deflect the carrying trade of Hailungchen from Newchwang to Dairen. The Chinese make no secret of their desire to promote the interests of Newchwang in preference to those of Dairen, but they would prefer to develop Lienshan at the expense of both. Meanwhile it remains to be seen whether Japan will sit silent in the presence of this programme. A railway from Tieling to Hailungchen would be unquestionably parallel to the Mukden-Antung road, though at a considerable distance from the latter.

THE "IKOMA."

The Ikoma arrived at Yokosuka at 10 a.m. on the 29th ultimo, having travelled 31,700 miles since her departure 198 days ago. She is the first Japanese warship, or indeed the first ship flying the Japanese flag, that has made such an extensive tour. Probably the most enjoyable moment of her whole voyage was on the 25th of May when a crew of her bluejackets won the international boat race in connection with the centenary of the Argentine Republic. It will be remembered that the Nisshin and the Kasuga were originally destined for the Argentine Republic and were purchased by Japan on the eve of her war with Russia. In commemoration of this event the Ikoma carried to the Argentine Government a quantity of fragments of Russian shells by which the two ships had been struck, and the Republic acknowledged the gift with a bronze statue of a warrior carrying the legend "to the last man." The Republic also presented a large oil painting representing a street scene in connection with the final days of Spanish supremacy in the Argentine. The officers of the Ikoma speak in enthusiastic terms of the welcome given everywhere to the vessel as a unit of the Japanese post-bellum navy. They allude specially to the visit paid to the ship by the King of England and to the entertainment given to the officers by the President of the French Republic. The cruiser seems to have been particularly fortunate as to the health and safety of her crew. She had one man washed overboard when passing south of the Cape of Good Hope and she lost two others by sickness. That was her whole tale of casualties. The gale encountered off the Cape of Good Hope seems to have been extraordinarily violent. The waves are said to have attained a height of 50 feet.

SUGAR.

The great fall which took place during this year in the price of sugar on European markets, has naturally affected the raw sugar of Java, so that the latter is quoted to-day at a lower figure than the raw sugar of Formosa commands in Japan. Nevertheless the Mainichi Dempo, from which we take this statement, explains that there is not likely to be any importation of Java sugar into Japan. The Formosan producers have already bargained with Japanese refiners to supply 100 million catties of raw sugar, and are now negotiating for a further quantity. There is very little probability of any departure from these agreements in deference to slightly cheaper rates for the Java staple.

In this context we note that a new company has been formed under the title of "Imperial Sugar-Refining Company." The President is Mr. Yamashita, but neither his name nor the names of any of the directors are particularly well-known in the business world. No facts are published as to the capital of the Company or its programme.

JAPAN'S-FOREIGN TRADE.

The returns of the foreign trade during the last 11 days of October are:—

	Yen.
Exports	17,104,000
Imports	13,354,000
Excess of Exports.....	4,450,000
The figures for the period Jan. 1st to October 31st are as follow:—
	Yen.	Compared with last year.
Exports	372,338,000	+43,129,000
Imports	380,526,000	+ 6,487,000(?)
Excess of Imports.....	8,188,000

THE GAS COMPANY.

Friday, October 28.

The Public Procurator has declined to take up the case instituted by the Chiyoda Gas Company against the Gas Fittings Company of Tokyo. This fact, together with the complication about the Shibaura site, seems likely to be a heavy blow to the Chiyoda folks.

Saturday, October 29.

The Municipal Authorities of Tokyo have decided that the price of the reclaimed land at Shibaura shall be fixed at 38 yen per tsubo, and as this price includes the space required for roads, a purchaser will have to pay in reality 45 yen. The Chiyoda Gas Company had counted on getting the land for 20 yen, and its estimates will be correspondingly upset. The Niroku Shimpō approves of this valuation, but urges that the land be put up to public tender, when it will command a still higher price.

Sunday, October 30.

The question of land at Shibaura has assumed a curious complexion. It appears that the Chiyoda Gas Company, having been the first to respond to the Municipality's offer to sell the land at 38 yen per tsubo, the Municipal Council virtually agreed to the transaction. Accordingly the Tokyo Gas Company was informed that, as it had come into the field after the Chiyoda, it must wait until the next process of reclamation was completed. Thereupon the Directors of the Tokyo Gas Company insisted that the land should be put up for public tender, as they were willing to pay more than 38 yen. The Municipality is thus placed in a somewhat awkward position, being more or less pledged to the Chiyoda Company and being at the same time constrained by the interests of the city.

POLICE IRREGULARITIES.

It would seem that the Chinese police are behaving with a very high hand towards Japanese subjects in various places. Thus from Chientao comes news that on the 24th instant a posse of constables broke into a house where some Japanese were dining, treated the inmates very roughly and arrested several of their number. Subsequently the same constables laid hands on some Japanese subjects in the street and hauled them off to jail. These things happened at Chutsche, which is the Chinese headquarters in Chientao. There also comes news that Chinese police stationed along the Tumen river are illegally interfering with the transport of Japanese mail matter.

Side by side with the above it may be right to place a statement attributed to the Chief public Procurator of the Court of Appeal in Seoul. He has just returned to Japan, and he is alleged to have stated that Japanese subjects constitute one-fourth of the law-breakers carried before Korean courts. Out of 20,000 culprits, 5,000 are Japanese. The Chief Procurator rightly describes this state of affairs as disgraceful to the reputation of his countrymen and urges that the Japanese emigrating to Korea should endeavour to set a good example instead of becoming a by-word.

THE REWARD of £250 offered by Scotland Yard for information leading to the arrest of "Dr." Crippen and Miss Le Neve has been paid to Captain Kendall, of the liner Montrose.

THE CHINESE SENATE.

The tenth meeting of the Chinese Senate on the 31st ultimo seems to have presented some features of exceptional interest. Several members of the Council of State were present, and Prince Yu Lang, Vice-President of the Board of the Interior, delivered a speech which was evidently intended to placate the Senate. The Prince dwelt upon the importance of the functions which that body is called upon to perform and upon the gravity and unanimity which have hitherto marked its proceedings. Unfortunately symptoms of discontent in the provinces, a bad harvest, and complications in foreign affairs have invested the situation with some elements of uneasiness, but the Prince said that the Government looked to the Senate to conduct its deliberations in a spirit of harmony and patriotism, and, on the other hand, he and his colleagues undertook that if the Senate desire to have any of its views conveyed to the Throne, they themselves would willingly act as channels of communication. After this speech various questions were asked with reference to the opening of a National Assembly. The Prince replied that as he was present that day in his official capacity as a member of the Council of State, he was precluded from making any statement about his personal views. But he assured the Senate that the memorial with reference to this important subject was now under consideration, and would come up for debate by a council in the Palace within a few days, when a definite statement would be made in writing. He himself professed a full sense of the importance of a National Assembly as the basis of efficient administration.

This declaration, although it did not bind the Government to anything except a reply in due season, seems to have satisfied the Senate.

JAPANESE FINANCE.

The Fiji Shimpō undertakes to give a detailed statement of the operations of redemption and conversion that the Government will have to undertake next year. The results of our contemporary's calculations are these. In the first place, the total sum of the war-loan which falls due for redemption next year is 270 million yen, to which must be added 63 millions, being the amount of the Third-period bonds and the Tobacco Monopoly Bills similarly falling due. To meet this obligation the Government has two assets. One is a sum of from 70 to 80 millions in ready money, which remains over from previous transactions of redemption or conversion, together with a sum of 50 millions which is appropriated in the budget for purposes of redemption. These two sums make 130 millions, and then there is the second asset, represented by a 100 million yen of 5 per-cents. held by the Bank of Japan, the Imperial States Bureau and the Deposits Bureau, which bonds the Government can command for conversion. If we subtract the total of the above items, namely 230 millions, there remains a sum of 103 millions against which no provision is in sight, unless the holders of 5-per-cent. bonds can be induced to agree to the conversion of that amount. Our contemporary thinks that the latter hope cannot be entertained, in view of the fact that the 4-per-cents. of the second issue are now quoted at 93½.

In the immediate context to the above it has to be noted that the Minister of Finance in his recent speech distinctly explained that the Government would adapt its procedure to the state of the market and to economic conditions.

THEATRICAL PERFORMANCE IN HONOUR OF PRINCE TSAI HSUN.

The South Manchuria Railway entertained Prince Tsai Hsun and his suite, together with practically all the leading residents of Tokyo, at a theatrical performance given in the Kabuki theatre on the evening of the 27th ultimo. These performances have become quite a recognized feature of the welcome given by Japan to Imperial and Royal visitors to this country. The expense must be immense, but as a means of displaying the features of Japan's old-time civilization the method is evidently successful. The whole force of the theatrical staff took part in staging the four pieces performed, and the costumes were positively splendid, while the scenery was comparatively fine, but, as is usual in Japanese theatres, not specially realistic. The performance lasted two hours and was watched with keen interest by the Chinese guests. The Prince arrived at eight sharp and shortly afterwards the curtain rose, the first act being the meeting between Yoshitsune and Benkei on the Gojo bridge in Kyoto. The other pieces were semi-mythical, but the whole constituted a very beautiful specimen of Japanese mimetics. It need scarcely be added that refreshments were served on a sumptuous scale and that the arrangements were all excellent. Before the curtain rose Baron Goto, in his position as President of the South Manchuria Railway Company, delivered an address of welcome, which was rendered into Chinese by Mr. Tei. His Imperial Highness Prince Fushimi Jr. entered and left the theatre simultaneously with the Chinese Prince.

On the 27th ultimo Prince Tsai Hsun gave a luncheon party at the Shiba Detached Palace, entertaining a number of distinguished Japanese. In the afternoon His Highness witnessed a polo match and later went by motor car to Ueno Park and visited the Art Exhibition there. The Prince was entertained in the evening by the Municipality at the Imperial Hotel, which was followed by an entertainment at the Kabuki za Theatre.

On the 28th ultimo Prince Tsai Hsun visited the House of Peers, where he was received by the Presidents, Chief Secretaries, and other officials of both Houses. His Highness was pleased to inspect the assembly-hall and other rooms. Documents dealing with parliamentary procedure were presented to the Prince, and in the assembly-hall the ballot apparatus was operated. The inspection being over, Prince Tsai Hsun and suite left Shimbashi by the 4.10 p.m. special train for Saseho. Princes Fushimi and Higashi Fushimi, Cabinet Ministers, and a large number of officers and civilians of higher ranks assembled at the platform to see the Chinese Prince and suite off. It is reported that after the inspection of the naval stations at Kure and Saseho, the Envoy with his suite will leave Japan for home on November 1 by the Chinese cruiser Kaiseiki.

"ANNOTATED CIVIL CODE OF JAPAN."

Mr. de Becker has finished the 4th and last volume of his invaluable work, "The Annotated Civil Code of Japan." Messrs. Kelly & Walsh are the enterprising publishers. We note that the complete work runs to about 1,100 pages, giving practically a full page each to the 1,146 articles in the Code.

Vol. 4 contains an appendix giving a translation of the "Law relating to Foreigners' Right of Ownership in Land," "Succession Tax Law," "Rules concerning the Enforcement of the Succession Tax Law," "Public Notaries Law," Rules concerning the Enforcement of the Public Law," and Rules relating to Fees of Public Notaries." The first volume of the Code was published on the 1st of July 1909, the second volume on the 5th November 1909, the third volume on the 13th March 1910, and the present volume on the 20th October 1910.

Forty-seven pages of this last volume are devoted to a comprehensive classified topical index to the whole Code, which index adds incalculably to the serviceability of the work.

It is a mere truism to say, and yet it must not be left unsaid, that Mr. de Becker has placed both the foreign residents and the Japanese Authorities under a debt of gratitude for his arduous and able labours in giving this Code to the world in an English dress, and in accompanying it with comments which elucidate its spirit and explain its significance from point to point. There is no longer any reason for an alien to complain of ignorance of the Japanese Civil Code or to suffer loss or inconvenience by inadvertent violation of its provisions.

NOTES ON CURRENT EVENTS.

Another source of hydro-electric power is spoken of as likely to be tapped. It is Lake Inawashiro in Aizu, a sheet of water brought prominently into public notice by the eruption of Bandaisan twenty odd years ago. Inawashiro Lake lies at a very high level, and a great head of water could be obtained, but on the other hand, in order to reach Tokyo the power would have to be transmitted over a distance of 170 miles. The projector of the new company is Mr. Watanabe Kaichirō; the capital is put at 12 million yen; the horse-power obtained is estimated to reach 30 or 40 thousand, and the project is said to have the support of the Mitsubishi Company.

The Kokumin Shimbun, speaking apparently from official authority, says that it is a misconception to think that the standing army of the Empire exceeds 19 Divisions. The error in the public mind is due to ignorance of the manner in which the forces in Formosa, Chosen and Saghalien are made up, and also to the fact that the officers in command in these localities hold rank commensurate with larger bodies of men than those under their actual leadership. But the truth is that there are only 19 Divisions in all, and that the talk of 21 or 22 is idle.

The Government's policy of allowing the people to construct light railways throughout the country, and of granting every possible facility for the purpose, is rapidly bearing fruit. Our readers doubtless have observed that on the occasion of his recent visit to the provinces Baron Goto spoke here and there in most encouraging tones about this enterprise, and the Government has given assurances that the nature of the lines built will not be severely scrutinized except in the matter of bridges and tunnels. The policy of light railways was announced on the 3rd of August, and already twenty charters have been applied for, out of which twelve have been granted and eight are under consideration. One of the twelve contemplates the conversion of a permanent line originally planned into a light road, and the remaining eleven represent 157 miles of line, the total cost of which is estimated at a little over 4 million yen. It is thought that this policy will be eminently successful, and that it will have the effect of resuscitating the spirit of enterprise.

On the night of the 28th inst. a burglar broke into the residence of Mrs. Silver Hall, in the Azabu district of Tokyo, but was arrested and handed over to the police. Mrs. Hall and her two daughters were at a dance, from which they happened to return just as the robber was searching for valuables. Two of the three jinrikisha coolies who accompanied the ladies seized the burglar and held him in spite of his desperate struggles to escape, while the third went for the police. The rubber tyres on the jinrikisha probably contributed not a little to the fortunate issue, for ordinary kuruma would have warned the burglar by the noise of their approach.

A group of forty capitalists headed by Baron Shibusawa has applied for a charter to supply gas in Hokkaido, and as the Government considers that such an enterprise will contribute materially to the prosperity of the northern island, it is thought probable that the charter will be granted on very easy terms. The capital of the proposed company is 3 million yen, one-fourth of which will be paid up at once. The money will be allotted as follows:—to Sapporo 175,000 yen; to Otaru 285,000; to Hakodate 235,000; to working capital 50,000, and to establishment expenses 5,000.

Mr. Braham, The Times Special Correspondent, left Peking on the 25th ultimo and proceeded to Shanghai by way of Hankow, his intention being to put up at the Palace Hotel in Shanghai, and to leave the latter place on November 8th by the steamer Manchuria. Thus Mr. Braham will be in Tokyo about Nov. 12th; but as his intention is to continue his homeward journey by the Manchuria, his stay in the Japanese capital will not exceed four days.

The Yamanote-sen Electrical Railway is again the object of severe criticism at the hands of the Fiji Shimpō. The Railway Board some time ago announced its intention of increasing the number of cars and therefore reducing the present interval of fifteen minutes. But according to the Fiji the prospect is that that interval will have to be increased for, owing to the defective nature of the cars, they are quite insufficient to do the work imposed on them. Moreover the Uyenonippori section is not yet completed, and there is very little prospect of its speedy completion, as a heavy piece of tunnelling has to be done. Thus in existing circumstances the cars will have to make a long detour.

It is stated that the postal authorities have now completed arrangements for a system of rapid delivery (Sokutatsu) for correspondence and parcels within the limits of Tokyo and Yokohama and between those places. Letter boxes will be cleared by cyclists every thirty minutes for the purposes of this service and the increased postage will be 8 sen within the limits of the above two cities and 20 sen for the carriage between them. The extra charge for parcels will apparently be from 5 to 10 sen but the statements published on this subject are not very clear.

We take the following from the Times:—

The export of human hair from Swatow was nearly doubled in value last year, amounting to £28,467, according to the report of the British Consul issued last night. All classes of natives, more especially in the Kia Ying Chow regions, have, it is said, invested their money in the business, some even borrowing for the purpose at 4 to 5 per cent. per month, whilst the poorer classes have found a new and paying occupation in collecting combings and preparing them for the market. The business, however, adds the Consul, is being considerably overdone, and it is reported that there are several tens of thousands of pounds lying at Hongkong "godowns," the importers in Europe having telegraphed to stop all further shipments.

On the 17th of October the Russo-Chinese Bank absorbed the Bank of the North and the combination took the name of the "Bank of Russia." The new Bank will possess all the privileges and discharge all the functions of its two components. It has 150 branches and a capital of 35 million roubles, with a reserve of 17,005,147 roubles. The Chinese Government has in the Bank a capital of 3½ million taels and a reserve of 1,670,000 taels.

Tokyo journals state that the railway Authorities have decided to issue special excursion tickets to foreigners from the beginning of the current month. These tickets will be available for 60 days, and it is said that they will confer special privileges on the holders, but as to the nature of those privileges nothing definite is explained.

Japan having now been brought into direct cablegraphic communication with Formosa, Saghalien, Chosen and Kwantung, it is announced that from the 1st instant the rates for sending messages from Japan to these outlying districts are not only made uniform but also reduced by 50 per cent. We need not enter into details as to previous charges further than to say that instead of having to pay twice the existing home-prices, it will suffice to add 10 sen per message to the latter, the number of words in the message being fifteen. Moreover special consideration is given to newspaper telegrams. As to messages in Romaji, those to Formosa, Saghalien Chosen and Kwantung will cost 40 sen for the first five words and 5 sen for each additional word.

THE TOKYO STOCK EXCHANGE.

The 29th was settling day on the Tokyo Stock Exchange, and the number of shares dealt with was 79,430, the total price being 5,482,660 yen, or 69.025 yen per share. These figures, as compared with those for last month, show a diminution of 2,960 shares and 111,490 yen in aggregate price, but an increase of 1.12 yen in average price.

Friday, October 28.

The general tendency yesterday was upwards, though no signal rise took place except in the shares of the Exchange itself.

Monday, October 31.

There is nothing special to report of Monday's market except that the shares of the Tokyo Stock Exchange leaped up nearly 7 points making a rise of about 12 points in the past two days.

Tuesday, November 1.

Prices were greatly disturbed yesterday. A sharp rise took place in the forenoon owing to greatly reduced quotations in the rice-market and to a favourable balance of trade. The afternoon, however, witnessed a slump. The Specie Bank's shares were affected by a prospect of an increase of capital.

Wednesday, November 2.

Wholesale purchases of Stock-Exchange shares by the Matsushita firm of brokers—acting, it is alleged, for Mr. Hiranuma Junin—drove up the price of these securities yesterday by 26½ yen, in spite of the bargain money having been increased to 16 yen per share. Somebody will be very hard up presently. We append the figures for January delivery:—

COPPER POISONING IN BESSHI MINE.

With regard to the question of the copper poisoning on Shisaka Island, Besshi, negotiations have been going on between the representatives of the sufferers and those of Mr. Sumitomo, owner of the mine. On account of much difference of opinion, the negotiations are at a deadlock. According to information from reliable quarters, the proposals from both sides are as follows:—

The conditions presented by the sufferers are (1) the removal of the refinery or taking of complete preventive measures against copper poisoning; (2) the paying of compensation for damage done before the completion of the above mentioned preventive measures; (3) the revision of the mining regulations; and (4) the stoppage of the refinery works or the shortening of working hours in the important season for the crops, such as before and after the flowering time of rice and barley.

The proposals made on the part of Mr. Sumitomo are (1) the disbursement of a reasonable amount of compensation for damages will be accepted, providing that the money shall be devoted to the improvement of agricultural products, and (2) the said compensation will be disbursed once for all, and the compromise must be of a permanent nature.

THE CAMPAIGN AGAINST CONSUMPTION.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 29.)

THE question of the ravages caused by pulmonary tuberculosis, and of the means of combating the growth of this most insidious of diseases, is occupying an increasing amount of attention in Occidental countries. It is a question to which the people of Japan—amongst whom the waste of life from this cause is painfully evident—can not remain indifferent. In the West, Germany and England seem to be taking the lead in endeavouring to grapple with a problem which, in view of the prevalence of the malady, may be considered to have assumed national importance. It is a significant symptom of the popular feeling in the United Kingdom on this subject that proposals for national sanatoria for consumptive patients should bulk so largely among the suggestions put forward for memorials to the late King EDWARD VII. Of course that monarch's personal sympathies with the anti-consumption crusade are well known; but that his people should have so generally taken up the same attitude shows that the matter has become one which touches their own experience. Indeed, the latest statistics fully bear out this suggestion. It is found that from 350,000 to 400,000 persons in the United Kingdom are suffering from tuberculosis, in one or other of its forms; that nearly 100,000 persons die annually from this disease; and that the direct and indirect loss to the country, whether in the form of loss of wages or in the expenditure of charitable institutions, friendly societies and the like, on behalf of persons suffering from the disease, works out to something like £8,000,000 annually. In view of these appalling facts and figures, the irresistible conclusion is that the battle with disease should not be left entirely to individual effort. Some kind of system is necessary for dealing with so ubiquitous a foe. The policy of "muddling through" may serve England passably well in politics, in foreign affairs or even in the matter of her army; but it is accompanied with too many risks to be adopted in the case of a malady which, if left to itself, must necessarily prove fatal. For this reason, the action taken by the British Post Office authorities to check the spread of consumption among their employees will be welcomed as a beginning. A specially reserved ward, with accommodation for twenty patients, has been added to the National Sanatorium at Benenden, in Kent, and was recently opened by the Postmaster-General, Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL. The interesting feature of this new departure is the fact that the cost of the building and its equipment has been met by the subscriptions of the employees themselves, just as the sanatorium as a whole is supported entirely by working-men through their friendly societies. That their prudence and fore-fight is not in vain is proved by the fact that four-fifths of the inmates of this particular institution, who not many years ago would have been given up as incurables, have so far recovered as to be able to resume their work. Nevertheless such private enterprise, commendable though it is in the highest degree, needs to be supplemented, if not superseded, by some bigger, State-aided scheme. In Germany, this is to a large extent the case. While the funds required for combating "the thousand ills that flesh is heir to," and thus ensuring the healthy vigour of the race, are mainly furnished by the people themselves, the State is a contributor. Moreover, it acts as the trustee for the suitable disbursement of the funds and as the supervisor of the whole system. All members of the working classes, male or female, are obliged to contribute weekly sums to the Krankenkasse, or Sickness Insurance Fund; and, in return, the State undertakes to provide medical attendance and medicine free, and to keep patients when necessary during periods of illness. Sanatoria conducted on the open-air-treatment principle have been erected in all parts of the country. Often these institutions are of the simplest description—mere sheds among pine-woods, opened to the south, with a kitchen and hall attached; but this does not prevent the three desiderata of treatment—rest, cleanliness and wholesome food—from being kept constantly in view. Each such sanatorium, of course, is under the charge of one or more medical men, assisted by a duly qualified staff of trained nurses; the period of the cure lasts for about three months; and the cost to the State is kept down to about two marks a day for each patient. As the patients improve they are set to some kind of outdoor work, the proceeds of which not only help to reduce the cost of their keep, but serve to prepare them for the return to their ordinary occupations. The result of this systematic handling of the problem is already visible in the mortality returns, the number of deaths from tuberculosis having fallen, within the past year, from 1.64 per thousand to 1.55. Over and above the numerical improvement, however, there is the educative value, which can scarcely be assessed in terms. Every person who has been an inmate of these institutions has learned something of the theory of health and disease; has acquired habits of cleanliness, and valuable knowledge as to the requisite precautions against infection and contagion. Such knowledge, indeed, is a weapon of the first importance in the fight with any disease—knowledge of its characteristics, its prevention, its cure. In this respect, as well as in coöperation along the lines above set forth, the State can do a great deal. It may not be too much to hope that in this country, which has been marked out by Destiny to lead the awakening East, some such steps may be taken to relieve it of its greatest scourge. The privation, the scanty food and exposure to cold which constitute the lot of so many of its inhabitants are conditions which add greatly to the difficulty of the problem, but it is nevertheless not so difficult as to be incapable of solution. At least we may say that the campaign against consumption is one in which Japan may well join with advantage, and without delay.

CHINESE FINANCE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, October 31.)

NATURALLY considerable interest attaches to the question of China's finance. Her affairs appear to be in a most disordered condition. There is evidently no means in sight to meet the huge deficit, which is variously stated at from 73 to 78 million taels. The Chinese Authorities are represented as seriously considering the expediency of a foreign loan of 80 million taels to tide over pressing difficulties, and rumour represents the Western Powers as competing for the privilege of lending the money without any specific security and at the lowest possible rate of interest. The natural expedient of recourse to increased taxation is said to be out of the question, quite sufficient difficulty being already experienced in collecting the taxes now imposed. On the other hand, if recourse to foreign money markets for the sake of railway construction or other productive enterprises be exceedingly distasteful to Young China's rights-recovery spirit, it is plain that a big foreign loan for the purpose of balancing the Budget would be quite an intolerable idea. The least intelligent Chinese must appreciate clearly enough that if any foreign Power or group of foreign Powers shows eagerness to furnish money for a crisis which must be constantly recurring, there lurks behind the transaction a political aim highly perilous to the integrity of the Empire. In fact, however reluctant one may be to acknowledge the truth, it is certain that the great Powers of the Occident would welcome the partition of China if they could come to some amicable agreement as to the manner of distributing the fragments. It is therefore imperatively necessary for China to refrain from putting into the hands of foreign States a weapon which would certainly be turned, sooner or later, against her own breast. From that point of view we are inclined to doubt very strongly whether any reliance may be placed on the story that the Viceroy of the Three Eastern Provinces has been permitted to negotiate independently for a foreign loan of from 10 to 15 million taels. Such an exception cannot reasonably be made in favour of one Viceroy. As for Japan, it behoves her to watch all these transactions with the keenest eyes. At whatever pecuniary inconvenience to herself, she must insist on being allowed to take a part in financing the Middle Kingdom, if it is to be financed on lines anything like those indicated by rumour. After all, these incidents are a natural sequence of the policy of spheres of influence. For several years, the theory of such spheres was openly announced, and many of our readers probably remember the publication of a map on which the various spheres of influence were clearly indicated as a permanent geographical feature. Then when it was found that such brutal frankness began to be intolerable to the Chinese, recourse was had to the device of railways. By financing these and taking them as security for loans, a kind of lien was obtained on the regions traversed by the lines. Against that, too, the Chinese finally rebelled, and now they are confronted by a scheme of money-lending without any tangible security whatever, but involving in reality the hypothecation of the Chinese Empire. Great Britain and Japan have to keep their eyes wide open at this juncture.

THE NEW IMPORT TARIFF.

(The Japan Daily Mail, November 2.)

UNDER the supervision of the International Tariff Revision Committee of the Yokohama Foreign Board of Trade a translation of the New Import Tariff of Japan, which is announced to be put into force from July 17th 1911, has been made and published in book form. The Committee is formed by representatives of American, Austrian, British, Chilean, Dutch, French, German, East Indian, Russian, Swedish and Swiss firms; the Chairman is Mr. E. C. DAVIS; the Vice-Chairmen, Messrs. D. H. BLAKE and M. PORS, and the Secretary, Mr. EUGENE FOX. The last named gentleman appears to have done the main part of the work of compilation. The New Import Tariff is shown in comparison with the corresponding rates of duty, as levied under the present Statutory Tariff of 1906 and the existing Conventional Tariffs, and there is added an explanatory introduction compiled under the authority and supervision of the Committee. This Introduction, being of exceptional interest, is reproduced here:—

In presenting this Edition of the existing and new Import Tariffs of Japan, the International Tariff Revision Committee of the Yokohama Foreign Board of Trade has added a few of the views of foreign traders resident in the various business centres of the country, whose experience covers those years which have seen the development of Japan's trade to its present dimensions.

A study of the new tariff, aided by a comparison with that at present in force, reveals the careful and laborious manner in which it has been worked out. The Official Committee to which the work was entrusted by the Japanese Government has made a great effort to produce a tariff which shall ensure the maximum of revenue from such articles as do not require, or would not be assisted by, protection, while affording the benefits of protection to such articles as the Government believes to be capable of being developed into national industries. While the results obtained might at first sight seem to have been successful, the new tariff really exhibits many of the defects which may safely be looked for in every combined attempt to afford protection and obtain revenue. Such a policy may not make itself felt as a hardship in a thinly-populated productive, and expanding country; but it is likely to have far-reaching consequences of a very oppressive nature in a state where the struggle for existence is severe owing to pressure of population, and where the fiscal burdens of the people are already heavy. It is quite true that to a country like Japan the development of industries along health lines is of the greatest importance; but when, as in her case, the principal interests of the people are still agricultural, and the supply of labour available is almost entirely unskilled, it may well be doubted whether the result of an attempt to develop industries on a large scale by means of a high tariff wall can be attended with any immediate success. It is probable that many of the defects of the new tariff will become more distinctly patent after it has been given time to work into shape; meantime, it is possible to criticise it with the aid of such experience as is afforded by a knowledge of the conditions obtaining in Japan, joined to the known results of similar efforts in other countries. One of its first effects must necessarily be the rapid enhancement of the cost of living (not only for the foreign resident, but for every inhabitant of the country), and that cannot fail to prove the final blow at the rapidly vanishing factor of cheap labour, a factor to which so much prominence has always been given. The new tariff will no doubt succeed in reducing the import of many manufactured articles, and to that extent is in developing in the country a certain number of industries; but on the other hand, it may possibly render the general conditions of life too onerous to admit of Japanese manufactures successfully competing in markets outside their tariff fence with those who are able to produce under more favourable conditions. As the Japanese home market is by no means sufficiently large to support an extensive and varied industry, such manufactures as may be developed by the protective policy will in all probability have but a limited field for their efforts. Imports must hope to be compensated to some extent for the falling-off of the trade in manufactured goods by the development of the importation of raw materials and partly manufactured articles.

It will be as well to bear in mind that should none of the duties embodied in the new tariff be included in a Convention with any of the Powers (and it is certainly Japan's declared intention not to arrange Conventions, unless under quite exceptional circumstances), the Japanese Government will have reserved the right to effect changes in the tariff without notice, a right which it may confidently be expected will be exercised from time to time. Traders will in that case be always face to face with a disturbing element of unknown limits.

When we remember that these views are apparently endorsed by representatives of all the great firms in Yokohama of every nationality, the value of such an expression of opinion becomes evident. Stated in the briefest terms, the conviction of these eminent merchants is that protection is premature in Japan. They do not condemn the principle. Whatever their own theory may be, they evidently recognise that a dissertation on such a topic would be incongruous in the face of the practice of virtually the whole world, as protection most unfortunately is the practice. They therefore refrain from raising the fundamental issue and confine themselves to observing that Japan's supply of labour is almost entirely unskilled, so that an attempt to develop industries on a large scale by means of a high tariff wall is a measure of doubtful prospects. We are inclined to query, however, whether that argument will have great weight with the Japanese. They will be disposed to reply that the number of factory operatives in this country grew from 498,891 in 1904 to 643,242 in 1909, an increase of more than 22 per cent. in five years, and that, at the same rate of growth, there will be over a million a decade hence. The Committee appear to be on firmer ground when they claim that one of the effects of the high tariff will be to rapidly enhance the cost of living, thus giving a "final blow to the rapidly vanishing factor of cheap labour." Yet even here we question whether "rapidly vanishing" is not too strong a form of speech. Thus the latest official statistics show that the average daily wage of a farm labourer grew from 0.274 yen in 1898 to only 0.340 in 1907, and that the corresponding figures in the case of a weaver were 0.304 and 0.420. In fact it would appear that the price of labour throughout the country at large has not increased so rapidly as is suggested by experience in the immediate neighbourhood of the Foreign Settlements. But in drawing attention to these points we do not wish to be construed as attempting to detract from the value of the document. On the contrary, we recognise that it represents the most intelligent expert opinion and the mature judgment of a number of men whose knowledge of the subject is altogether exceptional. Japanese economists and statesmen will be glad to have access to such criticisms.

JAPANESE FINANCE.

(The Japan Daily Mail, November 2.)

A SECTION of the Tokyo press, headed by the Nippon and the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, continue to attack the Government vehemently on the subject of finance. We are obliged to say that the most careful perusal of the criticisms penned by these journals does not disclose anything like a concrete plan for restoring the situation, if indeed it needs restoration. Their utterances seem to us to be simply destructive, and altogether devoid of any constructive element. The fact is that the people have grown somewhat weary of waiting for the dawn of better times, and certain politicians appear to be fanning this spirit of discontent into a flame for consuming the Ministry. The only practical remedy suggested is that put forward by the Shogyo Shimpō, namely, that the Government should change its policy with regard to railway construction, and should boldly enter the field as a borrower of funds for extending the present system of roads. On the other hand the Government itself has taken the initiative in that matter, though not in a manner so radical as the Shogyo appears to desire. The Cabinet's plan is to entrust to private enterprise the building of light-lines, which will contribute materially to the development of the country's resources while not calling for any large outlay of capital. That policy promises to be eminently successful, judging by the number of charters that have been applied for. For the rest, we cannot discover that anything more substantial than vague discontent is in the air. Plenty of people are ready to lay on the Government's shoulders all the blame for the industrial stagnation which is said to prevail, but nobody ventures to formulate the remedy which he would himself employ were he placed in power. The Asahi, it must be admitted, speaks in more clearly defined tones when it declares that reduction of taxation is the great desideratum of the hour. But even the Asahi does not take frank note of the fact that to reduce the taxes would involve a corresponding diminution of national-debt redemption. We observe, however, that a section of public opinion is beginning to openly advocate the latter measure as the less of two evils. What is noticeable in every case is a determined inclination to ignore the fact that the financial policy of the present Cabinet was conceived with the endorsement of the nation's leading men of affairs for the explicit purpose of revivifying the spirit of industrial enterprise, and that, at the time of its inception, the policy was received by the nation with acclaim. Is there not apparent in all this criticism a note of excessive reliance upon the power of officialdom? We seem to be reading articles penned 25 years ago, when the Government was regarded as the legitimate leader of all industrial enterprise and was appealed to as a species of divinity by every projector of a money-earning project. Surely the country should have by this time emerged from that stage of financial swaddling clothes.

SOUTH AFRICA.

(The Japan Daily Mail, November 3.)

WITH the arrival of the Duke of CONNAUGHT on South African shores—an event which was chronicled in these columns yesterday—a new era has opened for the latest of the self-governing Dominions of the Empire. It is more than a hundred years ago since the British flag was first hoisted at the Cape, but the greater part of that marvellous development which has enabled South Africa to take her present exalted rank among the United States of Britain has occurred within a single generation. In that development the spirit of Imperialism and the hand of war have played an equal part. In the one respect, it can not be denied that the British people, as a whole, and those of South Africa, in particular, owe an immense debt to the far-seeing enthusiasm and energy of CECIL RHODES, for whose monument as the greatest of modern empire-builders there remains the vast territory which bears his name and holds his grave. On the other hand, the Dominion which stretches from the Cape of Good Hope to the Zambesi constitutes proof for all time of the unifying influence of war. Just as LINCOLN in 1864, and BISMARCK in 1870, made empires out of the strife of nations, so CHAMBERLAIN, with his able lieutenants MILNER, ROBERTS and KITCHENER, wrought by force of arms in a few years what no other agencies could have accomplished, perhaps, in a century of political and racial strife. The dangerous legacy of Majuba, redeemed at Mafeking and Paardeburg, no longer stands for menace and division. The two masterful races whose differences bulk so largely in the history of South Africa have learned, on stubbornly contested fields, that mutual respect which alone enables such men to inhabit the same land together, and in harmony. Thus it comes that Boer and Briton have at length, after an age-long conflict, agreed to let the dead past bury its dead and to join hands for the common good. No one pretends, of course, that absolute political peace has descended upon the scene. The recent elections, in which General BOTHA himself suffered defeat, were contested with much fierceness. The first Union Ministry derives its majority—of 17 in a house of 121 members—from the Orange Free State, which, as the stronghold of "Hertzogism," represents the old reactionary, and rural, Dutch spirit. On the other hand, the Unionists, with whom the Independents (chiefly from Natal) are expected to throw in their lot, have been elected for the most part by the towns and larger centres of population, and may be regarded as standing for a liberal and progressive policy. Opinion is thus fairly evenly divided, and there are all the makings of a pretty party fight; but these, after all, are only details in the sub-continental story. The mere fact of South African Federation, and its consummation at the hands of a son of that Empress-Queen who breathed her last before the noise of battle had died away—this can safely be set against those minor differences with which commonsense and constitutional government may be trusted to deal.

It was ten years ago that Australia entered upon her career as a nation within the Empire, following the example which Canada had set in 1867. That example furnishes several points of resemblance to the process of unification on which the visit of the DUKE OF CONNAUGHT will set the seal. In the case of the North American Dominion, a hostile element was supplied by the French settlers of Quebec. In the case of South Africa, the natural opposition of the Dutch inhabitants had to be reckoned with. It could readily be imagined that any other State would hesitate before granting complete autonomy to an ostensibly divided community. However, in both these cases the difficulty has been triumphantly overcome. And it has been overcome by the same simple, yet apparently dangerous, device—absolute confidence. The destiny of these young nations has, as it were, been thrust upon them, and they have been bidden to rise to the height of it, while the Empire looks on, as judge and friend combined. In such circumstances, with any people worth their salt, failure is impossible. Responsibility, conjoined with trust—no man with any belief in his own powers, and any solid foundation for that belief, asks more. Under such conditions, all his latent manhood gathers to the task, until the confidence reposed in him is seen to be justified. So it has been, is, and doubtless will be, with the young nations of the British Empire. For the policy of trust, which to many other nations would seem suicidal, succeeds admirably, and the new-made nations make haste to win their spurs in the field of self-government. To an outsider it seems incredible that a Frenchman should hold the reins of power in British Canada, or that the generalissimo of the Boer forces a decade ago should now be Prime Minister of a united South Africa, under the flag against which he fought. Or again, the foreign critic might discern a sinister meaning in the fact that the date selected for the Duke of CONNAUGHT'S departure from England to open the Union Parliament should have been the very day, when, eleven years ago, the Boer armies committed the first act of war by crossing the Rhodesian frontier. But these are the riddles of British Imperial policy—riddles which have now been happily solved in all the four quarters of the Empire. So fortunate, indeed, has been the issue, that it may truly be said, on behalf of the Mother Country, as regards her relations with her Daughter-States across the Seas, that Wisdom is justified of her Children.

THE KOREAN VISITORS.

The ladies' section of the Chosen tourist party visited the Peeresses' School on Monday morning. The visitors seemed greatly interested in witnessing the methods of teaching Japanese girls in the school, and spent some three hours in inspection.

At noon the Women's Patriotic Association gave a luncheon party in honour of the party at the Peers' Club, when Princesses Kan-in, Nashimoto, and Fushimi, Jr., were present with many other members of the Association. After luncheon the guests were entertained with jugglery and other performances. The party broke up at three in the afternoon. As for the noblemen, they paid a visit to the Military Preparatory School in the morning.

It seems that the Chosen peeresses are having a very good time in Tokyo. On Tuesday morning these ladies proceeded to the Mitsukoshi Drygoods Store in specially provided motor-cars, and made purchases amounting to some 700 yen. In the evening the whole tourist party was entertained at the Kojunsha, when a theatrical performance was given by the members of the school for actresses. After the performance an elaborate dinner was served. It is reported that invitations have already been issued to the Chosen peers and peeresses to attend a banquet to be given in the Imperial Palace today in honour of the Emperor's birthday.

NOTICE TO MARINERS.

Notice is hereby given by the Department of Communications that the light on the experimental acetylene gas buoy off Hommoku at the entrance to Yokohama Harbour, is not shown for the present (see Notification No. 60 of Department of Communications, January 1910).

TOKYO NOTES.

There are two notable organizations in Tokyo, the regular meetings of which form the social events of the month. One is known as the Literary and Musical Society and the other as the Ladies' Debating Club. The former is liberally co-educational, permitting the sexes to vie in reproducing the latest intellectual achievements, and giving various degrees of entertainment, original and otherwise. The other organization is sternly exclusive, and allows nothing below the fair sex to enter its precincts or participate in its good things. And why should a mere man wish to poke his head in where it is not wanted, or attempt the pretence of appreciating what he does not understand? The Ladies' Debating Club accordingly meets at an hour when husbands and sweethearts are busy breadwinning. While the men are engaged in the trifling occupation of raking in a little income, the good angels of the household maintain the more intellectual end of the family honour. Not that ladies cannot debate without practice, but that the common toil of looking after a mere man does not afford a subject sufficiently interesting for debate; and men, moreover, are not good listeners, especially if the subject is pointed and personal. At a recent meeting of the Debating Club a very timely subject was brought under review after the most approved fashion. If you jump to the conclusion that it was Suffragettes these fair ladies were discussing, all that can be done is to inform you that you are mistaken. It was not even the impetuous and ever-increasing visitations of Tokyo burglars; no, nor yet the breaking up of the wet weather. It would be no use to ask any one not in the sacred circle to guess; for it was a subject of no less profundity and importance than the question as to "whether umbrellas or goloshes are a lady's best friends." This subject, which would have taken a man half a lifetime to adjudicate upon, was disposed of by these experts in dialectic in a few minutes. For a still more interesting subject was still upon the programme, namely, "whether a woman without a pocket or a native of Central Africa is the more uncivilized." Now, to a man it would appear as if two persons without pockets were in exactly the same condition, but to ladies such an attitude would seem a mistaken one, for ladies naturally take into consideration the saving clause: "other things being equal." A man might argue that this was not a clause, but his contention would, in the opinion of his better half and his whole intellect, have no appreciable effect on the conclusion. Intuitively there may seem to be some slight difference between a lady without a pocket and a pocketless central African savage, but whether in this case it is logically so, and that things are really as they seem, or whether it is six of one and half a dozen of the other, well—that is the question. At least it was the question previous to the last meeting of the Tokyo Ladies' Debating Club; but it never can become a question again; it is now for ever shelved as a solved problem, like the discovery of the North Pole. Well, it is pleasant and encouraging to know that in the worthy rush for intellectuality woman is in the van; for in this respect man is bound to give the intellectual palm to the sense of the sex that decides for the usefulness of a pocket as against none.

* * *

The subject upon which we now enter is also explicitly a ladies' matter, but a mere man may be permitted to forestall the programme committee of the Tokyo Ladies' Debating Society and inquire into the merits and demerits of Japanese matting. The subject is much to the fore now on account of the marked decrease in the demand for this article in America. As one who has been watching its history abroad for the last twenty years, the writer has strong opinions as to the cause of the decline in exports of Japanese matting abroad. In the first place the Americans and Canadians regard the patterns woven into the average roll of Japanese matting as hideously ugly and inartistic. When colour is attempted it is invariably a loud red, garnet, or green, a Paris green at that. Only the most ignorant class of people could fancy these patterns on their floors. The plain matting, or that with a faint stripe of light colour, was always preferred by the more educated classes abroad. At least that is my experience in travelling over the best part of America, Canada and Europe. But it has now come to be regarded as a want of taste to use matting on the floor; and this impression prevails especially in the United States. The cheap stuff was invariably ugly, and the plain was too expensive for the unimportant uses for which it was in demand. The influence of modern education also is against the use of matting on floors. The average American is learning from the lessons in hygiene given in the common schools, that to cover the floors of his house with a strawy substance like matting, is unsanitary; for matting is a harbourer of dust and insects; it usually has walkers in it as well as on it. Moreover, to sleep in a room covered with matting gives hay fever to an increasing number of those susceptible to that affliction, because there is always a certain amount of fine dust rising from the floor, just like the inflammatory dust that comes out of dry hay. It is pretty safe to conclude that in future the only matting which will command any measure of disposition in America and Canada is the hardest and least dusty quality that can be sold at a reasonable price. And when patterns are attempted they must be designs preferably small, without prominent figures or colours of any kind, but if coloured, the colours as mild as possible. American factories are turning out artistic rugs at such a reasonable figure now that most people in cities are preferring them, as they are easily taken up and beaten once a week, adding greatly to the ease of keeping a house sweet and clean. The only hope for the future of matting is that manufacturers and exporters shall take more carefully into account the radical change that is going on in the matter of floor coverings in America. The old idea of covering a floor all over with carpet is going out. Every housewife now wants a hardwood floor if possible, and a space two or three feet wide all round between the carpet and the wall. A rug suits this idea best. Consequently if manufacturers would devote more attention to making matting squares, after the pattern and size and shape of the American rug, there would be more likelihood of increasing the demand for matting abroad.

* * *

The Tokyo municipal authorities have a remarkable habit of strewing the streets with pebbles as a means of repairing indentations in the level. This at once strikes a foreigner in more ways than one as a unique manner of improving a highway. In Europe and America when tiny stones collect on the street men are sent out to pick them up, because their presence inflicts on travellers in vehicles unwelcome jolts which not only add to the wear and tear of the carriage, but make riding in wheeled vehicles unpleasant. Since rubber-tired wheels are now coming into almost universal use, one would think that an agitation against putting small stones on the streets would begin; for these treacherous pebbles must be very injurious to rubber tyres. When gravel is used for road repairing in other countries, it is always covered with some finer material, so as to leave the street level and even. There appears to be no good reason why the usual manner of repairing streets should not be followed in the capital of the Empire. It seems a pity that streets which otherwise are passable should be disfigured and roughened by these ankle twisting, wheel jerking pebbles.

* * *

Another custom incapable of being appreciated by the foreigner is that of making the renting of a house an excuse for borrowing money without interest. Almost every landlord in letting a house, wants, in addition to the regular monthly rent, a considerable deposit in money which he holds for his own use as long as the tenant occupies the house. Exactly what the reason of this custom is, does not appear evident to a foreigner. If the tenant was of a kind that might be expected to escape in the night without paying overdue rent, the case might be different. But when a tenant is an old resident, and a person of known probity, it comes rather as a shock to his ideas of honour to be dunned for a deposit of 600 or 1,000 yen before he can be trusted with becoming the occupant of his neighbour's house advertised to let. The instances cited are not imaginary but actual, and the houses concerned were nothing in the way of palatial residences either, but houses of the common foreign type. Money may be rather plentiful in Japan at present, but there are few (if any) with so much of it that they are willing to hand a thousand yen over to their neighbours free of interest for two or three years, merely for the privilege of being allowed to pay 100 or 150 yen a month for the rent of a house. Japanese tenants appear to accept the custom as an honourable one that time has sanctioned and experience justified. The foreigner, however, fails to see the force of its application to him, save as a punishment he does not deserve, or even a gratuitous nuisance. Not only so, but when leaving the rented house the tenant is expected to pay his monthly rent up to the moment of departure, and then hold out his hand to the landlord for the return of the deposit money. It appears quite out of place to retain the rent of the last few months so as to save the landlord the trouble of handing over the cash he has borrowed, at the end of the lease. But the feeling of the foreigner is that if he cannot be trusted with the use of the house except on a deposit of half a year's rent, then why should he be expected to trust the landlord with the honour of returning the deposit money, if the rent is paid up to the date when the lease expires?

* * *

A good many Tokyo residents are anxious that the police shall not suppress the time-honoured custom of the city's poor in setting up their little stalls and selling their wares on the sides of the streets at night. Many of us have thought this the most interesting feature of an evening walk on the Tokyo streets, and have patronized these small dealers freely. The flower-show held every ten days in various parts of Tokyo is a recognized institution, where many go to provide themselves with plants and flowers according to taste and requirement. It is, moreover, a good excuse to get out for a lark when parents would rather have you in. As for the street pedlars, are they not the dealers who provide us with the inexpensive curios which we could not purchase from regular shops without "going broke?" From these one may often pick up beads and netsuke, as well as a hundred other relics of old Japan in a way that no other convenience could supply. There are admirers and husbands in Tokyo who look with pride upon fair ones adorned by the fancy chains and other ornaments made from materials in gold, silver, cloisonne and lacquer, picked up at these street-side stalls in the days when love was young. We therefore agree with those who hold that there are other directions in which the police may more profitably employ themselves than in banishing the street pedlars; and in these other directions lies the greater menace to the public, too.

KOREA.

(FROM OUR SEOUL CORRESPONDENT.)

The ancient Korean believes that the hills breathe, and have a pulse that throbs with all sorts of influence. From this current of life there radiates off toward the living and the dead every manner of fortune, glad reward and good gifts, again fierce and awful retribution. The hill-gods cost Korea in the past, ages of devotion, and millions of money. He might truly say:

I to the hills will lift my eyes,
From whence doth come my aid.

In to-day's paper there is a note saying that a new religion will be founded, the religion of Tan koon, King Tan, who appeared in north Korea about 2,300 B.C. He was a spirit, made his throne under a sandal wood tree and afterwards disappeared into the hills and became an "immortal." These genii, elfin fairy-folk have had high honour done them in the lore of Korea. Not among the embodied but among spirit existence are to be found the Roosevelts and Bryans of the peninsula. In the Chinese character this Korean eriking is written a combination of man and mountain. He is always associated with the hills and makes his appearance from out of its mists into the view of the startled passer who yields to its influence as the soul of Rip Van Winkle was befuddled by the nine-pin bowlers.

In Whanghai or Long-life Mountain (Chang-soo San) there is a temple that sits like an eyebrow over a vast yawning chasm. How was it built and by what unknown method did the gods of those days heave up the rocks and timber necessary for the same. The answer is: "In three days of thick fog the erikings of Whanghai built it," and there it is to-day still Tal-am (Midair Temple).

The wide place that all sorts of hill-spirits have in conversation is an interesting fact. The Elixir Plant of Life (Pool-lo-cho), a vegetable spirit, is talked of by everybody and also its first cousin mountain ginseng (San sam). What, with a good dose of ginseng tea, a man could not do is unworthy of record. As men seek gold in the untracked wildernesses of the Klondyke the Korean seeks mountain ginseng. The right seeker spends first one hundred days in prayer in order that the mountain god may clarify his vision to see the vibrations that enhalo this wonderful plant. Away into the hills he hies beholding its avenues of mystery, and holding converse with all the spirits that people it.

The mountain tops and heaven are just over the way from one another. Once the writer was crossing a high range of peaks, when he met an old mountaineer and remarked on the character of the surroundings. "We are close to heaven up here" said the wrinkled-faced hermit. One pass was called Ma-chul-lung (the Pass that touches Paradise) and two peaks near by were Chun-chu-pong (The pillars of Heaven). Such being the case it becomes the midway camping ground for brigades of spirits.

These hills have each a special great spirit guardian, who seems to live through the pulsations of the mountain spurs. If these spurs are interfered with the mountain spirit (san sil-lyung) is helpless. In many parts of Korea are cromlechs and dolmens that sit with broad back and ponderous weight on these ancestral arteries. They were put there by some unknown enemy of the past, who determined to paralyse the mountain and so render the land powerless. To the Korean, the dolmen is not a grave site, or a grave mark, or a sacrificial table, it is a dead weight on the back of the tentacles of the hill that stops its breath and renders the land impotent.

"Get them off, Roll them over, Blow them up with dynamite and restore the virility of the past."
"No use now" says the Korean, "too late, let him go."

SPECTATOR.

OUR RUSSIAN NEWSLETTER.

(From Our St. Petersburg Correspondent.)

St. Petersburg, October 13.

The Emperor has signed the decree dissolving the extraordinary session of the Finnish Diet summoned to consider two points of the new law regulating Russo-Finnish relations. These were the equalisation of the rights of all Russian subjects in Finland with those of the Finnish born: and the payment to be made to the Imperial treasury in lieu of personal service in the Army. The Diet declined to discuss these very moderate proposals and has been dissolved in the usual way. At the same time a decree issues summoning the ordinary meeting of the Diet to assemble on February 1st next. The questions which the Diet declined to discuss were referred to it for its opinion before introducing into the Duma and the Upper House the measures executing these two points. The Emperor, taking the initiative as required by the nugatory amendment in the law passed by the Duma at the end of last session by which the Russian legislative body deprived itself of any initiative in dealing with the affairs of Finland, has decreed that the two measures be introduced simultaneously into the two Russian Chambers on their reassembling at the end of this month.

It is significant of the methods of Finnish agitation that on the very day when these decrees were signed a paragraph was circulated to the foreign press through the usual agencies from Helsingfors stating that M. Stolipin and Genl. Sein, the Premier Minister and the Governor-General of Finland, at their meeting on Tuesday, had discussed the question of abolishing the Diet altogether and of the "division of the Grand Duchy into Zemstvos." Of late years the world has heard a great deal about "provocation" and agents provocateurs in Russian politics. Here is an admirable example of "provocation" calculated, as it was intended, to set all the "friends of Finnish patriotism" snarling once more about the "brutal tyranny" of "barbarous" Russia. As so frequently stated in these columns, the Russian Government will continue in the future as in the past to deal with extreme caution with the question of Finland, for Russia's statesmen understand perfectly with whom they have to deal. Every step taken will be strictly constitutional: reforms will be introduced very gradually: no amount of schoolboy mischief, such as the agitation leaders so frequently affect, will disturb the equanimity of Russia, and in the end the people of Finland will have little difficulty in recognising that their worst enemies are the little nest of agitators, mostly descendants of Swedish stock and no true Finns, whose ends stand self-condemned by the means employed to attain them. There is not a word of truth in the paragraphs so sedulously circulated and appearing even in well-informed English newspapers. Russian Provinces are not "divided into Zemstvos" though perhaps Finland, "an integral part of the Russian Empire," may not yet be aware of this. The Russian Government has no intention of "abolishing" anything in Finland except the ridiculous claims to existence as an independent State put forward by a body of agitators who are strongly suspected of being a very unfair representation of the feelings of Finland as a whole.

The Governor of Vjatka, M. Kamishansky, formerly Procurator of the St. Petersburg High Court, has died suddenly from heart failure at his post. M. Kamishansky will be remembered chiefly as the expert whose interpretation of the law of Russia consigned to prison for three months a number of members of the First Duma, signatories to the unfortunate "Viborg Manifesto." The Russian Law Code contained no clauses dealing with the novel situation created by the summary closing of the Duma, and M. Kamishansky is credited with having discovered a paragraph that suited the case.

The Committee of Ministers has resolved to re-create the Ministry of Agriculture with very much extended powers. In the new Ministry will be incorporated the Agrarian Settlement Department. All questions having to do with the betterment of the conditions of agriculture, including the marketing of agricultural products will be centralised in this Ministry. The veterinary department and the land surveying department, now under the Ministry of the Interior, will be handed over to the Ministry of Agriculture. No candidates are yet named for the post of Minister of Agriculture, but the name of M. Khomiakov, first President of the Third Duma, was generally spoken of some time ago as a suitable appointment for the post if it should be created. It is probable, however, that the present head of the Agrarian Settlement Department, which will form the most important part of the new Ministry, M. Krivoshein, will have the natural preference.

M. Khomiakov served for many years in the old Ministry of Agriculture and rose to high position and rank in the service, before the Ministry was reorganised into a mere department.

The Committee of Ministers after considering the project for a War Tax submitted by the Government Commission has returned it to the Commission to be re-cast. In the form presented the War Tax, which, it will be remembered, proposed to raise a million sterling annually from those who for whatsoever reason did not serve their time in the Army at the service age, was made partly dependent upon the regulations for the collection of an Income Tax. As this latter is apparently not yet ripe for introduction in Russia it has become necessary to remodel the proposed war Tax in order that it may be passed as a substantial Bill.

Since the beginning of the outbreak of plague at Odessa there have been registered 123 cases and 34 deaths. Another new case is reported to-day. Moscow and other towns are taking precautions against the introduction of plague from the South. The Odessa municipality is opposing the recommendation of the Imperial Committee concerning plague which required the passports of all persons leaving Odessa to be clearly marked with the name of that town.

The Ministry of Ways of Communication has put in estimates to the Duma for "extraordinary" expenditure in the forthcoming year to the amount of ten millions sterling. Two-thirds of this large amount is taken up by additions and reconstructions on the Great Siberian Railway and the building of the Amur Railway.

Mr. Kokovtsev, Minister of Finance, with his family, has left for Paris on leave.

What highway robbers were in the old days of Russian travel by road, when they infested in gangs all convenient spots and swept down upon the unwary much as in other parts of Europe, that to day are the Russian railways, which have replaced the roads. Complaints of losses in transit by rail in Russia are universal among merchants. Goods disappear by bales and boxes, by waggon-loads, and even by whole trains. The modus operandi is various, but always requires the connivance of railway officials. While passengers' luggage in Russia is as safe as if in a safe deposit, thanks to the system of registration and perhaps the want of opportunity, consignments of merchandise by the crawling goods trains suffer severely all over the country. Small thefts hardly count amid frauds with lading-bills that make away with tens of thousands of pounds' worth of goods or manipulation of other documents by which whole train-loads are sent to the wrong destination and there dealt with by confederates! Many large Russian firms keep a special lawyer whose sole business is to deal with claims for short weight and losses against railway companies whose annual expenditure on this item, although repayment is delayed sometimes for years, runs into millions of roubles. Doubtless one of the principal causes of this universal system of robbery of goods trains in Russia is the extraordinarily slow speed at which they travel. The distance between St. Petersburg and Moscow is four hundred miles, which the passenger does in a night: a goods train takes a week, most of which is passed in standing—a standing temptation—at wayside stations!

The death of the daring aviator, Capt. Matsievich of the Russian Navy, has cast a sudden gloom over the highly successful fortnight's flying meeting. Capt. Matsievich, who held a high post in the draughtsmanship department of Naval Construction, only a few days ago took up the Premier Minister, M. Stolipin, for a five minutes' flight in his Farman aeroplane. Yesterday he flew several times, and about five o'clock took up Vice-Admiral Jakovlev, Chief of the Naval Staff, for a prolonged flight at a great height over a considerable part of St. Petersburg. He had hardly returned to the aerodrome and made a good landing with his passenger when he declared his intention of trying for the record for altitude prize. It was already getting dark, and before Capt. Matsievich had been long in the air the gun fired to announce the end of the day's official work. The regulations allow an aviator who is already in the air at the moment of gun-fire to continue flying for a certain period longer, but it is supposed that Capt. Matsievich may have been influenced by the gun to make a more than usually daring descent. After losing sight of him and regaining it again with difficulty several times in the increasing gloom of evening the eye-witnesses of the disaster, who numbered only a few hundred enthusiasts, the crowd having departed before, saw the machine describe two curious turns upon itself in the vertical plane; then a black spot detached itself and came vertically down followed by a confused mass of debris. It is difficult to estimate height on such occasions but the unfortunate aviator probably fell vertically at least a hundred yards. He was dead from heart failure before touching ground, and the injuries found by the doctors from this contact included double fracture of the lower jaw, both sides, fracture of the skull on both temples, to say nothing of the injuries to the limbs and trunk. The Naval Department is being urged to regard Capt. Matsievich's flight as service, which would qualify his case for a pension on the higher scale. The unfortunate man's wife and son, a cadet, in his uniform, were on the ground at the time and ran across the ground amid heartrending scenes, to the body.

The funeral of the daring aviator Capt. Matsievich of the Russian Navy took place at St. Petersburg to day, among the pall-bearers being the Minister of War and the Acting Minister of Marine, ex President of the Duma M. Alexander Guchkov and other distinguished persons. The whole length of the Nevsky Prospect was crowded with people to see the passing of the cortege and all traffic had to be stopped. The body was covered with the Russian Naval ensign and a naval guard of honour mounted at the church. Over three hundred wreaths, many of them of silver, and all in some way remarkable, were sent from all parts of Russia from individuals and public bodies whose sympathies were aroused by the tragic death of the Russian aviator. The Government has granted a generous pension to the widow and a separate pension to the daughter, the son being already provided for as a cadet. Flying was countermanded to-day in sign of mourning and all the aviators now in Petersburg attended the funeral. There is more significance in all this than might perhaps appear on the surface. Apart from the painful causes of the death and the attendant circumstances, which were calculated to arouse the sympathies of the most careless, it is plain that something more than public sorrow for a gallant aviator, something more than official honour to a member of the public services, is to be detected in the details of Capt Matsievich's funeral, the manner of which proves conclusively to all who might have doubted it that Russia has now accepted aviation as a national work, in which the honour of the nation is involved. With such feelings it may be expected that Russia will in the near future take a much higher place in the world's newest sphere of competition than was dreamt of a few months ago.

PRESENT PROBLEMS IN TOKYO

By PROF. ABE.

II.

Now we must note that educational matters occupy so large and important a place in the ward office work, that of the total expenditures of the ward, amounting to 2,000,000 yen, ninety per cent. is appropriated for educational purposes and investments. Hence, those good, full fledged members, ever pleased to swagger about in the feeling of importance imparted by such an honourable title as Member of the Ward Council, wisely foresaw the wretched state their wards would be in when the time came to transfer the educational department over to the municipality. For this reason they wanted to suppress the school unification bill, and, what was more surprising and intolerable, they even went the length of drawing to their side many neutral wards, thereby causing a most sensational conflict with the pro-unification party. It is clear that such a foolish struggle could have been averted, if those who stood against the unification had really had at heart the interests of the city at large. The unification of the school system will always remain unfeasible so long as selfish members of the wards and municipality wish to sacrifice the interests of the city in general to the interests of local wards. We will watch the development of primary school education in Tokyo to learn if the sacrifice of the municipal interests will not act as a boomerang and rebound on the selfish wards who have offered such blind opposition.

Again in the fish-market question we observe a decided lack of regard for public interest on the part of our Tokyo citizens. As far back as the 22nd year of Meiji, if we remember correctly, the authorities, as soon as the City Improvement Bill was passed, ordered the removal of the fish market in Nihonbashi, as well as the vegetable markets in Kyobashi and Kanda, selecting certain proper places for new markets. Years have now passed, but the order is still ignored or unexecuted. While we are fully aware of the blameable negligence indulged in regarding the matter by the municipal authorities, we should ascribe this unpleasant state of affairs chiefly to the constant endeavours, on the part of those connected with markets, in blindly seeking their own selfish ends and profits. Deeming it not out of place, we will give a bird's-eye view of the developments, since last March, of this fish-market-removal question.

April 30th last being the final date set for the fish market removal, those interested in the market held a general meeting at the Meiji za on Mar. 24th last, which however resulted in nothing, after much heated discussion. On the 30th of the same month they again held a mass meeting at the Uogashi Fishery Office, when the removal was vetoed by the majority. Let us observe the points argued by the anti-removal parties. The one advocated the purchasing of the warehouse belonging to N.T.K. Company, to transform it into a fish market by means of a spanned wharf. If this scheme were carried out, an area covering over 4,500 tsubo could be secured, wherein about 400 fish-agency offices might be built, the estimated cost being nearly yen 1,430,000. The other party insisted upon removing the market to Nakasu. In passing we may recall the fact that the municipality at first selected for the new fish-market, three places; namely, Hakozaki-machi, Nakasu and Kitashimbori. But the present condition is that while the contemplated removal was prolonged and protracted, the municipality was obliged to dispose of Hakozaki-machi, and, Kitashimbori proving too narrow for this market, Nakasu remains the only place for it. Even here some private residences are already built. But as it is still in the hands of the municipality, the removal, if decided upon, could be carried out without great difficulty. The cost estimated for the removal is said to total yen 1,400,000.

Though the general meeting held by the fishmongers of Uogashi, resulted apparently in the triumph of the anti-removal party, they cannot be regarded as having accomplished much toward the solution of this question. On the contrary, the conflicts between the fish agents now tend to gradually precipitate even political party fights. Those against the removal had from the beginning as their counsellors Mr. G. Tsumoda and Mr. K. Oishi. Whether this reminded their opponents of the advantage of obtaining assistance from a political party or not we do not presume to say, but later the pro removal party also came out, backed by Messrs. Matsuda and Ema. April 30th, the last term fixed for the removal, passed away long since, and yet this cumbrous question of 20 years standing not only remains unsolved, but threatened for a time to be thrown into the giddy vortex of political party conflict. And who should be, let us demand, held responsible for such a deplorable development of the situation?

Absolutely without partiality and measuring this question by the criterion of the interest of Tokyo as a whole, who could fail to give ready assent to the reasonable matter of the fish market removal? For it is evident that the existence, in the very centre of the Empire City, of any imperfect fish market, is absolutely intolerable, when we consider that the city improvement work has in view not the facilitation of traffic alone, but also, adding to the beauty of this central city of our country. Thus it was most timely and appropriate that the authorities, immediately after the city improvement work was decided upon, ordered the removal of the markets of fish and vegetables. It is idle to say that the ward of Nihonbashi is the very centre of our Empire city, and that on the completion of city improvements and street repair work, the street from Shimbashi to Manseibashi would prove the best and the most attractive, adding considerably to the beauty of the capital. But to think of the fish market eclipsing almost half its beauty! One can no more tolerate the thought of the existence, in the centre of such splendour, of a fish market than that of soiling a beautiful carpet with muddy boots. Viewed from every point, the imperative necessity of the removal of the fish market is manifest. Those standing against the project can be no other than the blindly selfish, always ready to consult their own convenience alone. It is a matter for infinite regret that even some politicians of both social standing and credit should have placed themselves foremost on the side of the anti-removal party. There being but little difference between the costs estimated by both, each alike amounting to yen 1,400,000, they have no reasonable ground for their opposition to removal. They can only be regarded as wilful,—that is all. We should urge upon the competent authorities the desirability of taking drastic measures for the suppression, once for all, of such an endless annoyance.

To state, in this connection, our further wish, we believe the fish market business could, with the best advantage, be municipalized. As a matter of fact, to keep the citizens constantly supplied with fresh and wholesome food stuff, requires the authorities to subject to scrupulous examination such supplies as fish and vegetables; which, for all the purchasers know, may be brought in from the centre of plague-infected districts. Nor is it possible for them to ascertain for themselves whether vegetables may have been well washed with fresh water before they were brought into the market. It is not unusual to see peasants wash radishes, turnips and potatoes with impure water before bringing them to the market in the city. This is, however, screened from general eyes, but nevertheless a most intolerable state of things, and the remedy is nothing short of official supervision. In these circumstances, nervous folks must perpetually be ill at ease concerning the sanitary condition of food material. If any sanitary provision serves as a criterion for measuring the degree of civilization, our Tokyo city must be said to be in no position yet to boast any civilization at all. The municipalization, we believe, of the fish market can by no possibility interfere with the welfare and interest of fish agents, but on the contrary, it would, in no small degree, facilitate the necessary examination of fish, enabling them to keep the fish market in the most trim and sanitary condition at all times. From an economical view point also, the municipalization is advisable, since fish agents, who bend and stagger even under the present burden of but yen 1,400,000, can hardly be considered capable of defraying an expense amounting to yen 3,000,000, which is the estimated cost for putting the fish market in perfect order. Whereas the municipality could, if necessary, easily float public loan bonds to meet the above expenses, thereby being enabled to introduce in our city the most modern market systems to be found in the Western cities,

And since fish agents are to pay for each section of the market they occupy, the municipality could not only easily meet the market expenditure, but also pay the interest of the loan bonds to be floated for the construction of a new market. In the large Western cities, fish markets are for the most part municipalized. In England in every municipality, the markets enjoy net profits of 7 per cent. of the funds invested. From the above it is clear the municipalization of the fish market is very desirable from both the sanitary and economic points of view. According to a certain paper, read at the Aldermen's Council last May, the Mayor is quoted as having laid before the members, in an informal way, the bill for the municipalization of the fish market, when they were divided in opinion, finally agreeing to submit it to the Municipal Administration Adjusting Assembly, which, after investigations, is reported to have decided, while approving of the project in principle, to reject it in consideration of the financial condition of the city. We deeply regret the miscalculation of the financial state of the city that nipped this important project in the bud. In our opinion there is no need for entertaining any anxiety about the financial condition of the city, inasmuch as public loan bonds can be, as we observed before, easily floated for the market enterprise, which would not only result in no increased burden to the city, but on the contrary, when judiciously managed, enable it to pay off even its own debts.

As for the tramcar fare questions, it is as old as history, and residents of Tokyo know it almost inside out. So I will confine myself to but a brief observation. We frequently notice the Tokyo Street Electric Company propose first to increase fares, then the municipalization of the tramways. In every case, however, it is clear the Company's real intention is for the fare increase. The Company never fails to avail itself of every opportunity for the starting of a movement to increase fares. And no wonder, for to raise the fare by one sen means an additional income per annum of yen 1,500,000. The 67 per cent. dividend, received now by this Company, is in itself no small amount of profit. Still the company finds it impossible to remain content—probably because it sees the enviable case of the Tokyo Electric Light Company, which, while possessing no greater monopoly than the Tramway Company, enjoys more than ten per cent. dividend per annum, and even that, unlike the former, with no sort of public attacks poured upon them. Thus far the public voice has succeeded in checking the Company's avarice, which is ever seeking to see ahead some opportunity for the increasing fare. But who can tell but that the most deliberate movement on the part of the Company may gradually ingratiate itself with the members of the municipal council and the Government authorities, totally disarming them and winning them over to its side? The recent sudden change with which the Company came forth to comply with the municipal request regarding the Company's public contribution, naturally causes one to wonder if the Company is not already paving the way for the often contemplated fare-tariff-raising movement. Citizens may be prepared to positively dissent to this project; but is it not a greater loss to waste so much time, money and energy on such an endless question? We should rather hope the authorities would solve it once for all by peremptorily striking at the very root of this ever arising question. The municipalization of tramways is the trend of the modern world. It was a fundamental mistake to leave in the hands of a private company the control of the electric tramways, which may be regarded as the public highways of the civilized world. The public roads are built, from their very nature, for the general interest and convenience of the public, and not at all for amassing wealth to individuals. Our Tokyo authorities were at the very outset already mistaken when they granted to a private company the undertaking of tramcar railways. Hence the frequent crossing of interests of citizens and of the Company, and the consequent upheaval of the fare increase movement,—in every case where the authorities concerned find themselves dangerously subjected to every possible form of temptation. We believe the municipalization of the tramways will not only remove all these evils attendant on the present state of things, but promote the common interest of the citizens in general. At any rate the Company must come, in no less than five years, to be able to declare the dividend of 10 per cent., in view of the rapidity with which passengers are increasing. With such a promising future ahead, should the company be greedy enough to contemplate anything like a fare increase movement, the municipality should not hesitate to discard it and at the same time decide on the purchase of the tramway monopoly. The municipalisation will surely redound to the great interest of the city at large.

As we observed, the unification of the school systems and the municipalization of the fish-market are most advisable and necessary. But they cost the city at least 7 to 8 million yen, while the tramway undertaking, if it were municipalized, calls for at least as much as 4 to 5 million yen. Here we must pause and question: will the citizens be able to bear the burden of such enormous expenditure? But let us be persuaded that we need not mind much to run into more or less debts, provided the investment is to be made in whatever is calculated to bring in return a certain amount of income. Even though the city owes some hundred million yen, if the city, out of the income accruing from the very enterprise in which it is investing, can pay the interest and also annually some portion of the principal? Excepting the school system unification, the municipalization of the fish market and tramways can be justly expected to prove most lucrative. This is why we regret that the Municipal Administration Adjusting Assembly judged—misjudged—the present financial state of the city as prohibitive of such municipal finance, which they made the ground for the dissent to the bill for the municipalisation. Do they mean the city has no resources? If so, was it difficult for them to consider a step further and find that a city loan could easily be floated abroad, even if difficult at home? They may fear that, for a city already over burdened with debts, further floating of city loans will jeopardise its financial condition. But this is unnecessary anxiety. Let foreign examples prove the case. London has debts amounting to yen 450,000,000 and Paris yen 740,000,000 (investigated in 1895), while Tokyo has only yen 15,000,000. We need not be alarmed if our empire city raised its municipal debts to an amount of yen 100,000,000. We may further observe, the gross amount of the debts owed by several cities in France (Paris excluded) reaches yen 5,000,000,000, while that in England (London included) totals yen 5,772,500,000. Not that we mean to encourage any loan floating policy, but we often find such occasions as not only justify the flotation of municipal loans, but even render it absolutely necessary. For instance the city improvement work, as little reflection would show, could be with advantage commenced as soon as possible, even if by having recourse to loans, since its postponement for twenty years would mean to almost more than treble the expenditure. We fail to find any reasons why we should hesitate to float city loans, even up to some hundred million yen, provided the investment is to be made in such enterprises as electric tramways, gas, electricity, water works and markets which will each give to the city moderate incomes. Because such investments by no means necessitate the citizens bearing even one sen additional taxes. Here the distinct line should be drawn, however, between national and municipal debts. Most of the national debts are attendant on warfare, and therefore people have duly to pay the interest and at the earliest possible period should clear off the principal; but the municipal debts stand conspicuously different, in their very nature, from the former. Should the citizens fear any increase of municipal debts, as they must that of national debts, the development of the city would be totally out of the question. We sincerely hope our authorities, both of the municipality and the Central Government, will be decidedly bolder in solving these municipal problems.

COUNT HAYASHI'S REMINISCENCES.

(FROM THE "JIJI SHIMPO.")

CLXXIII.—AN AUTOGRAPH LETTER BY EX-EMPEROR SUTOKE.

When this unfortunate Monarch was deposed and banished in 1221, he was placed in confinement on the small island of Naojima which lies off the coast by Takamatsu. There was in this part of my prefecture an ancient and wealthy family which had many treasures, among them a letter signed by the Ex-Emperor and countersigned by one of the Imperial retainers. The letter was the acknowledgement of a loan of a certain quantity of rice which had been made to the royal exile.

The head of the family brought me this document and asked me to buy it. I examined it very carefully, and found that it had all the appearance of being an old and genuine document. The price asked was yen 1,000, which I thought exorbitant, so I refused to buy it.

CLXXIV.—THE SAD FATE OF VISCOUNT MORI.

On the very day of the promulgation of the Constitution (11 February, 1889) Viscount Mori, Minister of Education, was assassinated by a certain Nishino Buntarō, whose religious passions had been roused by the irreverence of which the Viscount was guilty in lifting with his cane the sacred curtain which hung before the Great Shrine at Ise.

I was in the antechamber at the Palace when the news of the assassination arrived and Viscount Kaieda was there also. I remember how the Viscount laid his hand on the handle of his sword. "Serve him right" he cried excitedly. The incident showed how deeply the feelings of the conservative classes in the country had been stirred by Mōri's want of reverence.

After returning to my post at Sanuki shortly afterwards, I went one day to worship the god of Kotohira. The priest in charge of the shrine told me that the Viscount had been making a tour in Kyūshū and Shikoku, from which latter island he had gone to Ise. He had come to Kotohira and had taken tiffin at the priest's house. Not satisfied with Japanese food, he had asked for beef. The priest replied that there was no meat, whereupon the Viscount had said that he had some beef in the Hotel and would send to fetch it. It was in vain that the priest urged that the ancient rules of the Buddhist monasteries forbade the taking of life and the eating of flesh. Mōri said the rule was absurd, and insisted on having the meat brought for his eating in spite of all prohibitions.

It seems quite probable that Mori had behaved in this arrogant and irritating manner wherever he went, and Nishino, who had made the same round after him, had probably been excited to the committal of the crime by the stories he heard at various places.

I knew Viscount Mori very well. He was a man who never hesitated to hurt people's feelings when it was a question of reforming a bad custom or usage. He had no bad intentions when he wounded the susceptibilities of the priest at Kotohira: all that he wanted was to demonstrate the absurdity of what seemed to him an antiquated superstition. His misdemeanour at Ise was probably due to carelessness, but unfortunately the thing got to be known, and made a stir. The Government ought to have given him a severe reprimand, or a punishment, and then his life would have been safe. But the Government let the thing slide (as is the way with officialdom), and by so doing fanned a flame of popular indignation which eventually culminated in the deed of Nishino.

Mori was too rash and inconsiderate in pushing the reform of old institutions, and his rashness not only made his efforts futile, but cost him his life.

CLXXV.—THE FIRST DINNER GIVEN TO PERSONS WHO HAD NO COURT RANK.

On the occasion of the promulgation of the Constitution, His Majesty was pleased to issue invitations to dinner to the speakers of the various Prefectural Assemblies. This was the first dinner ever given to persons who held no Court rank.

CLXXVI.—THE VISIT OF THE TSAREVITCH.

I was appointed Governor of the Hyogo Prefecture on the 26th December 1889. (22nd year of Meiji). The most memorable incident during my tenure of office was the well-known affair at Otsu. The present Tsar of Russia, who was then still Tsarevitch, arrived in Japan in May 1890 for a sight-seeing visit. It was not the first time that a foreign Prince had visited these shores. The King of England's uncle, the Duke of Connaught, had been here the year before and we had given him a somewhat frigid reception, for we well remembered how coldly our Princes had been treated when they visited the British Court.

But we had had nothing to complain of any Russian want of cordiality. They had always received our Imperial Princes with the most distinguished consideration, and we accordingly made most elaborate preparations for the reception of the Tsarevitch. That we should thus honour a Russian prince more than a British one, was by no means pleasing to the meaner kinds of English residents in Japan, and rumours were diligently circulated by them to the effect that the Tsarevitch with his fleet was merely coming to spy out the nakedness of the land, and that Japan was unconsciously preparing to put a viper in her bosom.

These baseless rumours got abroad and found credence among our people, and presently the police force of Kobe got wind of a plot against our illustrious visitor. The authorities at once took steps to crush the conspiracy, arrested some 30 men suspected of complicity and warned them to behave themselves. The Russian Prince and his party landed safely at Kobe, and left it without mishap.

When the Prince visited the Kusunoki Shrine at Kobe the priest in charged wanted to take him into the sanctuary, and I was in an agony of mind for fear the young man should go in with his boots on, or in some other way shock the religious susceptibilities of our people. I was much relieved when the Prince stopped short at the step, took off his hat and bowed reverently towards the shrine. It pleased me to see how careful the man who was to be Tsar of all the Russias was to avoid hurting the religious feelings of men of a different nation.

CLXXVII.—A CONVERSATION WITH THE RUSSIAN COMMANDER.

At two p.m. the next day I called on the Russian Consul. I found there the Commander of the Russian Squadron whom I knew very well. He told me that he had not had a single moment's peace of mind until he got the Prince to Nagasaki. In Japan he could afford to breathe freely as we had no Revolutionists or Nihilists here, and that he intended to accompany his Prince to Kyoto and take part in the festivities accorded the Prince by the Japanese Government. He said all this with a very light-hearted air. No one could have dreamed that in less than an hour an attempt would be made on the life of the Russian Prince.

CLXXVIII.—IMPRUDENT NEWSPAPERS.

Some of our newspapers had already shown their ill will at the welcome afforded to the Russian Prince. Some of them had even attacked the Russian Minister for his rudeness in insisting on having the telegraph wires in front of his Legation raised several feet so as not to interfere with the arrangements to be made for the Prince's reception.

Viscount Aoki, who was then Minister for Foreign Affairs, was not on good terms with the Russian Minister and when the latter applied at the Foreign Office for permission for the Russian ships escorting the Tsarevitch to anchor in Japanese ports, he was told that the ship on which the Prince actually was might enter the harbours, but that the other ships must be content to anchor outside.

Altogether there were a good many causes of ill-feeling and estrangement, and a good deal was published in the newspapers which, entering the brain of the policeman Tsuda Sanzo, caused him to conceive the idea of an attempt on the life of the Russian Crown Prince.

CLXXIX.—NATIONAL ALARM.

Tsuda Sanzo's attempted assassination of the Russian Crown-Prince filled Japan from the Emperor down to the lowest of his subjects with apprehension, grief, and alarm. A Council was held at Kyoto at which Viscount Enomoto cited a previous instance, under the Tokugawa regime, when a Russian subject was murdered at Yokohama, and the Russian Government demanded the execution of the murderer, and the punishment of the officials within whose jurisdiction the crime was committed. He proposed that Japan should forestall any such demand from Russia by prompt punishment of the guilty and by a speedy message of apology to Russia. The proposal was adopted by the Council, but there were certain difficulties in the way of the execution of the criminal, the details of which are well known to the Japanese public.

CLXXX.—TSUDA'S EXECUTION.

I could never quite understand on what grounds the execution of Tsuda was thought to be necessary; but it became a sort of fixed idea with the Cabinet that the man must be executed, and a telegram was received at the Hyogo Prefectural office ordering that, according to the Imperial ordinance, Tsuda Sanzō should be charged under Art. 116 of the Imperial Ordinance.

CLXXXI.—LETTER FROM THE RUSSIAN MINISTER.

The following incident will show how much our authorities were upset by the event at Otsu. They indeed lost their heads, though they did so out of pure patriotism.

One day, when I was Vice-Minister of Foreign Affairs, M. Schevitch, the Russian Minister called at the Foreign Office with a letter in his hands. On seeing Viscount Enomoto he addressed him as follows:—"This letter deals with the incident at Otsu. Your predecessor called on me at my hotel and after explaining to me what were the wishes of the Cabinet with regard to Tsuda Sanzo's execution and the difficulty in which they found themselves for want of a law under which to act, asked me officially to demand the execution, in which case your Government would be able to order it on the plea of diplomatic necessity."

"I told your predecessor," he continued, "that much though I detested the crime of the would be assassin, how could I, the representative of the Czar of Russia, comply with your request and demand his execution, seeing that there was no written law on the subject? So I reported the whole matter to His Majesty the Czar, and I am glad to say that I have had a reply approving of my course of action. I have brought a copy of the letter with me."

The Foreign Minister did not like recording a letter of this kind in the books of the Department, and accordingly persuaded the Russian Minister, with whom he (Enomoto) was on very good terms, to withdraw the letter. A private copy of it was however informally kept at the Foreign Office.

CLXXXII.—GOODWILL OF THE RUSSIAN CHARGÉ D'AFFAIRES.

After M. Schevitch returned to Russia, the Secretary, M. Stegloff, became chargé d'affaires. Our Foreign Minister was now Mr. Mutsu. One day Stegloff called at the Foreign Office and told Mr. Mutsu that among the letters and papers which had been made over to him, he (Stegloff) had found a letter, signed by Viscount Aoki as Minister of Foreign Affairs, in which the writer pledged himself to have a law introduced into the Criminal Code making Art. 116 applicable in all cases of attempted injury on the persons of foreign princes of the blood.

"This note," he said, "seems to have the nature of a contract. If it remains on the files of our Legation, it may at some future time cause trouble, as it appears to overlook the legislative powers of the Diet. Therefore, if you have no objection, I will return it to you."

Mr. Mutsu was of course only too well pleased to have the document returned to him. It was of no value to the Russians, but the Russian chargé d'affaires, by returning it to our Government, was enabled to earn the gratitude and confidence of our Minister. It was the best thing that he could do with it.

CLXXXIII.—OPPOSITION TO THE EXECUTION OF TSUDA SANZO.

At the Cabinet Council held at Kyoto the only opponent to the proposed execution of Tsuda Sanzo was the late Mr. Miyoshi Taizō, then Vice-Minister of Justice, whose opposition was based on a strict adhesion to the letter of the law. He was alone in this matter, but he was backed up outside the Cabinet, by the late Mr. Kojima Eken, presiding judge of the Court of Appeal, who, in spite of all Cabinet pressure, stood firmly to the letter of the law and refused to sanction the execution of Tsuda.

CLXXXIV.—DOMESTIC POLICY IN PREFERENCE TO DIPLOMACY.

Count Mutsu used to tell me that his success in the matter of Treaty-Revision was due to his domestic policy rather than to his diplomatic actions. As an illustration of this, he gave me the following example.

It was the practice of such of his predecessors as had attempted Treaty Revision to show copies of the drafts of Treaties to their colleagues in the Cabinet and the Privy Council. These latter gentlemen had but a small knowledge of the subject, and no particular opinions of their own. So they would take their copies home with them and submit them to their secretaries or retainers, who would criticize the proposals simply with a view to impressing their masters with a high opinion of their abilities and learning. The masters, in their turn, filled with the unripe criticisms of their retainers (which they were in no position to digest) would return to the Cabinet, and air these criticisms at second-hand. Their speeches did not throw much light on the subject, and there was always the danger that political secrets, entrusted to so many persons, would by and by leak out. All this had contributed to excite public opinion needlessly, and to make Treaty Revision a failure.

"I knew all this very well," said the Count, "and therefore when I undertook the task I made it a rule to show the draft copies to no one except Prince Ito. To my colleagues and other high officials I gave verbal statements and explanations, but nothing written or printed was ever put into their hands. The consequence was that, when questioned by their subordinates and retainers, they were unable to give any full or detailed account of the text of the proposals, but were obliged to content themselves with making general statements and giving assurances that the principle of equal rights was being maintained. Criticism by persons thus became impossible, and it was thus that I was able to make a success of Treaty Revision."

Count Mutsu was a man somewhat given to making wild statements, which could not always be taken au pied de la lettre, but the fact remains that so long as he was in charge of the Treaty Revision negotiations, no discord or want of harmony showed itself in the Cabinet, nor did the diplomatic secrets of the Government leak out beyond the Cabinet circle. For this he is entitled to all credit.

CLXXXV.—TREATY REVISION AND ENGLAND.

The negotiations for Treaty Revision with England were just going on when Count Okuma met with his misfortune. Viscount Aoki thereupon took temporary charge of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. It was said that he had lodged with the British Minister a demand for the absolute withdrawal of the Consular Jurisdiction in Japan. He expected Great Britain to refuse his demand, and he hoped to make capital out of the refusal by putting an end to the Treaty Revision Negotiations started by Count Okuma. When, at a subsequent date, Count Mutsu undertook the thorny task of Revision, his first step was to press the British Minister for an answer to the demand for the withdrawal of Consular Jurisdiction. To this the British Government consented, contenting themselves with certain stipulations concerning Customs Tariffs and Coastwise Navigation.

CLXXXVI.—KIN GYOKU KIN'S ASSASSINATION AND ITS CONSEQUENCES.

On the 28th of March 1894 (Meiji 27) I was at a dinner at the Koyo-kan. Whilst I was there a certain Yoshida Bunzo came to me and told me that his friend Ri-etsu-shoku (a Korean) had visited Boku Eiko that day at his residence in Banchō, and that a murder had been committed. About midnight, on my return from the dinner party, the man again appeared at my official residence telling me that another Korean named Kentoji had received a cable message from Shanghai informing him that Kin Gyoku Kin had been assassinated there by Kō-sho-u. Kentoji was a friend of Ri-etsu-shoku's, and Ri-etsu and Kō-sho-u were two Koreans sent out by the Korean Government to assassinate Boku Eiko and Kin Gyoku Kin. Boku Eiko had got wind of the affair and had baffled Ri-etsu's attempt, by shutting him into a closet.

Yoshida Bunzo had once been a member of the Tokyo Metropolitan Police Force. Dismissed for misconduct, he had since been acting as a spy in the service of the Korean assassins, when Ri called on Boku, and Boku, divining his intentions, locked him into the cupboard. Yoshida thought that he had been murdered, and in his great anxiety came and told me all about it.

The assassins carried with them an autograph letter from the King of Korea.

Prior to these incidents, the Korean Tō gaku-tō (or Party of Eastern Literati) had started an insurrection which the Korean Government was too feeble to suppress. Reports reached Tokyo that the Korean Government had applied to China for assistance, and the reports inflamed the popular indignation of the Japanese, who were already much incensed at the way in which the Chinese Government had sent Kin's body to Korea. Relations between China and Japan were much strained.

On the night of April 2, 1894, a secret council was held at the official residence of the Minister for Foreign Affairs at which were present Minister Mutsu, General Kawakami, Vice-Chief of the General Staff, and myself. Popular rumour had it that we had to discuss the advisability of a dissolution of the Diet for diplomatic reasons. The real object of our meeting was the advisability and feasibility of sending troops to Korea.

FIRST DAY, FRIDAY, 28TH OCTOBER, 1910.

The first day of the race meet is best described in the words of one of the Club's guests: "The poorest attendance ever seen on such a fine day at a Race Meet in Yokohama." When one remembers the Race Meets of former years to which we looked ahead so eagerly—our one season of real life, enjoyed by everybody—it is hard to enthuse much over a meeting attended by fifty foreigners, mostly club members. The stands were empty. A hundred or so Japanese hung over the rail in the outside enclosure. The horses were in good condition, the competition keen and the sport abundantly worthy of a large attendance.

The following are the results.

1. Class C.—For N.R.C. SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES OF AUTUMN 1910.—Value Yen 350 and the Second to receive Yen 100. Weight for Age, with 7lbs. deducted. Distance Three-Quarter of a Mile.

Only six of list of eleven, started, as follows:

Mr. Stunt's Economist, 130lbs. (Asahi) 1
Mr. News' Romeo, 130lbs. (Shindo) 2
Mr. S. Minoda's Susumu, 130lbs. (Suginohara) 3
Mr. Pelham's Coupon, 130lbs. (Fukuhara) 0
Mr. Monte Carlo's Consequence, 130lbs. (Hiroyama) 0
Mr. Tandem's Abunai, 130lbs. (Sasaki) 0

Coupon was fractious and the start exceedingly bad, Economist getting away with a lead of at least five lengths and galloping easily around to win by a dozen lengths. At the Shakespeare Romeo drew up to within a couple of lengths which was the nearest approach to catching up the lead. Romeo came in a very bad second, stubborn and not running well at all, Susumu taking 3rd place.—Time 1.28 3/5.

2. Class B.—For ALL N.R.C. SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES (Subscription Griffiths of Autumn 1910 excluded).—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 75. Weight for Age, with 7lbs. deducted. Winners at date of entry to carry 3lbs. extra for each win. Distance One Mile.

Just half of the horses listed entered the race.

Mr. Monte Carlo's Bijou, 131lbs. (Hirayama) 1
Mr. States' Navajo, 134lbs. (Kashichi) 2
Mr. Tatsuta's Tsukasa, 131lbs. (Kitago) 3
Mr. Nile's Niagara, 128lbs. (Ebano) 0

The start was very pretty, with Niagara leading by a neck but on the outside, with Bijou a close second and the field well bunched. Approaching the Shakespeare, Niagara and Navajo led, almost neck and neck, with Bijou and Tsukasa, dead reck and neck, about two lengths behind. Approaching the trees the field again bunched. Reaching the straight Bijou challenged the leader and drew ahead to win by 2 lengths, with Navajo and Tsukasa 2nd and 3rd. Time, 1.57 2/5.

3. Class D.—For ALL SUBSCRIPTION AUSTRALIAN HORSES.—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 100. Weight 127lbs. Winners at date of entry to carry 2lbs. extra for each win, not exceeding 20lbs. in all. Distance One Mile.

There were six entries as follows:

Mr. J. Sonoda's Sonohama, (late Dorothy), 139lbs. (Kano) 1
Mr. Canuck's Woodbine, 131lbs. (Asahi) 2
Mr. Silk's Midzuho, 139lbs. (Shibata) 3
Mr. Kanagawa's Avant Garde, 147lbs. (Tamazo) 0
Mr. Kanagawa's Shooting Star, 143lbs. (Kawasaki) 0
Mr. Canuck's Blue Bonnets (late Midnette), 133lbs. (Pass) 0

Shooting Star had been declared in excess, in error, and weight was reduced 4 lbs. The start was bad, Midzuho being left, standing, two or three lengths behind the field; Blue Bonnets led. Going up the hill Sonohama gained the lead and maintained it all the way around, winning by about 12 lengths with Woodbine about an equal distance to the rear, followed by Midzuho and the field. From the hill the race was a procession. Time 1.47 2/5.

4. Class C.—For N.R.C. SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES OF AUTUMN 1910.—Value Yen 350 and the Second to receive Yen 100. Weight for Age, with 7lbs. deducted. Distance Three-Quarters of a Mile.

Mr. Nile's Kumoi II., 130lbs. (Hanabusa) 1
Mr. Norfolk's The Plug, 130lbs. (Coffey) 2
Mr. Latham's Gold Blaze, 130lbs. (Kawasaki) 3
Mr. N. Kawakita's Benkei II., 130lbs. (Ebano) 0
Mr. States' Massachusetts, 130lbs. (Kashichi) 0
Mr. Prince's Schiller, 130lbs. (Shindo) 0

The start was fairly good, Schiller leading but quickly giving place to The Plug, with Massachusetts second. Along the back straight Schiller again came second, but once more gave place, this time to Gold Blaze, who challenged the lead but fell away again. Around the bend Kumoi II won second place and challenged the leader, winning, in the last furlong, by 2 lengths, with The Plug second and Gold Blaze a length behind. Time 1.29 7/10.

5. Class B-A.—For N.R.C. SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES OF SPRING 1910.—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 75. Maidens at date of entry. Weight for Age. Distance One Mile.

This was the only full field of the day, all listed being entered.

Mr. Oswald's Little Eva (late Isami), 132lbs. (Kawasaki) 1
Mr. Tandem's Merrythought II., 132lbs. (Sasaki) 2
Mr. Canuck's Red Leaf, 122lbs. (Asahi) 3
Mr. Norfolk's Phroso (late Himekuno), 132lbs. (Coffey) 0
Mr. States' Connecticut, 132lbs. (Kashichi) 0
Mr. News' Juliette, 132lbs. (Shindo) 0
Mr. Prince's Sybil, 132lbs. (Fukuhara) 0
Mr. Stun's Ermita, 132lbs. (Torada) 0

The Horses were very fractious, but were got away in fair shape at the fourth try except that Merrythought II was left badly behind the bunch. Red Leaf lead with Connecticut 2nd; at the Hill Red Leaf still lead, with Merrythought II second. At the Shakespeare Merrythought II took the lead holding it past the trees, but at the bend lost place, Little Eva coming out of the bunch to win by two lengths, with Merrythought II close behind and only half a length ahead of Red Leaf. Time, 1.59 1/10.

6. Class E.—For ALL SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES which have not won 8 races at date of entry.—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 75. Weight for Age, with 7lbs. deducted. Winners at date of entry to carry 2lbs. extra for each win. Distance One Mile.

Mr. M. C.'s Asahi II., 127lbs. (Hansawa) 1
Mr. Shigi's Katsuju, 135lbs. (Ebano) 2
Mr. Latham's Inaho, 136lbs. (Kanno) 3
Mr. Kanagawa's Shoten, 132lbs. (Tamazo) 0
Mr. T. Ishiura's Wagatomo, 142lbs. (Higaki) 0
Mr. T. Ishiura's Chigusa (late Hanabusa II.), 135lbs. (Mima) 0

The first try at a start seemed better than the start finally secured at the second attempt. Wagatomo was first away but lost place at once. Asahi II. led up the hill, with Chigusa second and Shoten third. At the top of the hill Inaho took 3rd place from Shoten and held it to the finish, Chigusa being replaced in second place by Katsuju. Asahi II won by two lengths. Time 1.57 3/10.

SECOND DAY, SATURDAY, 29TH OCTOBER, 1910.

Saturday's races brought out a much better attendance, among which was a large proportion of ladies. The races were well contested, the starting was much better and generally the day more enjoyable. His Highness, Prince Higashi-Fushimi honoured the occasion with his presence as the representative of His Majesty the Emperor. He was accompanied by Mr. Niva, Master of Ceremonies; Baron Sufu, Governor of Kanagawa Prefecture and Mr. Arakawa, Mayor of Yokohama.

THE EMPEROR'S CUP.

The most important event of the day was, of course, the race for the Emperor's cup. It was won by Mr. Fletcher's Woodbine, which ran second last year. Mr. Fletcher has tried very earnestly for this cup and it was a matter of general satisfaction to see him get it. The ceremony of the presentation took place immediately after the race, Mr. Niva handing it to Mr. Fletcher with a few words of congratulation on his success. Three cheers and a "tiger" were given for His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, followed by three and a tiger for the owner of the winning horse.

The following are the races in detail:—

1. Class D.—For ALL SUBSCRIPTION AUSTRALIAN

HORSES.—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 100. Weight 127lbs. Winners at date of entry to carry 2lbs. extra for each win, not exceeding 20lbs. in all. Winners at the Meeting excluded. Distance One Mile and a Quarter.

Mr. Kanagawa's Avant Garde, 147lbs. (Tamazo) 1
Mr. Sikk's Midzubo, 139lbs. (Shibata) 2
Mr. Kanagawa's Shooting Star, 143lbs. (Kawasaki) 3

Only three started from a list of eleven. They were got away in good shape. Mizubo led all the way round, followed at a couple of lengths by Avant Garde. At the home stretch the latter challenged and won by a length in the last hundred yards. Shooting Star was never in the race. Time 2.19.

2. Class B-A.—For N.R.C. SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES OF SPRING 1910.—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 75. Maidens at date of entry. Weight for Age. Winner of Race No. 5 First Day excluded. Distance One Mile.

Mr. Norfolk's Phroso, (late Himekumo), 131lbs. (Coffey) 1

Mr. Tandem's Merrythought II, 132lbs. (Sasaki) 2
Mr. Prince's Sybil, 132lbs. (Kawasaki) 3
Mr. States' Connecticut, 132lbs. (Apcar) 0
Mr. Canuck's Red Leaf, 132lbs. (Asahi) 0

Five started, all but two of the list. The starter's position was far from easy, but after much effort a fair start was made. Connecticut was left at the tape and was never in the race. Red Leaf led with Merrythought II. and Phroso third. These positions were held to the back straight when Sybil came up to third place, on to second and ran level with the leader. In the last furlong Phroso came again to the front to win by a clean length with Merrythought II. second and Sybil third. It was a very good race. Time 2.00 1/5.

3. Class E.—For ALL SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES which have not won 8 races at date of entry.—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 75. Weight for Age, with 7lbs. deducted. Winner at date of entry to carry 2lbs. extra for each win. Winner of Race No. 6 First Day excluded. Winner of Race No. 2 First Day, 7lbs. extra. Distance One Mile and a Furlong.

Mr. Monte Carlo's Bijou, 128lbs. (Hirayama) 1
Mr. M. Kimura's Young Japan, 140lbs. (Tsubouchi) 2
Mr. Shigi's Katsuju, 135lbs. (Ebano) 3
Mr. Kanagawa's Shoten, 132lbs. (Tamazo) 0
Mr. States' Navajo, 131lbs. (Kashichi) 0
Mr. T. Ishiura's Wagatomo, 142lbs. (Higaki) 0
Mr. T. Ishiura's Chigusa (late Hanabusa II.), 135lbs. (Mima) 0

A very good start—Shoten leading, but only by a neck. Passing the stand the horses ran prettily in a bunch. At the foot of the hill Shoten led with Wagatomo 2nd and Young Japan 3rd. Along the back Straight Young Japan passed to 2nd and ran neck and neck with Shoten. At the home straight Young Japan led with Shoten second. In the straight Bijou came up rapidly to win by half a length, Young Japan second and Katsuju 3rd. Time, 2.15 1/5.

4. Class A.—THE EMPEROR'S CUP—Presented by HIS MAJESTY THE EMPEROR. The Second to receive Yen 150. For N.R.C. Subscription Australian Horses and Japan Non-Subscription Country-bred Horses; Winners of 3 races at date of entry, Weight for Age; Winners of more than 3 races at date of entry 3lbs. extra for each win over 3 wins, not exceeding 15lbs. in all. Subscription Australian Horses in Japan for their Second Meetings, 3lbs. allowance; Horses that have started at previous Meetings but have not won a race, 5lbs. allowance, allowance accumulative; Subscription Australian Griffins, 12lbs. allowance; Winners after closing of entries to carry 5lbs. extra cumulative. Previous winners of Emperor's Cup under these conditions excluded. Distance One Mile.

Mr. Canuck's Woodbine, 137lbs. (Asahi) 1
Mr. Norfolk's Persephone, 143lbs. (Coffey) 2
Mr. R. Kimura's Banri, 137lbs. (Tsubouchi) 3
Mr. Kimura's Kamikaze, 132lbs. (Kawasaki) 0
Mr. T. Ishiura's Mitsubiki, 143lbs. (Igi) 0
Mr. Canuck's Blue Bonnets (late Midinette), 137lbs. (Pass) 0

All but one of a list of seven started for the Emperor's cup. The start was good although Persephone got badly left in getting away. Kamikaze led with Woodbine second and Blue Bonnets third. At the Shakespeare Persephone came up to the bunch. At the home straight Woodbine secured the lead, Persephone running second two lengths behind and Banri third. Time 1.49 1/5.

5. Class B.—For ALL N.R.C. SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES (Subscription Griffins of Autumn 1910 excluded).—Value Yen 300 and the Second to receive Yen 75. Weight for Age, with 7lbs. deducted. Winners at date of entry to carry 3lbs. extra for each win. Winner of Race No. 2 First Day excluded. Winner of Race No. 5 First Day, 7lbs. extra. Distance One Mile.

Mr. M. C.'s Asahi II., 128lbs. (Kawasaki) 1
Mr. Nile's Niagara, 128lbs. (Ebano) 2
Mr. Oswald's Little Eva (late Isami), 125lbs. (Hansawa) 3

Only three of a list of fourteen. After a pretty start Little Eva took the lead, losing at once to Asahi II. which led all the way around and won by 3 lengths held in by jockey, Niagara following an equal distance ahead of Little Eva.

6. Class C.—For N.R.C. SUBSCRIPTION COUNTRY-BRED HORSES OF AUTUMN 1910.—Value Yen 350 and the Second to receive Yen 100. Weight for Age, with 7lbs. deducted. Winners at the Meeting 12lbs. extra. Distance Three-Quarters of a Mile.

Mr. Norfolk's The Plug, 130lbs. (Coffey) 1
Mr. Nile's Kumoi II, 130lbs. (Hansawa) 2
Mr. Latham's Gold Blaze, 130lbs. (Kawasaki) 3
Mr. N. Kawakita's Benkei II., 130lbs. (Ebano) 0
Mr. States' Massachusetts, 130lbs. (Kashichi) 0
Mr. News' Romeo, 13 lbs. (Shindo) 0
Mr. Monte Carlo's Consequence, 13 lbs. (Hiroyama) 0

Mr. Prince's Schiller, 130lbs. (Fukuhara) 0
Mr. Stunt's Economist, 130lbs. (Asahi) 0
Mr. S. Minoda's Susumu, 130lbs. (Suginohara) 0
Mr. Tandem's Abunai, 130lbs. (Sasaki) 0

This was by far the most difficult start of the day. Eleven horses were entered. A slight rain had begun and the horses were very nervous, Romeo and Economist being especially fractious. Many tries were made and at last a very fair start was made. There was a little confusion just as the tape went up, one of the horses getting across the way of a couple of others, but in an instant it was away with a flying start and held it all the way around, being ridden well and hard every yard of the race. The race all the way round was between the three leaders, the others being left in a group by themselves. The Plug won by a couple of lengths, while a length separated Kumoi II second and Gold Blaze third. Time, 1.29 3/5.

This ended the official programme, but as a matter of amusement to the guests a hack race of China ponies was run, the prize being a diamond ring presented by a visitor, Mr. Briggs.

The distance was half-a-mile. There were seven starters, and the result was:—

Gemini, 160lbs. (Mr. Hawkins) 1
Old China, 160lbs. (Mr. Hardman) 2
Piccolo, 162lbs. (Mr. Reimers) 3
Smilax, 160lbs. (Mr. Mottu) 0
Malvolio, 160lbs. (Mr. Cox) 0
The Corporal, 160lbs. (Mr. de Courcy) 0
Astral, 160lbs. (Mr. Fisher) 0

The ponies got away well together. Malvolio soon, however obtained a lead, with Gemini second. Old China came up rapidly in the home straight and challenged the leader, but fell back again, Gemini winning by three lengths. Piccolo, who had come up in the straight, was third, a length in rear of the second horse.

After presentation of the ring three cheers were given for Mr. Briggs, who responded to the effect that nothing was more sportsmanlike than to see a gentleman ride his own horse and expressed the hope that this might be a step toward securing official recognition again for such a race at future meets.

THE CONCERT SEASON.

MUSIC AT THE DEUTSCHE HAUS.

Madame Julia and Mr. Fritz Röhr were responsible for an excellent concert at the Deutsche Haus on the evening of the first, which delighted a fairly large audience.

There is nothing but high praise for Madame Röhr,—her playing throughout the evening gave the hallmark of "artist," there being a welcome absence of mannerisms, with an equally welcome soundness in all her technique. A delightful interpretation was given of selections from Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt and Moszkowski—a proof of exceptional versatility. Madame Röhr gallantly went through a hard programme, having to accompany her husband in his songs in addition to her pianoforte recitals.

It was unfortunate that Herr Röhr was the victim of a bad cold which did not allow him to display the qualities of his voice to the best advantage. However, he gave a robust and clever performance in the Prologue of Leoncavallo, and made a success with Schumann's Grenadiers.

The whole programme deserves commendation for its high standard of artistic merit.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE DEFENDERS OF RATIONALISM.

(To the Editor of the "Japan Mail.")

SIR,—The sheaf of letters called forth by my recent article on Rationalism in Europe may be taken as on the whole a confirmation of the contention advocated in the article, and my reply may therefore be brief.

With "C" I agree that my article dwelt chiefly on the evils rather than the benefits of the French Revolution; but I felt justified in that, for the reason that the evils, I hold, were due largely to the Rationalistic movement: whereas, if the controlling force of the Revolution had been the moral power of rational religion, the awful enormities might have been avoided, and justice established without so much horror and crime. Because the movement became overwhelmingly Rationalistic it took practically the same turn as the Inquisition when it ceased to be religious and became a movement based on reason alone.

The letter signed "A Japanese Rationalist," which really makes out no case at all, is happily not representative of progressive Japan. The writer's continued intimation that Christianity is somehow inimical to the life of a nation, is most emphatically contradicted by the history of Christian countries; and to-day some of the greatest sovereigns of the world are members of the Christian Church.

With a good deal of what "A" has to say I am in partial agreement. Rationalism has no doubt done good in Europe, but because I believe the evil to have been greater than the good, I was bound to deal with that aspect of it. I never either said or suggested that all rationalists were bad; but I said and still say that the majority of those in the line of disorder and crime are rationalists in creed, or if you like, have no creed, and "A" has attempted no proof to the contrary. The assertion that my article was a "vituperative attack" on unbelievers is purely gratuitous. I did nothing more than give a recount of the main facts of history so far as they show the influence of Rationalism on Europe, but no attack was either made, or intended to be made, on any one.

The letter subscribed "X.Y.Z." is not to be classed in the same category with the others. A writer that so far forgets the rules of courtesy, or even common politeness, as to drag in the name of a private citizen for attack, without adhering to the duty of signing his own name, is of a creed that requires no reply from any one. The man who takes the liberty of mentioning the name of a private citizen for reproach in the public press without signing his own name to the charge is no gentleman, if he will allow me to say so. That however is no affair of mine, except so far as to point out merely that he descends to this discourtesy merely to obscure the issue by uncalled-for personalities. The public will doubtless judge, however, that this is a matter in which names are worthless. The facts of history must rest on themselves and not on the names of those who rehearse them. I hold that Rationalism in Europe is responsible for the evils of which my recent article gave a brief résumé; that what Rationalism has done in the past it is doing still, and will do again in any country where it is given free course without religion to act as a preservative against it; and no array of names selected from among the missionaries of Rationalism in Tokyo and Yokohama can change either the facts of history or the opinion of those familiar with the facts of history. I venture to say that there is not one of those mentioned who would be willing to say that he was a better or nobler man for the moral influence that Rationalism has had over him. Their virtues they owe to the religion of their mothers, than whom they may now claim to be so much wiser; but I for one would prefer to take my chances with the movement supported by the great and noble women of the world. Every man may freely admit his possibility of unconscious deterioration. I do so myself, though I am conscious of fighting, as far as I know how, against it. So also I am persuaded that every movement calculated to lessen man's realization of the presence of the Creator and His reality in human life, is bound in the end to cause a deterioration of humanity; and I hold that one proof of this, though many could be named, is that the majority of those against the progress of the world, those who have fallen into the line of deterioration, are persons of no creed; in other words, Rationalists, since the Rationalists are the leaders among those who say there is no God and religion is nonsense. However, the true Rationalist is the man whose reason teaches him that there is a God that judges the earth, and who agrees with the wise man that wrote: "The fool hath said in his heart, there is no God."

RUSSO-CHINESE BANKS.

(To the Editor of the "Japan Mail.")

SIR,—With reference to your article in to-day's daily under the heading 'Russo-Chinese-Banks' kindly note that the new Bank's name is not 'Bank of Russia' but Russo-Asiatic-Bank, as has been advertised in your paper for exactly a week.

For your guidance the Bank of Russia established in Russia is the State Bank, an official Bank, while our institution is entirely a private commercial Bank.

We are, Sir, yours faithfully,

TURNING POINT IN HUMAN HISTORY.

(To the Editor of the "Japan Mail.")

Mr. A. H. Baynes, Hon. Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, quoted the view of the World's Missionary Conference that the Turning point of Human History would occur within 10 years. This is a stupendous statement on the top of Universal Unrest and deserves much pondering and praying.

All who watch the world to-day, and its progress agree that China is the biggest problem. It is no longer the sleeping giant of the past, but is wide awake. When he moves he has not a retinue of tens of millions as European Sovereigns have, but a retinue of hundreds of millions and, practically, one race and of one language. During the last ten years he has put out his ten league boots and is making gigantic strides in education, in communication, in Provincial Assemblies, in a National Assembly and in other ways. Wonder of wonders! he has made a master stroke in International Politics, for without the increase of Armaments, which bankrupts European Kingdoms, he has secured pledges from all the leading nations that they will maintain the integrity of China.

If this great mass of humanity goes wrong, then we shall have trouble among all the nations; if it goes right, then all the world will reap incalculable blessings. The establishment of Universities on Christian lines is an excellent thing for a distant future, but these Universities cannot turn out students fit to be leading statesmen in China under twenty years; while the force of circumstances will compel China to reconstruct many of her institutions within ten years.

As China does not at present possess sufficient Chinese enlightened in world politics, there is a great need of showing the solidarity of the human race and brotherhood of man by friendly help. God gives opportunity of rendering this help and thereby deciding whether coming China shall be Christian, Non-Christian, or Anti-Christian; whether it will study the good of all nations or only the good of China at the expense of others?

This help cannot be rendered so much by a large increase of the number of Missionaries as by a new adjustment of our present Missionaries by which a far far more efficient and speedier work can be carried on. This can be done in two ways:

1. By the promotion of able workers from positions where they can only reach thousands to positions where they can reach millions through the press and translation of the best books into Chinese.

2. By organizing the 4000 expectant Officials of China who are now assistant Officials and have little to do, into a systematic home study of the great Universal problems of our day and have the Governors of each province examine their subordinates once a year. In ten years when they shall be in a leading position themselves they will have mastered the main lines of Universal Progress and will be in a position to develop China in harmony with what will be the best for all mankind and help to establish the Kingdom of God on earth.

This scheme has been in operation on a small scale by the Christian Literature Society for 20 years. Considering that less than a dozen men were set apart to cover this immense geographical and intellectual field, the results have been surprising. Millions have been changed by it. If instead of a dozen working on this line we had half the number set apart by each Society for educational work or half the number set apart for Medical work, i.e., eight choice men from each of the leading Missions we would then be in a position where our numbers could fairly grapple with the whole problem with a hope of success within 10 years. Having been commissioned by the Christian Literature Society for China when coming to Edinburgh Conference to get all the help and coöperation I could from all the Missionary Societies in Europe and America, I now most respectfully address all the Missionary Societies in China at work, to prayerfully consider this Turning point in Human History lay it before their respective Societies, and kindly reply how far they can coöperate.

I have the honour to remain, Dear Brother, Yours faithfully,

(Signed) TIMOTHY RICHARD,
Shanghai.

TELEGRAMS.

(REUTER'S SERVICE.)

THE PERSIAN QUESTION.

London, October, 27.

An inspired Berlin telegram to the Hamburger Nachrichten says that German official circles are officially unaware of the Constantinople telegram to the Kaiser, and emphasises the fact that the majority at the meeting were Persians. There is no question of German intervention in Persia.

ACCIDENT TO BRITISH AIRSHIP.

M. Lebaudy in the airship presented to the nation by the Morning Post, journeyed from Moissons to Aldershot in 315 minutes.

The airship was almost completely housed when a girder ripped the envelope. The frame work was not hurt.

DELAY OF GERMAN BATTLESHIP CONSTRUCTION.

London, October 28.

Great interest is excited by the statement of a Naval Correspondent of the Daily Telegraph that owing to the Admiralty's adoption of 13.5 inch guns for the eleven latest Dreadnoughts, German designs must be reconsidered which will consequently delay the programme. The extent to which they will be retarded is uncertain but must inevitably be considerable.

A MOSQUE IN LONDON.

Subscriptions are coming in for the erection of a Mosque in London. There is a growing need owing to the increasing number of Oriental students and visitors. There will also be a library and lecture room for the discussion of all subjects except politics.

BYE-ELECTION IN ENGLAND.

At South Shields bye-election, Russel Rea, the Liberal candidate, obtained 7,929 votes; Vaughan Williams, the Unionist candidate, 4,910. A straight fight for tariff reform was the main question.

THE EXHIBITION BANQUET.

The Duke of Norfolk presided at a banquet to celebrate the success of the Anglo-Japanese exhibition. Lord Kitchener was present. Replying to congratulations by the Duke of Norfolk, Ambassador Kato dwelt upon the fact that Japan's aim in the exhibition was to prove herself industrious and peace loving and not merely war-like. Letters of congratulation were read from Prince Fushimi, Prince Arthur of Connaught and Baron Oura.

THE KAISER'S VISIT TO BRUSSELS

EXTRAORDINARY PRECAUTIONS.

London, October 28.

During the Kaiser's departure from Brussels yesterday evening the greatest precautions were taken. On the way to the station all windows along the route were ordered to be closed and the railway was guarded.

The e precautions were prompted by a letter which arrived at the Palace purporting to be signed by a dangerous Brussels anarchist, and saying that the Kaiser would be bombed.

BRITAIN BUYS THE CLEMENT BAYARD AIRSHIP.

The British Government has acquired the Clement-Bayard airship, which recently made a successful flight over the Channel.

Later

Eighteen thousand pounds sterling was the price paid for the Clement-Bayard flying machine. The owners asked £25,000 but came down to the price paid. The War Office offered £12,500 and the remainder was subscribed by the Parliamentary Aerial Committee.

A "POLITICAL STRIKE" IN GREECE.

London, October 29.

A curious situation has arisen in Greece. A sort of political strike is now on, all the opposition parties asserting that M. Venizelos is overriding the will of the Chamber. They have resolved to put forward no candidates in the forthcoming general elections.

SCOTTISH HOME RULE.

The Scottish National Committee has issued a manifesto appealing to Scotsmen throughout the world for funds to achieve Scottish home rule.

THE TURKISH LOAN.

London, October 30.

Practically all the important German banks are represented in the Turkish loan syndicate, considering its successful flotation by Germany a patriotic duty.

A NEW AERONAUTIC RECORD.

Etampes.—The aviator Labulet (?) has flown 288 miles in six hours—a world's record.

CROWN PRINCE'S POLICE ESCORT.

London, October 31.

Berlin.—At the Crown Prince's wish, only three officials of the Berlin detective force travel with him.

TURKEY HAS PAID FOR BATTLESHIPS.

The Berlin Post states that Turkey has paid the purchase price of Eighteen million marks for two recently acquired German Battleships.

PORTUGAL'S DICTATOR INDICTED.

Lisbon.—Franco, the ex-Dictator of Portugal has been indicted for abuse of power and has given bail.

BRITISH TROOPS LANDED IN PERSIA.

Bushire —Owing to a threatened raid at Lingah by a force of 3,000 tribesmen and to the inability of the local authorities to protect foreigners the British warship Fox has landed 100 men at Lingah.

BRITISH GUNS AND WORLD'S NAVAL CONSTRUCTION.

London, October 31.

Replying to an inquiry made by the Daily Mail with reference to the alleged delay in the construction of war ships by Germany, the Admiralty are refusing to give any information with respect to armament. The Admiralty stated that the rate of construction laid down for the Navy could be maintained, and added that in view of the universal confidence in the work of our guns Great Britain's step was received with greater equanimity than the English newspapers represented.

At the same time it would be widely regarded as involving increased displacement and higher cost of construction, and Germany and other nations must sooner or later follow suit, as had been the case when Great Britain introduced the Dreadnought.

THE DUKE OF CONNAUGHT.

London, November 1.

The Duke of Connaught has arrived in South Africa to open the Union parliament.

PERSIA.

The cruiser Fox landed from 100 to 160 men with four guns at Lingah, at the request of the Deputy Governor and British Vice-consul, for the protection of the inhabitants from a threatened raid.

The Persian Government thereupon sent a note to the British Minister demanding the immediate withdrawal of the bluejackets. To this the Minister replied that they would be withdrawn as soon as orderly conditions were restored.

SENHOR FRANCO.

Lisbon.—Senhor Franco's bail of a million francs was immediately forthcoming.

RAT CRUSADE IN SUFFOLK.

London, November 1.

The rat extermination crusade in Suffolk is extending as plague infected animals are being found throughout a wider area. It is estimated that ten thousand rats on an average are being killed daily. Ailing domestic cats are also being destroyed, as some have been found to be infected.

PERSIA.

Later.

Teheran.—The Persian Government has paid in advance a quarterly instalment of the ex-Shah's allowance, as a result of a joint Anglo-Russian note insisting on payment.

THE TSAR'S TOUR.

M. Sazonoff, the Russian Foreign Minister, with two high officials left for Darmstadt and then Potsdam, in view of the forthcoming visit of the Tsar to the Kaiser.

THE PERSIAN REGENT.

London, November 1.

Reuter understands that Nasir el Mulk the Persian Regent-elect has left London en route for Persia, having previously received satisfactory assurances from various parties at Teheran as to the non-party character of his election.

LIEUT. SUTOR.

The Official Gazette states that Lieut. Sutor has been removed from the army.

LORD MORLEY RESIGNS.

London, November 2.

The Irish Times states that Lord Morley has intimated to Mr. Asquith his wish to retire. Lord Crewe will succeed him. Reuter inquiring at the India Office was informed that they had no announcement to make. The Daily Chronicle says that the report is undoubtedly correct.

(BY SPECIAL ARRANGEMENT WITH THE TOKYO "ASAHI SHIMBUN.")

CLOSING OF THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

London, October 28.

At a dinner, given at the Garden Club, to celebrate the success of the exhibition, which is to close on Saturday, there was a markedly unanimous expression of opinions, by the distinguished persons present, to the effect that important results had already been attained. The President, the Duke of Norfolk, emphasized the energy of the Japanese character. He was loudly cheered when he referred to the appreciation shown by Japan in her movement to draw the two empires closer together from a commercial standpoint. Letters read from six of the great retail merchants of London, testifying to the value of the exhibition were regarded as most interesting communications. Repeated cheers greeted the speech of Mr. Kato declaring that the Japanese were inspired by laudable ambitions in the direction of culture and that their actions have shown them not unworthy of intimate friendship with the British.

DISTURBANCES IN URUGUAY.

London, October 29.

Monte Video.—The situation in Uruguay is most serious. The Revolutionists, gathering at the frontiers, have cut most of the wires. The Government is despatching troops. The rising is due to the objection of the Government to the popular candidate for the presidency.

ALBANIAN REFUGEES.

Montenegro has circularized the Powers, pointing out its difficulty in maintaining the great number of the Albanian refugees who had fled to escape mal-treatment from the Turkish military authorities.

ELECTION CAMPAIGN IN THE UNITED STATES.

Washington.—Some disheartening election campaign reports are reaching the Cabinet. The possibility of a Democratic landslide is admitted even in Republican quarters.

WILD DEBATE IN FRENCH CHAMBER.

London, October 31.

Paris.—There has been a long excited strike debate in the Chamber, which resulted in a crushing defeat for the Socialists and Anarchists. On the final appeal by the Premier for support, his perfect nerve, firmness and coolness in the presence of the wild storm of Socialism and denunciation, was remarkable.

NEW REVOLUTION IN SOUTH AMERICA.

Montevideo.—10,000 armed revolutionists are concentrating.

TURKEY AND BULGARIA.

London, November 1.

Constantinople.—The organ of the Young Turks publishes a violent attack upon Bulgaria.

THE GERMAN ESTIMATES.

Berlin.—The Imperial estimates for 1911 will probably show a deficit of 5 million sterling, necessitating borrowing.

RUSSIAN FOREIGN POLICY.

Later.

St. Petersburg.—With reference to disquieting Press rumours as to possible fluctuations of Russian foreign policy, it is now learned authoritatively that the coming interview between the Tsar and the Kaiser does not furnish any reason for alarm to the friends of the Anglo-Russian agreement.

EDITOR OF "NOVOE VREMYA" ARRESTED.

The Editor of the Novoe Vremya is charged with high treason for reproducing a plan of the coast fortifications.

THE STOCK EXCHANGE.

Japanese bonds are from $\frac{1}{8}$ to $\frac{1}{4}$ higher, Russians are weaker.

NEW YORK.

The strike is increasing, and the city is now under martial law. Each wagon is crowded, and the congestion of goods and luggage is enormous.

THE AMERICAN-CHINESE LOAN.

London, November 2.

Washington.—Though the question of the security of the Chinese loan remains unsettled there is reason to believe that the United States intends to suggest the appointment of an American adviser at Peking to ensure its proper expenditure, such advice to be occupied exclusively with the problems of currency reform to which it is stipulated the majority of the loan is to be devoted.

THE VISITORS TO THE ANGLO-JAPANESE EXHIBITION.

The visitors to the Anglo-Japanese exhibition totalled 8,350,000.

AVIATION IN RUSSIA.

St. Petersburg.—The War Minister has introduced a bill instituting a special aviation Committee.

CHINA AND THE DALAI LAMA.

Bombay.—The Chinese envoy in Tibet has interviewed the Dalai Lama without any result. The Lama's Ministers consider that the envoy was not of sufficiently high rank.

SOCIALISTS AND THE FRENCH GOVERNMENT.

Paris.—A Socialist parliamentary plot proposed to overthrow the Government and frame a coalition on the lines of the old bloc to dictate the composition of the new ministry.

The new deputies were frightened by the spectre of a dictatorship and the possibility of arrest, and the plot failed.

THE TSAR'S VISIT.

Berlin, October 27.

The Tsar will arrive on his visit to Potsdam on the morning of Nov. 4th. On the evening of that day a banquet in his honour will be given. On the following day the monarchs will go on a hunting trip, at the conclusion of which the Tsar will return to Wolfsgarten. M. Sazonow, the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, will be at the meeting, and at his own wish, will have conferences with the Chancellor and Herr Kiderlen-Waechter, the German Minister for Foreign Affairs.

TREATY WITH JAPAN.

The Committee for preparing a new Treaty of Commerce with Japan has been summoned for November 8th.

THE KAISER AT BRUSSELS.

A grand reception has been given to the Kaiser and Kaiserin at the City Hall by the Municipality of Brussels, on the occasion of which the Kaiser delivered an address to the assembly.

THE CASE OF COUNTESS TARNOWSKA.

The Higher Court at Rome has rejected the appeal of Countess Tarnowska, who had been sentenced to many years' imprisonment by the First Court for having caused the death of her husband.

RELATIONS WITH PERSIA.

Berlin, October 28.

The rumour that Turkey has strengthened her army on the frontier of Persia in reply to the action of Russia and Great Britain is reported to be unfounded. London reports state that, according to travellers who have returned from Teheran, the new Regent of Persia intends to open political negotiations with the Berlin Government as to the situation. This report is officially contradicted at Berlin.

Abdul Hamid, the ex-Sultan of Turkey, is seriously ill.

AUSTRIA.

Count Paul Esterhazy has been nominated successor to Count Khevenhueller-Metsch, late Austrian Ambassador to Paris.

GERMANY.

The Kaiser and Kaiserin have returned to Wildpark near Potsdam from their successful visit to Brussels.

THE BUDGET.

Berlin, October 30.

The value of the internal loan required to make up the deficit in the German Budget is only 100 million Marks and not 150 millions, as previously supposed.

THE CRETAN QUESTION.

M. Venizelos, the new President of the Greek National Assembly and Prime Minister, will make strong efforts to come to an understanding with Turkey as to the Cretan Question.

FRANCE.

Herr von Scheen, the new German Ambassador to Paris and former Minister for Foreign Affairs, has been received in introductory audience by President Falieres, who assured him of his wish to maintain good relations with Germany.

RUSSIA.

The Duma has opened its new session.

INDIA.

Sir Harold Stuart, K. C. V. O., Chief of the Indian Central Criminal Intelligence Department at Simla, has been appointed to accompany the German Crown Prince on his tour through India.

[Sir Harold Stuart, who has been appointed by the British Government to accompany the Crown Prince of Germany on his tour to the Far East, is well known for his service as First Director of the Indian Central Criminal Intelligence Department, having occupied the post since 1904.]

SIBERIAN MAILS.

Siberian mails, with dates up to October 5th and 15th ex Yokohama, arrived at Berlin on October 28th and 30th.

RIOTS IN BERLIN.

Berlin, October 31.

New riots have been raised by striking workmen in the northern part of Berlin, but were suppressed by strong measures taken by the police, all remaining quiet yesterday.

THE KAISER.

A report from London, according to which the Kaiser is said to intend to carry out a new visit to Palestine, is officially contradicted at Berlin.

SWITZERLAND.

Jean Henri Dunant, the originator of the Red Cross Society, is dead at Geneva at the advanced age of 82 years.

THE EX-DICTATOR.

The former Portuguese Dictator, Senhor Franco, has been arrested by order of the new Government, but afterwards released on bail. He is accused of having exceeded his power in his former position; the case, however, has nothing to do with the present situation.

RUSSIA.

M. Sazonow, the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, has gone to Darmstadt from St. Petersburg, via Berlin, to meet the Tsar, with whom he will travel to Potsdam on Nov. 4th.

THE CROWN PRINCE'S TOUR.

Berlin, November 1.

Herr von Jagow, the German Ambassador at Rome, has gone to Genoa, where he will receive the German Crown Prince and Crown Princess on their arrival at that port. The departure from Genoa will take place on the afternoon of Nov. 3rd on board the Nordd. Lloyd Liner Prinz Ludwig. The tour from Genoa to Colombo will be of a purely private character. Count von Bismarck-Bohlen, the Master of Ceremonies of the Crown Prince, will arrive at Colombo in the beginning of December and will later accompany the Crown Princess back to Germany.

No official representative of the Press will be in the suite of the Crown Prince, but several journalists will accompany him and his tour, amongst whom are Captain Dannhauer of the Berlin Lokal Anzeiger, Paul Liudenberg and others. The departure of the Crown Prince and Crown Princess from the Anhalter Station at Berlin was carried out without any ceremonial.

The Military Gazette expresses the best wishes of the Army for a successful result of the tour.

The following is the programme of the tour of the Crown Prince to the Far East:—

The Crown Prince and Crown Princess will arrive at Port Said on Nov. 8th, at Colombo on Nov. 29th. Both will stay three weeks in Ceylon incognito as Count and Countess Ravensberg. The Crown Prince will leave Colombo for Bombay on board the German cruiser Gneisenau on December 11th. The tour through India will be extended over two months and will enable the Crown Prince to see the most notable places throughout India.

He will depart in the middle of February from Calcutta to Singapore, where he will stay three days, and from thence he will carry out a visit, lasting one week, to Bangkok. From Bangkok he will go to Batavia and stay one week in Java. The arrival at Hongkong will take place in the middle of March and the sojourn at Hongkong and Canton will last five days. He will arrive at Peking on April 10th for a sojourn of ten days, and afterwards leave for Japan, where he will arrive on April 25th at Yokohama and will stay in Japan for fourteen days.

The return voyage will be carried out via Siberia in the middle of May.

The suite of the Crown Prince will consist of the following gentlemen: Count Dohna, Minister von Treutler, Major Solms, Lieutenants von Zobeltitz and Count Finckenstein, Chief Surgeon Professor Widenmann and Secretary Sommer.

The suite of the Crown Princess consists of the following ladies: Countess Tiele-Winckler and Countess Grotz.

The British Government has ordered the following officers to accompany the Crown Prince on his tour through India, Sir Harold Arthur Stuart, Colonel Arthur Roberts, Captains Arthur Dick and Roylance Jelf and Cavalry Captain Richard Alexander Steel.

THE RUSSIAN FOREIGN MINISTER.

M. Sazonow, the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, has arrived at Berlin on his way to Darmstadt and has taken up residence at the palace of Count Osten-Sacken, the Russian Ambassador. He dined with the German Chancellor and Minister for Foreign Affairs, with whom he arranged the programme for the coming meeting of the Tsar and Kaiser.—The German Press welcomes M. Sazonow in a cordial manner and expresses the hope of a more pacific Russian policy in the future, coupled with more consideration for the central Powers of Europe.

THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN ROME.

Monsignore Fruehwirth, the Papal Nuntius at Muencheon, has gone to Rome to confer with the Pope as to the situation of German Catholicism, no other reasons, as for example the promotion to a higher rank, existing.

PERSIA.

New troubles are reported from Shiraz, Persia. The Russian Ministerial Council has, therefore, decided not to withdraw the Russian troops from Persia.

DEATH OF BISHOP TURNER.

It is with profound regret that we record the death of the Rt. Rev. Bishop Turner, D.D., of the English Church here, which sad event took place at St. Luke's Hospital on Friday afternoon. His remains will be brought to Seoul on Monday by the train reaching West-Gate Station at 4 p.m. and will be taken to the English Church in Chong Tong where the first part of the funeral service will be held at 10 a.m. on Tuesday. The deceased first arrived in Korea about fourteen years ago in December 1896 to engage in evangelistic work under the Rt. Rev. Bishop Corfe. He was every inch an English gentleman, upright in character, profound in faith, kindly and genial, and with unbounded sympathy for all in grief or pain. He had always smiles and a cheering word, to greet his friends, who loved and respected him as the highest type of a Christian gentleman. His love for Koreans was great and he worked incessantly for their spiritual good. The last time the writer saw him, Bishop Turner spoke about the blind in Chosen. Finding that the writer was also very much interested in the question he was greatly delighted and hoped that he might discuss the subject with him more particularly on some not far distant day and work out a plan for helping and educating the Korean blind. It is with heartfelt sorrow that the writer has forever lost the opportunity of rendering what little help he could to the Bishop in the good work he had in view.

Bishop Turner was born in England in 1862. He was educated at Marlborough and Oxford and ordained deacon in 1887 and priest in 1888. His first curacy was in Wellington, Oxon, which he held till 1889 and then went to Downton, Wilts. In 1891 he went as curate to St. Nicholas Cathedral, Newcastle-on-Tyne, from which city he came to this country at the end of 1896. On Jan 25, 1905, he was consecrated Bishop in Korea. He was President of the Korean Y.M.C.A. in Seoul and rendered great service in bringing the association to its present condition of prosperity and influence. He entered St. Luke's Hospital about seven weeks ago suffering from blood poisoning. At one time to the relief of his many friends he was reported to be progressing towards recovery. Their hope, however, proved to be but short-lived, for his strength gradually gave out. His end came peacefully at 4.30 on the afternoon of the 29th inst.—Seoul Press.

ENGLAND'S ARMY.

NOT FIRST-CLASS ACCORDING TO COL. GAEDKE.

Berlin, October 14.

"As a land Power England has dropped out of the ranks of first-class military Powers," concludes Colonel Gädke's review of "England's mercenary Army" in today's Tageblatt. Discussing the recent Army manoeuvres in England Colonel Gädke says:

"The British Army is not only numerically incapable of throwing any sort of decisive weight in the balance in a Continental war, but is moreover deficient in the military training of its troops and in the understanding of its leaders for the tasks which a great war would impose upon them.

"For a war against uncivilised peoples, for the retention of India, or for intervention in Tibet or Afghanistan, English troops are undoubtedly splendidly fitted. Their great moral qualities—courage, cool-headedness—equip them in a high degree for such operations. But these qualities, even in the early stages of the Boer war, failed, perhaps more on account of inefficient leadership than because of the troops' own training.

"It is my impression, after attending the recent manoeuvres near Salisbury, that the British Army, as far as its value and ability are concerned, has not changed much since the South African war. This strikes me as true notwithstanding that the material for soldiers which Britain possesses, as well as her raw material for officers, is eminently good—the peer of any in the world.”

LACK OF COÖPERATION.

Colonel Gädke says that the commanders of the British Army have no idea of handling troops in masses, and the Army itself, instead of being organised as a whole and welded together for the work of war, is an aggregation of single battalions. There is no proper coöperation between the firing and the attacking lines, and the supports and reserves. Each battalion fights for itself without considering what is going on to the right or left of it.

Most astounding of all, however, Colonel Gädke declares, were the decisions of the umpires. These were so glaringly irreconcilable with what must have happened in accordance with the real position of events, and were so flatly in defiance of all the possibilities of war, that thoroughly unsound tactical theories must be ascribed to the British generals.

THE MINERAL WEALTH OF THE ISLAND OF SAKHALIN.

According to recent researches by a Danish engineer, embodied in a report by the Danish Consul-General at Shanghai, the island of Sakhalin appears to be rich in several minerals, amongst them coal, perhaps, more especially. Coal is apparently found all over the island, although it is as yet impossible to state in how large quantities. Judging from the innumerable veins, which on the west coast can be traced right into the sea and along all rivers and heights, it may be asserted with some certainty that the island is immensely rich in coal. The engineer in question has himself travelled over considerable portions of Sakhalin, and had the opportunity of questioning a number of natives and criminal prisoners, who, better than others, know the interior of the country. They have told him of places where coal was to be found in large quantities, and these statements he has afterwards himself verified. Coal has, for instance, been found right up to the surface at Pilevo, latitude 50 deg.; at Pjeverjaretska, 10 miles north of Pilevo; at Agnivo, latitude 51 deg.; at Due, 15 miles south of Alexandrowsky; and along the coast and the rivers there are distinct layers of coal-dust which has been carried with the ice from the mountains to the coast. Especially some 10 miles from Agnivo, where the River Agnivo joins the Amber, he found, on the information of the native Gilliaks, rich deposits of coal. Veins of pure coal, 5 ft. to 7 ft. in thickness, go right to the surface, and the natives stated that the mountain was full of coal. Coal-mining has been carried on at Sakhalin ever since the Russians appeared in the island, but only on a very modest scale, and in a very primitive way. At Due a coal mine has been worked for thirty years without any other plant than a winch and a primitive engine, which obtained steam from an old ship's boiler. This mine has now been sold to a company, which is going to exploit it rationally.

The old Government mines are located half-way between Due and Alexandrowsky, where the criminals were employed up to the time of the Russo-Japanese War. It was from these mines that the Russian Pacific fleet obtained coal, but the mines have not been worked since the war. North of Alexandrowsky there are several coal deposits, such as the Wladimirsky and Adamoffsky, where Russian Government engineers the last year or two have been surveying.

Coal from Pilevo and Agnivo has been analysed in Shanghai and Hongkong, and found to be superior to best Welsh coal, leaving only 3 per cent. ashes. Its superior quality is well known to captains and ships' engineers in the East, and the Norwegian boats trading over Kamchatka and Alaska never coal in Japan, but wait till they get to Sakhalin and then go into Due. All are unanimous that the Sakhalin coals are better than any other kind of coal in the East Asiatic market. The Shangtung and Tongchang coal require washing; which is unnecessary with the Sakhalin coal.

The island also appears to be rich in petroleum. The Russo-Chinese Bank has financed an expedition to a place called Tchaiwo, on the bay of the same name. According to the report of this expedition the borings undertaken, although they were neither numerous nor deep, brought considerable quantities of petroleum to the surface, and a subsequent more scientific examination undertaken by Russian geologists confirmed this result, and it was the general impression of these scientists that vast subterranean petroleum reservoirs are to be found along the whole of the East Coast of Sakhalin. As the petroleum in some places is only come upon at a depth of 400 ft., the research entails considerable expense.

The Russo-Chinese Bank has secured a concession for the petroleum springs at Tchaiwo, and from what so far has appeared the concern looks most promising; installations on a comprehensive scale have been made, and there is an excellent natural harbour. Other discoveries of immensely rich petroleum springs have recently been reported.

Large deposits of salt have also recently been discovered by Russian geologists in the northern districts of Sakhalin, where salt is stated to be found in clear crystals in immense quantities.

LABOUR LEADER'S DEMAND.

IMMEDIATE REVERSAL OF THE OSBORNE JUDGMENT.

London, October 13.

An ultimatum to the Government on the subject of the Osborne judgment was uttered by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald, Labour M.P. for Leicester, in a speech at Croydon on the 12th ult.

“The only question before the country at the present moment,” he said, “is: ‘What are the Government going to do to remedy the injustice to the trade unions by the Osborne judgment? If the trade Government are under any misapprehension on the question, that misapprehension will be removed within twenty-four hours of the reassembling of Parliament on November 15. We must insist on the immediate reversal of the judgment.’”

So far as the Labour Party and the majority of the trade unionist electors in this country were concerned, Mr. Ramsay MacDonald said, that was the overwhelming and overshadowing question. Unless they had a broad and easy way paved up to the House of Commons upon which workingmen candidates could walk, and unless their maintenance in the House of Commons was made sure and certain, it would make no difference to them whether they were governed by the House of Lords and the House of Commons or by the House of Commons only.

The question of supreme consequence to them in the reconstruction of the constitutional machinery of this country was: Is there to be a place—broad, ample, and secure—provided in the Constitution for labour representation? Nothing else was of the least significance.

A.B.C. ALLIANCE.

ARGENTINA, BRAZIL, AND CHILI.

London, October 12.

The South American newspapers are all commenting on a speech by the Argentine Minister for Foreign Affairs, who, referring to the fraternity between Chili, Argentina, and Brazil, said: “We are the three strongest nations. We must direct South America on the path of peace and progress. Other countries will see a powerful guarantee for liberty and justice in this triple friendship.”

The newspapers think the speech foreshadows the political union of the three nations.

The “A.B.C. Alliance,” as it is called in South America from the initials of the three partners, would be, in the opinion of the London Mail, an important naval and military factor in world politics. Brazil has two Dreadnoughts built, and one, the largest warship in the world, building in England. The Argentine has two ships of 27,000 tons building in the United States. Chili is preparing to order a Dreadnought. The Argentine has an army of 18,000 men on the peace footing, Brazil 29,000, and Chili 11,000. Thus an alliance would have six Dreadnoughts, and armies with a peace strength of 58,000 men and a war strength of 500,000.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

ADVICES from Peshawar (says a Times telegram) state that the situation on the Frontier is becoming somewhat serious, owing not only to the continuance of the direct encouragement of raiding outlaws by Afghan officials at Khot, but to a sinister attempt now being made by certain high personages at Kabul to stir up trouble among the tribes, notably the Afridis, who are already sufficiently sore against the British because of their interference with the arms traffic. It is anticipated that there may be trouble after Ramadan. Doubtless representations are being made to the Ameer, who is apparently ignorant of the true state of affairs.

DISCUSSING the future of Canada and its relations with the Mother Country, Mr. Wade, a Canadian K. C., speaking to a London audience, said that there were tremendous problems which would have to be solved shortly. The question of the annexation of Canada to the United States was often propounded to him, in the most casual way, by Englishmen, who asked whether it was true that there was such an idea. In Canada the question would be taken as a downright insult. He said that, not out of any disrespect for the United States, but because it was inconceivable that such a great country as Canada could ever throw away its achievements and take refuge under the wing of another country.

The Times, referring to the forthcoming tour of the Crown Prince of Germany in the Far East, observes that if “the German Emperor had known the Far East at first-hand he would probably have avoided those occasional misconceptions of Asiatic ambitions disclosed in the earlier year of his reign. ‘There is not the slightest reason to suppose,’ continues the journal, ‘that the present ideals of the awakening East will include any form of militant aggression outside the Asiatic continent. The more general diffusion of prosperity among the peoples of Asia will be ultimately beneficial to Europe, because it implies an expansion of international commerce.’ The Times suggests that Great Britain should share with India the expense of entertaining the Crown Prince.

“MR. GEORGE MIREs, of Marsham Street, Maidstone, who was for many years an insurance agent, his earnings averaging about £1 a week and who used to boast that his total expenditure had never exceeded 10s. a week, died on Aug. 10 last,” says the Times. “aged seventy-eight years, leaving estate of the gross value of £4560 4s. 11d., with net personalty £4167 16s. 5d. He left £10 to each of the tenants of the twelve almshouses in Mote Road, Maidstone, a man and his wife resident in any almshouse taking the sum equally; £5 to each of the tenants of Corral's Almshouses, Maidstone, the children of any parents resident in the almshouses not to be considered as tenants; £100 each to the Maidstone Soup Kitchen, the West Kent General Hospital, Maidstone, and the Ophthalmic Hospital, Maidstone, and to other charities bequeathed all that was left.

THE total number of deaths caused by snake-bite in the different provinces of India during 1909 was 21,363 (as against 19,738 in 1908)—a not very insignificant number. It would therefore be interesting to note the results of the treatment of snake-bite with permanganate of potash in Bengal during the year. The Sanitary Commissioner for Bengal, in his annual report of the department under his charge for 1909, says that the Government sanctioned the supply of permanganate lancets to Civil Surgeons for free distribution to such persons as might be expected to under stand and appreciate the use of those instruments in the treatment of snake-bites. Nearly 70 dozens of these lancets were distributed during the year. In Burdan several barbers were taught the use of permanganate of potash in cases of snake-bite, and it is reported that two of them successfully treated two cases. Out of 59 cases treated during the year with permanganate of potash, in 50 cases the patients recovered; the failure in the remaining cases being chiefly due to the fact that the patients were not brought for treatment till they were in a moribund condition. Besides these, we are told, three cases were treated with anti venene in Patna, Darbhanga and Hazaribagh, with successful results.

SHOCKING ECZEMA FROM A PIMPLE

Seemed Insignificant but Soon Baby was in Terrible Condition—
Scratched and Cried with Pain—
Mother Feared He Would Die.

WHOLLY CURED BY CUTICURA REMEDIES

"My baby was three weeks old when he had eczema on his face. It was a little pimple at first and we did not take any notice of it until he scratched it and made it bleed. The next morning it came on his face worse and I took him to the Hospital and they told me it was eczema, but it was nothing to be afraid of and they gave me a note to take to the chemist to buy a box of ointment. But it did him no good, in fact the eczema came over his arms and shoulders and I thought he was going to have it all over his body. So we took him to the hospital again and they told me to still use the ointment and to tie his hands at night, but it did not do a bit of good. I gave up all hopes of him ever getting better, in fact I thought it would take him to his grave. "The appearance of the complaint was like a big hole on my baby's forehead which would run with matter and blood every time he scratched it. On his arms his little shirt would be stuck to the flesh and he would cry with the pain. He would try to get his hands free and rub them against his head. At last I got some Cuticura Ointment and after using it I said to my husband, 'What do you think of his arms and shoulders now?' and he said to me that they were getting along splendidly, so I told him what I had used and he went and bought some more Cuticura Ointment and some Cuticura Soap. The trouble has left him and it is now three months since we left off with the Cuticura Remedies. Mrs. J. Hill, 20, Second St., First Ave., Camel's Head, Devonport, Devon, Eng., Aug. 2 and 22, 1909."

YOKOHAMA: SATURDAY, NOV. 19TH, 1910.

SUMMARY OF NEWS.

THE first frost of this year was experienced at Fusan, Chosen, on the 15th instant. It was 15 days later than last year.

It has been decided that the trial of Kotoku Denjiro and twenty-five other anarchists will take place on the 10th proximo.

COUNT KOMURA, Minister for Foreign Affairs, is reported to have so far recovered from his illness that he is now able to sit up.

SIR CLAUDE and Lady Macdonald left Seoul on the 11th inst. for New Wiju, being accompanied by the British Consul and Mr. Komatsu.

MADAME NAKO, wife of Dr. Otsuka, whose literary fame has been widely known as the writer of "Soradaki" and other nove's, passed away on the 9th instant at Oiso. The deceased novelist was only 36 years old.

THE destroyer Yamakaze, sister-ship to the Unikaze, which is being built at Nagasaki, will be launched towards the end of this year.

THE PRINCE Imperial will arrive at Nagoya on Wednesday from Tsu, Ise province, and is expected to return to the capital on the 21st instant.

THE equipment of the Kaimon Maru being nearly completed, Lieutenant Shirosé's start on his Antarctic expedition has been fixed for the 28th instant.

THE fire which occurred on the 9th instant in the compound of the Kure Naval Arsenal, resulted only in the destruction of a temporary shed covering twenty tsubo.

ON the 11th instant being the birthday of King Emanuel of Italy, the Emperor sent from the Shizuoka Imperial villa a telegram of congratulation to the Italian Royal Household.

A VIOLENT rain-storm raged a few days ago on the coast of Chosen. At Wonsan and vicinity 1,700 houses were flooded. Many fishing vessels were wrecked and some bridges washed away.

ON the 16th instant a heavy fall of snow was experienced at Jinsen, Chosen, being the first snow of the season. It comes 10 days earlier than last year. The thermometer registered 32 degrees Fahr.

THE Japanese Government has instructed its representative at Madrid to the effect that, like other Powers, it has no objection to the informal opening of diplomatic relations with the Government of Portugal.

A HAKODATE despatch says that on Monday night derailment of a passenger train occurred at a place between Konbu and Kanyetsu. Several carriages were smashed, causing seven casualties to passengers.

THE Chosen peeresses, who have recently been visiting Japan, returned to Seoul on the 10th inst. The next day they repaired to the Tokuju and Shotoku Palaces to pay their respects to Princes Yi, Sr. and Jr.

It is reported from Dairen that a violent snow storm which lasted until the following day was experienced there on the 9th inst. Snow lay from two to five feet deep. A train from Shang-chun was delayed more than an hour in reaching Dairen on account of an interruption at Chou-shin tzu.

ON Tuesday the Mayor of Yokohama sent the following telegram to Mr. Zimmermann, Mayor of Vladivostok:—On behalf of the City of Yokohama, I beg to send my hearty congratulations and best wishes for the future prosperity of the City of Vladivostok on this the occasion of its 50th Jubilee."

IN connection with the purchase of the site for the Oyi Workshop of the Railway Board, the investigation committee has decided to buy the site at 800,000 yen or less. Three large buildings covering in all 84,090 tsubo will be constructed at a cost of 1,000,000 yen, in the course of three years.

ASAMA has been showing unusual activity since the 6th inst. Rumbings have been heard at Karuizawa, Komoro, and other places in Shinano Province, the sound resembling that of distant thunder. On the 7th, the weather being very calm and fine, the columns of smoke rose straight up into the sky to the height of several thousand feet and then, swaying over toward the north-east, floated away. Ashes fell on the districts over which the smoke drifted. The rumbings continued on the 8th, and the column of smoke is very much higher than on ordinary occasions.

AN Osaka telephone message reports that at a combined meeting of the Tokyo, Kyoto, Osaka, and Kobe Chambers of Commerce it has been decided upon deliberation to report to the Government on various amendments in the new factory law concerning the prohibition of night-work, the handling of powerful drugs, etc. On the whole the new law is regarded with great disapprobation.

ON the 10th inst. the prize-awarding ceremony was held at the Mayebashi Industrial Exhibition. Despite the inclement weather, over 2,500 persons were present. Baron Oura, Minister of Agriculture and Commerce, made an instructive speech before the assembly. Subsequently 255 exhibitors were awarded the first class prizes; 1,004, second-class; 2,095, third-class; 6,736, fourth-class; and 18, the prizes for merit. The Horse Competitive Exhibition which has been held at Mayebashi in connection with the Industrial Exhibition, also held a prize giving ceremony.

ON the 16th instant, when the grand manoeuvres in Okayama prefecture were concluded, His Majesty the Emperor was pleased to address to the armies a gracious speech, expressing appreciation of the good results of the manoeuvres on the whole, and hoping for still greater efforts of the officers and men in the future. The same day His Majesty was also pleased to give posthumous honours to Lord Ikeda Terumasa, ancestor of Marquis Ikeda, Kumazawa Banzan, a celebrated scholar under the Tokugawa Shogunate, and several other loyal subjects in Bizen, Bitchu, and Bingo provinces, by conferring on them court ranks ranging from the Junior Second to the Junior Fifth Grade.

IN the small hours of Wednesday night a fire broke out in the south-western wing of the Korean Girl's School situated at Nagasaka-cho, Azabu, Tokyo. Fanned by the northerly wind prevailing, the flames spread so rapidly that the whole building was reduced to ashes in less than an hour. The teachers and students in the dormitory barely escaped, and one fireman was seriously injured. The outbreak is said to have been due to carelessness on the part of a chimney-sweeper. The loss is estimated at 40,000 yen, excluding private effects belonging to the teachers and students. The building is insured for 2,500 yen with the Meiji Fire Insurance Company and 12,500 yen with the North British Fire Insurance Company.

IN connection with a tennis match, there has been acute rivalry, says the Kobe Herald, between Matsumoto Shuji, a fourth year student of the 1st Middle School of Ishikawa Ken, and Abutadani Chushichi, a first year student in the same school. On the 7th inst. the former challenged the latter to a duel, the latter willingly accepting. That night, the two repaired to the compound of the Kanagawa Tobacco Factory. Matsumoto received a severe blow on the head with a club and Abutadani also was injured. They went home, but Matsumoto succumbed to his injuries next morning. Eleven of the 3rd year students, who sided with Matsumoto in the affair, were arrested, but six of them were subsequently released.

CHINA'S CONSTITUTION.

Friday, November 11.

The Peking Senate appears to resent very strongly the action taken by the Government with regard to the Hunan loan. It will be remembered that the Throne had given its consent to this loan at the instance of the Local Authorities, and that the Senate subsequently adopted a memorial calling upon the Government to veto the proposed issue of bonds on the ground that the Hunan officials had failed to seek the previous assent of the Local Assembly. In reply to this memorial the Throne stated that as the proposed financial transaction had already received Imperial sanction, it could not now be interdicted, but that in future the prescribed routine must be carefully followed. This edict was published on the 8th instant, and when the Senate met on the 9th a scene of much commotion ensued. The Councillors of State were freely charged with influencing the Throne in a sense detrimental to popular rights, and several members vociferously demanded that these Councillors should attend in person to give explanations to Senate. The President in vain tried to calm the excitement. He was finally obliged to put the motion, and the Senate having adopted it by a large majority, it was forwarded at once to the proper authorities. But the members of the Council of State were not disposed to tamely submit to being cited before the bar of the House and subjected to a fire of cross-examination. They therefore prudently absented themselves, and the Senate is then said to have adopted a resolution that its sittings should be suspended until its demand for the presence of the Ministers was acceded to. Some telegrams predict that the next step will be the dissolution of the Senate, and all agree that a very strained situation has been created. It appears to be thought that the Throne should at least have signified its deference for the Senate's opinions by reprimanding the Governor of Hunan who failed to consult the Local Assembly; but evidently to reprimand a governor and at the same time to endorse his procedure would have been a flagrant contradiction. The Senate is said to have suspended its sittings sine die and no one seems certain as to the course that the Government will take.

It is of course possible, and even probable, that the above is greatly exaggerated. Thus the Mainichi has a telegram which represents the Senate as being remarkably defective in organization for any purpose of political combination. The representatives of Chekiang, Anhui and Kiangsu are frankly radical, but when it comes to forming a party, they are perplexed about drawing up a platform, and they are conspicuously wanting in competent leaders. The only question towards which they have hitherto shown a united front has been that of the Hunan loan, and very likely their unwonted union has misled observers into overestimating their resolution. Our readers remember that a familiar incident in the early proceedings of the Japanese Diet was the citing of the Ministers of State to the bar of the House where they were sometimes heckled without compunction. The Ministers showed great adroitness in leaving the House when things threatened to become embarrassing, and the House soon learned that a member of the Cabinet was much more skilled in answering than the representatives of the people were in questioning. Thus gradually the habit of attempting to humiliate the Ministers of State by summoning them to attend for the purpose of being interrogated by some village Hampden was gradually abandoned. The Chinese Senate, however, has to garner these experiences on its own account. Yet we do not believe that things have reached the deadlock indicated by the above accounts.

Saturday, November 12.

The news this morning goes to show that the agitators for an immediate parliament are on the whole satisfied with the concession made by the Throne, but are none the less prepared to take advantage of every fortuitous incident to promote their original purpose. The Hunan loan is such an incident. A trifling affair in itself, it has nevertheless acquired cardinal importance from being converted into a question between the Senate and the Council of State. When we say the Senate in this context, the term must be understood to apply to the extremist members only. Evidently the moderates, including of course the Government's nominees, would be quite satisfied to accept the Throne's warning that irregularities like that connected with the Hunan loan must be carefully avoided in future. But the extremists think that a chance has been afforded to embarrass the Government, and they are therefore talking of suspending the Senate's sittings altogether unless the Councillors of State consent to appear at the bar and explain the action of the Throne with regard to the Hunan loan. It is thought that the President of the Senate, Prince Pu Lun, may find it necessary to resign in the face of these reiterated commotions.

The advisers of the Throne are now represented as directing their thoughts towards the organization of a responsible Cabinet. Rumour is busy with the subject, but it is easy to see that no definite news is yet forthcoming.

Sunday, November 13.

There are conflicting accounts this morning from Peking about the complication between the Government and the Senate. One story suggests that the outcome will be a compromise, but another story has it that the affair will lead to the dissolution of the Senate. According to the Mainichi Dempo's telegrams, the Senate met in a decidedly truculent mood on the 10th instant; and Mr. Tung, who appears to be the leader of the Opposition, made a vehement speech charging the Government with contempt for the Senate's decisions, and adducing the history of the Hunan loan in support of this proposition. Mr. Tung's argument was strongly traversed by Mr. Lai, who is described as a popular leader attached to the Government's cause by munificent means. He demanded whether the Senate itself did not show contempt for the Throne in demanding the revocation of an Imperial edict. As to the proposal that the Senate should dissolve to mark its sense of the indignity put upon it, Mr. Lai suggested that to adopt such an extreme attitude towards such a minor conjuncture would be a case of using a butcher's cleaver to kill a chicken. What steps would the Senate take were it confronted by a real crisis? Unable to reply adequately to this shrewd criticism,

Mr. Tung left the Chamber and is said to have been followed by six or seven fellow-thinkers. It does not suggest itself as very practical thus to abandon the field to an opponent whose arguments one cannot traverse; but we must always remember that China is new to all this parliamentary procedure, and it is at all events better that Senators should do as Mr. Tung did than that they should appeal to physical force.

The Asahi Shimbun's correspondent sends a later telegram. He describes the issue of a meeting of Senatorial fellow-thinkers held on the 11th instant. More than a hundred members are said to have attended and to have voted unanimously for spontaneous dissolution, the immediate reason for this decision being the refusal of the State Councillors to obey the summons of the Senate, namely that they should attend in the Chamber and answer questions with reference to the Hunan loan affair. It remained to be seen, however, whether this resolution would be adopted by the Senate at its next meeting in full conclave. Meanwhile the President, Prince Pu Lun, is said to have tendered his resignation in consequence of Prince Ching's suggestions that he has shown himself incompetent to control the Assembly.

It will be seen that the above two accounts do not tally, and fuller intelligence must be awaited before choosing between them.

Monday, November 14.

The Senators in Peking have adopted a moderate attitude after all. They have decided that with a great national problem like the budget pressing for solution, it would be extravagant to invite dissolution, or to abstain from continuing the session, on account of a comparatively petty question like that of the Hunan bonds. Accordingly the Senate met duly on the 13th instant. There was only one member of the Council of State present, and he retired before the Assembly had proceeded to the business of the day. In this matter, therefore, the Government may be said to have achieved a complete victory, and the precedent has been established that Ministers of State are not required to attend in the Senate in answer to summonses from the Senators.

Tuesday, November 15.

The news received to-day from Peking indicates that the advocates of immediately opening a National Assembly are not willing to accept compromise. They regard the promise of 1913 as a virtual defeat of their aspirations. Accordingly they have addressed to the Ministers of State and Princes a series of questions which will be decidedly difficult to answer. They ask for example how it is found possible to shorten the period of probation from nine years to three, seeing that the former time was originally designated as the minimum period for preparations. They further ask why, if that period can be reduced to six years, there should be any insuperable difficulty in abbreviating it to four. They also want to know on what grounds the Central Government has rejected a petition which had the support of a majority of the Viceroys and Governors. Finally, they ask for a clear indication as to the location of the responsibility should the promise of 1913 prove illusive. It is thought that the Government's answer to these queries is to be partially found in an Imperial rescript issued a few days ago, calling upon the Local Authorities throughout the Empire to take steps for completing an accurate census of all the people within their jurisdictions.

An echo of this parliamentary agitation comes from Wuchang, where, on the 13th instant, a mob of 4,000 politicians repaired to the Viceregal Yamen to obtain some information about the Government's reasons for not opening a parliament next year.

Thursday, November 17.

A prominent Peking newspaper, called the Kwomin-Pao (popular news), has published a leading article which indicates the rise of a strongly democratic spirit among the people. Of course a newspaper article may not represent anything larger than the views of the writer himself, but there are collateral reasons for thinking that it would be a mistake to attach such a restricted significance to the Kwomin Pao's utterances on this occasion. The article declares that an imperially fixed Constitution would be entirely discordant with the sentiment of the Chinese nation. In other words, the Peking journal thinks that the Chinese Constitution must be compiled and endorsed by the people themselves. The article declares that Japan and Germany have already tried the experiment of an Imperial source and that their experience has proved the evil of such an effort. This of course is a matter of the greatest possible importance. The theory in Japan is that the Throne is the origin of all power, and that the people possess no public rights whatever except such as are given to them by the Sovereign. In fact the theory is that whatever is not explicitly conceded must be taken to be implicitly withheld. Substitute the people for the Sovereign in this formula and the whole situation is radically altered. It does not follow, however, that the Kwomin-Pao is misinterpreting the spirit or the custom of the Chinese nation. When Japan went to her neighbour for administrative models some twelve centuries ago, she was much embarrassed to find that the divine right of kings was not recognized in the Middle Kingdom, and that a sovereign's tenure of power depended on his ability to discharge the functions of a ruler. It was by a popular tribunal that his qualifications to occupy the Throne were determined, and it was by the people that he might be driven from power if he proved himself unqualified to exercise it. We do not suppose that the Manchu Dynasty would be inclined to recognize such a theory of government, but the trend of events at present seems to be turning in the direction of re-establishing the old Chinese polity. If the principle now asserted by the Kwomin-Pao were put into practice, the Manchu Dynasty, and in fact any imperial dynasty, would become a mere nominee of the people, and between such a state of affairs and a frank republic there is no appreciable distance.

A PRECIPITATE REFORMER.

A scarcely credible piece of news comes from Peking. It is to the effect that the Viceroy of Manchuria has memorialised the Throne, and has asked the Council of State to recommend the adoption of this memorial, in the sense that to postpone the opening of parliament until 1913 is a measure inconsistent with the urgent needs of the time. It is not clear whether his Excellency

Mr. Shih Li-ang has frankly ranged himself on the side of the advocates of the immediate opening of a National Assembly or whether he merely pleads for shortening the period of probation by one year. At all events his communication to the Council of State is said to have evoked much criticism from the latter body, especially from its President, Prince Ching, and it is thought that this action of the Viceroy's may end in his removal from Mukden. We have to remember always that the Chinese in the Three Eastern Provinces are conspicuously alarmed by the Russo-Japanese alliance and by the annexation of Korea. Their Local Assembly has unanimously memorialised the Throne to the effect that the only protection against Russian and Japanese aggression lies in uniting the nation by means of representative institutions. The Viceroy would seem to have taken his colour from his surroundings, and indeed he could scarcely have continued to administer Manchuria successfully had he advocated views contrary to such a plain expression of popular opinion. He might, however, have sat tight, to use a vulgar expression, instead of playing the role of a champion.

It is pretty evident that the people of the Three Eastern Provinces are not by any means content to wait until 1913 for the opening of a National Assembly. It is stated that immediately on the issue of the Imperial edict fixing that date, the Viceroy, Shih Liang, memorialized the Throne, declaring that the people could not be induced to quietly endorse such a period of probation, and that there are apprehensions of danger from the side of Russia and Japan that could be allayed only by the immediate opening of a National Assembly. Meanwhile the principal Chinese organ in Mukden is writing daily in a most vehement strain. It goes so far as to call for the rescinding of the constitution drafted by the Government, and its replacement by a system based on popular lines.

LIEN-SHAN HARBOUR.

Saturday, November 12.

Mukden telegraphs to the Mainichi Dempo that a meeting of the officials directly concerned with the Lien-shan harbour question has been held in that city, and has adopted the suggestion of Mr. Hughes. That suggestion is that, whereas to construct the harbour on a small scale now would be uneconomical, since much of the work must be done over again when the plan of operations comes to be enlarged, the wiser course is to proceed at once on an extensive scale. The telegram indicates 100,000 yen as the amount required, but that is obviously either a mistake for 10 millions or a mere preliminary outlay. The main plea advanced in behalf of the harbour is that it will become a necessity when the Chinchow-Aigun railway is undertaken, but of course this is only another way of saying that the Chinese aim at replacing Dairen and Newchwang with Lien-shan.

Sunday, November 13.

The latest news about the construction of a harbour at Lienshan is that the sum to be expended on the enterprise is 10 million taels, and the fact that people regard the enterprise as assured is proved by their purchases of landed property in the district.

QUESTION OF FOREIGN POLICY.

The proceedings of the Senate in Peking were directed at its last meeting to the subject of foreign politics. Several questions formulated by Mr. Cheng, a representative of the Mukden Constituency, were adopted for presentation to the Government. The first of these questions related to the Russo-Japanese Alliance and the annexation of Korea by Japan. These events, the questioners said, have created a strong feeling of alarm in the bosom of the Chinese people, and it was desired to know what steps the Government intended taking to allay this feeling. The second question related to the raids made by the Hunghutsz. It was alleged that these raids furnished a pretext for the interference of Russian and Japanese military forces. Was such interference permitted and could it be reconciled with the maintenance of China's sovereignty? The third query was whether the Authorities were in possession of any maps sufficiently accurate to prevent disputes about frontiers. The fourth question bore a decidedly undiplomatic character. It pointed out that the completion of the Mukden-Antung railway would make it possible for Japan to place a military force in the capital of Manchuria within four days. What precautions did the Government contemplate in view of that fact? The problem of Japanese and Russian immigration constituted the fifth subject of enquiry. It was pointed out that there are twenty thousand Russian settlers in Northern Manchuria, and 50,000 Japanese in the southern part of the Three Provinces. What were the Government's views as to that? There was a sixth question relating to violations of Chinese territory by Russians and Japanese, but the terms being somewhat confused, we are not able to state this query accurately. It is evident that Chinese apprehensions with regard to the doings of Russia and Japan have assumed a very tangible form. Such questions as the above will test the Chinese Government's tact when replies come to be drafted, and it may very well be that the subsequent debate will tend to injure the relations between China and Japan. There can of course be no doubt as to the course contemplated by the questioners. They would garrison Manchuria effectually; institute an accurate survey of the frontiers, and impose, all lawfully possible restrictions upon Russian and Japanese immigration.

FORMOSA.

It is now officially stated that the first stage of the five-year programme of operations in Formosa has been brought to a conclusion. The aborigines have handed over 621 stand of rifles, which number corresponds sufficiently with the estimate made at Japanese headquarters. Thus there is no reason to query the sincerity of the surrender. Accordingly the withdrawal of the Shinchiku column commenced on the 7th instant, and that of the Gilan on the 11th. There now remain in the newly-occupied region only one company each at three places, namely Kakuhan, Balon and Suzawa. A ceremony in commemoration of the withdrawal of the troops was held at Gilan on the 11th instant.

THE CHINESE LOAN.

Friday, November 11.

The atmosphere of the big financial transaction between America and China begins to be troubled. At first the magnitude of the affair and the project of such a large inflow of gold disposed a section of the Chinese nation to regard the prospect with favourable eyes. But this complaisant mood underwent a marked change when it was found that the American capitalists were determined to subject the use of the money to scrutiny by a foreign financial expert. Such a measure of interference naturally proved somewhat shocking, and the transaction is now beginning to be viewed askance by the Chinese. Meanwhile the news that the arrangement was signed on the 27th of last month is now contradicted. There has not yet been any signature. Moreover it is stated that European Governments will insist on having a finger in this pie, which claim is natural enough on the part of creditor countries. The United States is in the happy position of not having yet lent any money to China, and the capitalists of New York will readily acquiesce in the justice of paying due consideration to the interests of those who have lent money already. Thus from many points of view the completion of the transaction is beginning to present difficulties.

Saturday, November 12.

Shanghai telegraphs that the idea of appointing an American expert to oversee the expenditure of the new Chinese loan is not at all agreeable to the Peking Authorities. But it may now be questioned whether this condition will hold, in that precise form. Reuter has informed us that the expected has taken place, namely, that the loan transaction has been converted from a purely American operation into a joint undertaking on the part of four great Powers, namely, France, Germany, the United States and England. In the face of such a combination it is most unlikely that the nationality of the proposed superintendent would be fixed by convention. At any rate he would not be a citizen or a subject of any one of the four coadjutors, but would probably be chosen from a neutral country like Holland or Belgium.

The question naturally presents itself, will Japan consent to be effaced for the purposes of this transaction? It would certainly be inconvenient for her to contribute a large part of the loan, as she has ample need at home for all the capital she can command. Still, if each Power took up an equal portion of the loan, and if five Powers were concerned, a matter of only 20 million yen would be in question, and for the sake of such a comparatively petty amount Japan ought certainly not to allow herself to be thrust aside. Then there is Russia, whose territories march with those of China through a distance of hundreds of miles. In fact Russia, England and France are the only States which can be called China's actual neighbours; France in Annam, England in Burma and Russia along the whole northern frontier. It would be incomprehensible that Russia should stand aside when the Western Powers are virtually bargaining among themselves for the reversion of China's estate.

The Mainichi Dempo has a telegram on the above subject. It emanates from Peking, and it represents the loan as having assumed a rather dubious complexion. According to this information, American financiers are not at all anxious themselves to put up the money. Their idea is that the United States should occupy a political situation only in the character of introducing the loan, and that the actual coin should be furnished by European countries. The latter, however, are disposed to look askance at an unsecured obligation, and moreover show no great inclination to undertake the transaction except as America's partners. Things have thus come to something like a deadlock, and the loan seems not unlikely to enter the category of the Yangtze Valley affair.

Sunday, November 13.

It now seems tolerably certain that the task of inducing American capitalists to put up five millions sterling on China's account has been found impracticable. Recourse has been necessary to England, Germany and France, and a preliminary agreement is said to have been signed, not in the sense that these three countries are to operate as auxiliaries of America, but in the sense that all are to stand on an equal footing. Meanwhile the method of raising the money and all the other details remain to be settled, and it is thought that a considerable interval must still elapse before the transaction is complete. The Fiji Shimpō, from which we take these details, adds that Japan has adopted a suitable measure, but gives no hint as to what that measure is.

Monday, November 14.

The Mainichi Dempo has a telegram from Mukden to the effect that the German Consul in that city asserts that the loan agreement has not yet been signed by any of the Powers. Meanwhile Mr. Straight, agent of the Associated Banking Corporation, is said to be on his way to China, and doubtless he carries with him a statement of the terms on which foreign capitalists are willing to undertake the transaction.

On the other hand, the same journal's Peking correspondent wires that, according to intelligence received by the Hongkong and Shanghai Bank in the Chinese capital, four great Western Powers have arrived at an agreement as to the conditions of a combined loan of five millions sterling.

The Hochu Shimbun alleges that, in view of the importance of the question, the Japanese Government has already preferred a claim to be admitted to the syndicate of capitalists on equal terms. One thing, adds that journal, may be taken for granted, namely, that if four great Powers of the Occident, together with Japan, are taking part in this transaction, they will exact from China pretty onerous terms.

It will be observed that nothing is said about Russia. Yet we cannot conceive her self-effacement in such an affair.

Tuesday, November 15.

If the Mainichi Dempo be rightly informed, the agreement with regard to the Chinese loan partakes of a virtually permanent character. It unites the four Western Powers for the purposes not only of this one loan but also of future transactions of a similar nature, for it pledges the signatories to communicate with each other should any financial transaction be hereafter proposed by China to one of their number. Meanwhile it is coming to be recognised that the financiers of the United States never contemplated the completion of this transaction off their own bats alone. They are much too shrewd to wish to monopolise any foreign loan having political bearings. Besides, even though a monopoly had been in contemplation, the difficulty of consummating it must have been apparent. The United States Government having itself insisted on participation in the Yei-Han railway loan, could not but be prepared for similar action on the part of the European Powers in the case of the present transaction. Therefore it is not at all surprising to find that Mr. Straight very soon extended the field of his operations so as to include the European Powers. Meanwhile absolute silence is maintained with regard to Russia's attitude in this matter. It would almost seem as though studied aloofness was to be the policy of St. Petersburg. Nothing more has been heard too about Japan's intentions.

Thursday, November 17.

The intelligence telegraphed by Reuter on the 16th instant shows that the four Powers which are interesting themselves in the Chinese loan have fully appreciated, on the one hand, the necessity of divesting the transaction of all objectionable political aspects; and, on the other, the expediency of forming a genuine guild so as to avert competition among the parties lending the money. Whether they have succeeded in achieving the former purpose may well be doubted. They have abolished the "financial spheres," by which expression we may understand spheres of influence. But as these never existed outside the realm of theory, their abolition is a matter of minor importance. Such is not the case, however, with regard to the international pool which has now been formed. Hereafter if China wants to enter the money market she will be unable to secure the advantage of competing creditors, and will have to accept the terms offered or to abandon the transaction altogether. This is evidently a point of cardinal moment to China, and it also has much significance from the point of view of her potential creditors, inasmuch as it reduces them all to the same level of financial competence. Hitherto England, as the centre of the world's finance, has been able to secure a major part of foreign investments, but hereafter she will stand on exactly the same level with France, Germany and the United States, so far as concerns China. It is doubtless wise that the signatories of this curious arrangement should disavow any idea of obtaining political hegemony in China by means of railways, but he would be greatly mistaken who should suppose that this provision is dictated by solicitude for China's integrity. What the Powers of the West really dread is not the partition of China qua partition, but the danger of a quarrel among themselves about the manner of division.

Meanwhile later news from Peking says that Mr. Shen, President of the Board of Currency, has proposed a plan which is highly approved of in responsible circles. His idea is to offer the mines throughout the whole Empire as security for the contemplated loan. This would necessitate the bringing of the mines under one common system of administration, and for that purpose a new branch of the Government would be formed under the name of the Board of Mines. The telegram suggests that foreign superintendence should constitute a feature of this scheme, but whether this means a superintendent at each of the important mines, or whether it means that one such official should be attached to the Board of Mines, we are unable to decipher. At any rate the idea of employing one or more foreigners in such a capacity appears to be distasteful to the sentiment of the rights-recovery party, and it is said that strenuous opposition is likely to be encountered if the scheme be actually carried out. One thing will at once strike our readers, namely that Chinese mines are to a large extent an unknown quantity and that to hypothecate them for the purposes of a foreign loan is a somewhat ambiguous kind of procedure.

Concerning Japan's admission to this international pool, we do not learn that any steps have yet been taken. There is talk of sending the well-known civil engineer Mr. Furuichi on a mission to Peking for the purpose of making investigations, but whether this step is contemplated officially, or whether Dr. Furuichi would be acting in his capacity of technical adviser to the To-A Kogyo Kaisha, we have no definite information. At any rate it is obviously important that Japan should not allow herself to be effaced in connection with this novel combination of Powers.

MR. MOCHIZUKI KOTARO.

Mr. and Mrs. Mochizuki have returned from their tour in the West, and the result of Mr. Mochizuki's observations is recorded by various Tokyo journals. He seems to have been specially struck by the enormous growth of wealth in America, and by the employment of immense sums for purposes of manufacturing enterprise or other developments of material prosperity. All these things tend to enhance the importance of the questions between labour and capital, the indirect result being a marked growth of anti-Japanese feeling. This sentiment, originally limited to a portion of the Pacific Slope, has now extended throughout the country at large, and at the same time there is a counter-feeling in favour of the Chinese, so that things may be said to have assumed the position they occupied prior to the China-Japan war of 1894-5. Turning to England, Mr. Mochizuki found that the alliance sentiment had undergone marked diminution. The difference between the strength of this feeling during the war with Russia and its present debility is conspicuous. But whether the change is to be referred to a mere reaction from former extremes, or to Japan's procedure in Korea and Manchuria, Mr. Mochizuki does not undertake to say. As for the tariff trouble, however, he thinks that an exaggerated estimate has been formed of it, and that it can be settled without much difficulty.

As for France this traveller seems to have been struck chiefly by the plenitude of money seeking investment. He concludes that if suitable machinery were created a great deal of French capital would find its way to Japan.

Mr. Mochizuki speaks in warm terms of Russia's friendliness towards Japan and says that the ties of amity binding St. Petersburg to Paris and London are of great use to Japan. He adds that Baron Motono is a persona gratissima in Russian official circles. He is regarded as an exceptionally able diplomat, and his habit of speaking his mind openly is strongly appreciated.

THE GOVERNMENT'S FINANCIAL POLICY.

One seems to hear very distinctly the mutterings of a distant storm in the financial atmosphere. The Government's policy in appropriating 530 million yen to railway extensions and improvements, to riparian works and to the material development of Korea, is regarded in many quarters as unequivocal pulling down of the pillars of the present Cabinet's financial policy, namely steady redemption of existing loans and abstention from increasing them. One journal asks whether it can be hoped that the roof of the edifice will remain in position after the supports have been removed. A curious fact is that most of the Tokyo journals approve of the new policy from an economic standpoint, but condemn it severely as a departure from the Government's frequently declared programme. Probably it will be found that much of the criticism now uttered is premature. Thus we note that there is a cardinal mistake in the statements hitherto published. The period over which the railway expenditure of 250 million yen is to be spread was originally stated as five years, whereas it really is thirteen. This means that instead of 50 million yen annually, the sum required will be less than 20 millions, and inasmuch as 10 millions are already available in the shape of profit, the sum ultimately to be found under this heading can be managed without any issue of bonds and simply by recourse to the Deposits Bureau or to exchequer bills, if required. As for the money spent upon Korea, it is dealt with quite independently of the regular budget. Finally we have the riparian improvements, totalling 180 millions and spread over a period of 20 years. This signifies only 9 million yen annually. Still there can be no doubt that, strictly speaking, these undertakings involve an increase of the national obligations, and it is just possible that some of the bankers may condemn the Cabinet's new policy on the ground that the market value of the 4 per cents. will suffer. But, on the other hand, it has to be observed that the 4 per cents. are holding their own stoutly. There has been nothing in the nature of a débâcle, and it may be taken for granted, we think, that the great majority of the bankers will endorse the Government's measures. In fact, looking at the methods hitherto pursued by Marquis Katsura, we are disposed to think that the bankers have already been consulted.

We take the following from the English column of the Kokumin Shimbun of the 15th instant:—

Marquis Katsura will speak on the new Budget in Osaka to-day.

Japan's financial programme for 1911-12 has been already fixed. In order to make it in conformity with Japan's railway in Korea and Manchuria, the Government has decided to reconstruct the line between Tokyo and Shimonoseki (which is the terminus of the mainland and is connected with Fusan by a ferry service) in the standard gauge, in thirteen consecutive years. It requires 130 million yen besides the established annual instalment of 10 million yen for the improvement of railways, but no new loans will be issued for that purpose, as recently rumoured, 10 million yen newly required will but be drawn from ordinary sources, including the postal savings, which have been proving increasingly popular. As to the new regime in Korea, the Japanese Treasury will not have to bear any particularly increased burden. About ten million yen required for railway and harbour extension will be borrowed from the Bank of Korea. The aftermath of the recent extensive floods will not require any new loan, but the expenses therefor the next fiscal year will be obtained from the Government Deposit Department.

Several leading Tokyo journals continue to attack the Government vehemently on the alleged discrepancy between its originally declared policy and its recently announced practice. These critics take the line that the Cabinet is seeking to carry out at the same time two mutually inconsistent projects. One is to abstain from all increase of debts; the other, to undertake a great public work which cannot possibly be accomplished without the issue of a loan. It is evident that, speaking pragmatically, these critics can make out a plausible case, and they spare no pains to do so, one of them, namely, the Nichi Nichi Shimbun, using language which is the very reverse of temperate and which seems to us to be altogether out of place in such a context. It cannot be denied of course that since the deposits in the Postal Savings Banks are not the Government's property, any drafts made upon them for purposes of railway construction must be regarded as a debt incurred. But there is a palpable difference between contracting an obligation of that kind and issuing a quantity of 4-per-cent. bonds. The Government thinks that it will always be in a position to temporarily command special funds like those of the Banks' deposits, and it virtually engages that should this expectation become at any moment unrealizable, the prosecution of the scheme will be postponed. But the affair presents one more feature which surprises us not a little. Even a journal like the Jiji Shimpō is conspicuous on this occasion in its attacks upon the Government. Yet this same Jiji Shimpō is a stalwart advocate of railway extension and improvement. It follows then that what the Jiji approves in the hands of a different Ministry it condemns when undertaken by the Katsura Cabinet. We cannot understand that line of argument. If the proposed railway work be as essential to the development of the nation's prosperity as the Jiji Shimpō recently insisted, then it must be a beneficial undertaking by whatever group of politicians it is carried out.

The Kokumin Shimbun holds up the critics to scorn. It compares them to men living in constant dread lest the sky should fall. The Minister of State for Finance has distinctly explained that the funds required for the new projects are not to be obtained by recourse to the ordinary method of floating loans. Timid folks, to say nothing of political partisans, pretend to believe that such financing is impossible. The trouble is their own want of perception.

JAPAN'S FOREIGN TRADE.

The returns of Japan's foreign trade for the first ten days of November, are as follow:—

	Yen.
Exports	14,507,000
Imports	13,596,000
Excess of Exports.....	911,000
The figures for the period January 1st to November 10th are:—

THE FINANCE MINISTER'S STATEMENT.

Marquis Katsura in his capacity of Minister of Finance, made a long statement at a meeting of the Osaka Economic Association on the evening of the 15th instant. For the most part his Excellency's utterances embodied only facts with which the public are already familiar. He set out by referring to the policy formulated by the Government at the time of its assumption of office, and steadily followed since then. Special allusion was made to the programme of the current year, which includes the conversion scheme. The Minister, while speaking in a tone of due caution, did not hesitate to say that the country's finances have followed a favourable routine and that the results had been satisfactory. He then passed on to point out that in order to keep pace with the domestic and international economic development, several problems pressed for speedy solution; principal among them being the implementing of the naval strength, the annexation of Korea, the improvement and extension of railways and riparian work. Having premised that the Government is resolutely determined not to depart from the basic principles of its policy, namely, the maintenance of equilibrium in the budget and redemption of public debts to the annual amount of at least 50 million yen, his Excellency passed on to deal with the principal items of next year's budget. Taking the naval question first, he insisted strenuously on the fact that Japan's relations with the outer world are such as to obviate all need of naval increment, and that the Government is shaping its course solely with the view of keeping the navy at a strength sufficient for national defence, and also of marching in line with the shipbuilding changes that practical experience is dictating. Fortunately the state of the finances makes it possible to devote sufficient funds to this purpose without unduly straining the financial elasticity. Ample means are provided by surplus revenue and therefore an item is introduced under the heading "implementing of already fixed continuing expenditure." The total allotted is 82 million yen, spread over a period of 6 years, and the sum included in next year's budget is 15 million yen. Passing on to the question of Korea the Marquis noted with great satisfaction that the sequel of annexation has been perfectly peaceful and that the people of the Peninsula, apparently quite reconciled to the new regime, are engaging in works of development with every symptom of content. While endeavouring to assist in opening up the resources of Korea and furthering the people's welfare, the Government will be careful to avoid placing any needless burden upon Japan's shoulders. Keeping that limitation in view, it has been decided that the Korean special account in the next budget shall not exceed 12 million yen, which is an increase of less than one million, compared with the aggregate of yearly disbursements hitherto made. On the other hand, Japan, by annexing the Peninsula, had removed a standing menace to the peace of the Far East. Riparian improvements next occupied his Excellency's attention, but his remarks did not add anything to our previous knowledge. The same is true with regard to railways. The Prime Minister laid much stress upon the iron road as a prime factor of economic development. It was on the strength of this conviction that the nationalization of the railways had been effected, and the country might now congratulate itself upon having completed the payment of the purchase price without any financial disturbance, although that price had been nearly 500 million yen. But during the period immediately subsequent to nationalization, the Authorities were fully occupied with the task of adjustment and unification, so that only now is it possible to proceed a step further by undertaking the work of widening the gauge and effecting other improvements as well as extensions. Marquis Katsura did not, however, attempt to deny that the financing of railways belongs to a category different from that of general finance. Funds for railway purposes have always been furnished by public loans, and in pursuance of that policy the Government will draw upon the Deposits Bureau and other special sources in addition to applying the money representing profits. But the greatest possible care will be exercised to consult economic and financial conditions so as not in any way to disturb either the state of the market or the Treasury's general programme, especially with regard to the conversion of the national debt. Marquis Katsura claimed that the sequence of procedure adopted by the Government has been thoroughly consistent with the orderly advance of economic conditions, and with expanse of the country's material resources. The Government commenced with retrenchment of public works; then proceeded to bring about appreciation in the market price of State bonds; then passed on to readjust the taxes and to make essential increase of official salaries; then undertook the conversion of the national debts; and now advances to the implementing of the navy to riparian improvements and to railway reconstruction and expansion. The Marquis concluded by pointing out that capital is now abundant and that there are signs of industrial revival. He therefore invited his hearers to go forward with a spirit of self-reliance and courage so as to keep abreast with the national expansion.

PRESS COMMENTS ON THE FINANCIAL PROBLEM.

The Jiji Shimpō takes the lead of all the Tokyo journals in traversing the Prime Minister's financial statement at Osaka. What our respected contemporary chiefly, and indeed almost exclusively, attacks is the element of vagueness in Marquis Katsura's declaration with regard to the financing of the railway programme. His Excellency distinctly stated that funds for the improvement and construction of railways are recognised as belonging to a special category, and as properly obtainable by loans. It is true that he spoke vaguely of present recourse to postal deposits and other extraordinary sources of revenue, but underlying his words was a plain intimation of the ultimate recourse to the issue of bonds.

We must remind our readers that this argument on the part of the Jiji is mainly academical. So far as the improvement of the railways and their extension are concerned, the Jiji has been consistently in favour of that programme and of procuring funds by means of a bond issue. What it finds fault with now is the Government's reluctance to acknowledge a departure from the official programme of not floating any further loans.

The Nichi Nichi Shimbun seems to believe that owing to the expenditure of a large sum on the work of gauge-widening, the Government will have to give up all idea of extending the system of railways for the present at all events. Yet our contemporary is persuaded that such extension cannot be deferred without grave national disadvantage, seeing that Japan is far behind any of the second-rate or third rate Powers of Europe in the matter of her equipment of railways.

The Mainichi Dempo is also hostile, not that it is opposed to the fact of railway improvement and extension, but that it detects in the Government's methods an attempt to throw dust in the eyes of the people.

Surely this line of argument is very curious. The Government, speaking through the mouth of the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance, explicitly declares that the fixed policy of the State is to obtain funds for this kind of undertaking by floating railway bonds. At the same time the Government declares that the financing of the railways shall be managed with the utmost circumspection and with full regard to the economic conditions of the moment. In the exercise of that wise caution it is obviously impossible for the Government to declare beforehand what amount of bonds it will issue and when they will be put upon the market. All that can be done is to indicate a source of income not immediately dependent upon bonds. Such a source is the Postal Banks Deposits, and so long as they are available, there would be no open increase of the national debt. That is what the Government says, as we understand. Of course there is a certain risk connected with the programme; namely, the risk that funds may give out at a moment when they are most needed, and when it is least convenient to appeal to the money market. The Cabinet, however, does not consider that risk deterrent, and is prepared to take it.

The Shogyo Shimpō raises its powerful voice in support of the Government. It detects no departure from the programme of abstaining from further national obligations.

Professor Sengoku, formerly President of the Kyushu Railway Company, deals with the technical question of laying a wide-gauge line side by side with narrow-gauge and keeping them in simultaneous operation. He declares that such a plan would be financially disastrous, but he has not apparently assured himself about the intentions of the Government engineers.

THE SOCIALISTS.

It is noteworthy that not a single Japanese newspaper has a word to say in defence of Kotoku Denjiro and his 25 coadjutors. On all sides it is claimed that the term socialist cannot properly be applied to these men, and that their true designation should be "anarchist" or "nihilist." Attention is called to the fact that up to the 20th of June 1908, when they held a meeting in Kanda and came into collision with the police, this little band of agitators had worked in public, but thereafter they adopted secret courses, and finding the capital too hot for them, removed to Nagano prefecture. The only criticism which can be construed as in any sense extenuating is the Hochi Shimbun's argument that by continuing to collect the "three bad taxes," the Government has created a situation calculated to produce evil growths like that now in question. There is some covert surprise that the whole 26 should be arraigned under the 73rd article of the penal code, but of course, although the same charge is formulated against them all whether as principals or accessories, the final judgment will make discriminations in degrees of guilt.

The Niroku Shimbun has an article with the spirit of which many people will be found to concur. Our contemporary urges that the trial of the prisoners should not be conducted in secret although the law makes special provision in that sense. The Niroku is convinced that the wisest course is to let the public hear with their own ears the evidence upon which these men are arraigned, and thus everybody will be convinced that the miscreants are as criminal as the Authorities allege. If that course be followed no dissentient voice will be raised, no matter how severe the penalty exacted, but if the punishment be drastic and the procedure secret, false ideas will certainly be engendered. We (Japan Mail) are frankly of our contemporary's opinion in the matter, but of course it is impossible to speak with certainty failing accurate knowledge of the evidence.

It appears that "socialist" is not a proper term to apply to the 25 men and one woman now awaiting trial in Tokyo. They are simply anarchists of the worst description, and it is evident that the strongest possible sentiment of indignation has been aroused against them among all sections of the Japanese nation. The newspapers are unanimous in denouncing their projected crime and in declaring that loyal subjects of the Throne can no longer endure to live under the same heaven with such miscreants. We read that the instruments of destruction found in their possession were of the most powerful description and that they have assumed, one and all, a most defiant attitude. They evidently entertain no hope of saving their lives, and they therefore seek to make their fate a means of propagandism. Among them there is one man whose brother occupies a seat upon the Bench, and the inclusion of a person of such standing is regarded as an additional proof that the Authorities have been thorough in their investigations. We cannot find any Japanese newspaper now advocating a public trial. The universal belief appears to be that to place such desperate men before a public bar would be to provide for them precisely the opportunity they desire. They would certainly use it to pose as martyrs; to proclaim their mischievous doctrines to an audience such as they could not otherwise command, and in circumstances calculated to impart spurious weight to their words. Thus the conviction in journalistic circles is that they should be dealt with secretly and conclusively. This is a question which offers much room for discussion, but on the whole we are inclined to agree with the views enunciated by our Tokyo contemporaries. At any rate, the only persons thoroughly competent to pass final judgment on such a topic are those who have heard the evidence and had an opportunity of confronting the accused.

With regard to the defence of the prisoners every possible facility appears to be given by the Authorities. They have assigned a prominent barrister as counsel for each of the accused, and they have intimated that if this choice be not satisfactory to the prisoners, the latter are free to apply for anyone they please.

THE TOKYO RAILWAY.

The directors of the Tokyo Railway have presented an application to the Authorities for permission to divide the uncompleted portions of their lines into three sections, the whole, with insignificant exceptions, to be finished by the close of 1916. Already the newspapers of Tokyo, which are absolutely without conscience where the affairs of the Tokyo Railway are concerned, have begun to cry out for a shorter period.

There is some trouble between the Prefect of Tokyo and the Municipal Assembly. The question at issue is whether an extension of period should be granted to the Tokyo Railway Company for concluding the construction of its chartered lines. The Prefect is not required by law to refer this matter to the Municipal Assembly. His duty is simply to examine the question and then submit a statement of his views to the Department of Home Affairs; but the Municipal Assembly recently adopted a resolution asking to be consulted, and the Prefect's neglect of this resolution, though such neglect is absolutely regular, has been resented by the Assembly, and there is talk of impeaching the Prefect. It is easily understood that the citizens want the trams extended as quickly as possible, but all the while they rebel utterly against allowing the Company to collect a reasonable fare. Meanwhile the cars are a veritable disgrace to Tokyo. We have no hesitation in affirming that the capital of Japan can confidently boast the dirtiest, most uncomfortable and least commodious cars possessed by any city in the world. It is to be hoped that the municipality will soon take the management of this important enterprise into its own hands.

With reference to the postponement of the completion period of the Tokyo Railway Company's suburban lines, we stated in a recent issue that the Municipal Assembly was somewhat offended by the action of the Governor in recommending that the application for postponement should be granted, his recommendation not having been previously submitted for the consideration of the Assembly. Mr. Abe's explanation is now published. He points out that the charter of the Company indicates two admissible reasons for postponement. One, namely natural calamity, need not be considered, but the other, namely force majeure, distinctly meets the case, inasmuch as the main cause of delay has been the difficulty of coming to terms with holders of fixed property. The law might of course have been appealed to, but this would have entailed still more tedious processes. Another obstacle classifiable under this heading is the difficulty of dealing with underground pipes belonging to other enterprises. These pipes cannot be removed or in any way disturbed without the consent of their owners, and to obtain that consent is often a difficult and lengthy matter. In view of these obvious facts the Governor had not seen any occasion for previous consultation with the City Assembly. Meanwhile the talk of municipalization is again revived, and like the often predicted wolf it will probably come true at last. But no definite step seems to be contemplated before the return of Mr. Ozaki Yukio.

The Tokyo Railway has been the subject of so many false rumours in the past that one hesitates to believe anything whatever now. In the category of scarcely credible stories we find a statement in the Chuo Shimbun to the effect that an agreement has actually been concluded between the Municipality and the Company, and that the Government's consent will be subsequently sought. What makes it particularly difficult to believe this story is the previous statement that things would be left in statu quo until the return of Mr. Ozaki Yukio.

The Hochi Shimbun warns the public not to be misled by premature reports as to the municipalization of the Tokyo Railway. Our contemporary insists that the operation is of too great magnitude and importance to be dealt with in a night and a morning, and that the attitude of the Authorities is open to great doubt. This warning was scarcely necessary, and is no more worthy of credence than any of the stories hitherto circulated on the same topic.

RAILWAYS IN MANCHURIA.

The Communications Gazette, which is said to be an official organ in Peking, has a strong article advocating the rapid construction of railways in Manchuria. It contends that in the development of Manchuria's resources is to be found the sole means of checking Japanese and Russian aggression. Such development must take the form of expansion in the realms of trade, industry, agriculture, mining and sericulture. For these purposes the first essential is railways, and China should set to work energetically to cover the Three Eastern Provinces with a network of lines. So long as she avoids building roads that can be called parallel to the South Manchuria line, she is free to do anything she pleases within her own territory, and the sooner she bestirs herself in this matter the better chance will she have of escaping the fate which menaces her.

It must be confessed that while the above advice sounds very practical, it scarcely bears the test of close examination. The prime difficulty is one of funds. Where is China to get money sufficient for the purpose of covering with railways an immense area like Manchuria? To procure funds for such an object she would have to incur obligations which would be just as subversive of her independence as any outcome of the Russo-Japanese alliance is likely to prove. For the last thirty years we have heard iterated and reiterated talk of this policy of commercial and industrial expansion, coupled with open ports, as the best antidote to foreign aggression. So far as open ports are concerned, the policy has frequently been carried into effect. This is especially true of Manchuria, where the Portsmouth treaty created quite a number of new foreign settlements. But the security of the Three Provinces does not appear to have been much promoted by that measure.

A HARBIN telegram says that a case of the black plague was reported there on the 10th instant.

THE RAILWAY LOANS.

It is confidently stated by nearly all the leading journals of Tokyo that the Government has determined to adopt a liberal policy in the matter of railway construction and riverine improvement. On the former work a total sum of 250 million yen will be expended in the space of five years, and on the latter a sum of 180 millions in twenty years; making a total of 430 millions in all. The first use to which the railway money will be devoted is to change the gauge of the Tokyo-Shimonoseki line, 704 miles, so that it shall be uniform with the gauge on the South Manchuria and Korean roads. These details are somewhat rough, but they are confidently stated by journals of high standing, and the programme is of course construed as a departure from the Cabinet's hitherto declared policy of abstaining from further loans, whether domestic or foreign. It will be remembered that the Fiji Shimpō recently advocated this measure, but the great question is whether such a sum as 430 million yen of 4 per-cent. bonds will find purchasers in Japan.

A very full and satisfactory explanation is given by the Shogyō Shimpō with regard to the projected issue of domestic 4-per-cent. bonds for the construction of railways and for other purposes. The total amount involved is 529 million yen; namely 250 millions for railways, 179 millions for riparian works and 100 millions for the development of Korea. The public evidently considers that the issue of such a large body of bonds would greatly disturb the condition of the money market, and would be a flagrant departure from the Government's declared policy of not increasing the national debt. The Shogyō Shimpō, however, demonstrates that these apprehensions are practically chimerical. Taking the railways first, it will be observed that the sum needed next year is 50 million yen. But it does not follow that any portion of this must be provided by recourse to bonds. Ten millions are calculated as obtainable from profits on the operation of the lines, and 40 millions will be borrowed from the Deposits Bureau or from the fund for the adjustment of the currency. Some small sum may have to be obtained by floating of bonds but the amount would certainly be insignificant. Turning to the Korean loan, the Shogyō observes that a period of from seven to ten years is set for the issue of the bonds, which means that the yearly amount will vary between 10 and 15 millions. But it is very unlikely that this transaction will necessitate recourse to the home market. The Central Bank of Korea has largely increasing deposits which can be applied to this purpose, and has also note-issuing power; and by utilising this bank's resources in a manner similar to that adopted with regard to the Bank of Formosa, the required funds will be obtained without subjecting the domestic market to any pressure. As to riparian works, namely, 179 millions spread over 21 years, our contemporary gives an explanation which is not quite clear in one respect, namely, that it puts at six millions annually the contribution already made by the Treasury to the localities. At all events the Shogyō arrives at the conclusion that neither under this heading nor under any other will the domestic market be disturbed.

It must be confessed, however, that the above explanations are not exhaustive. Neither the Deposits Bureau nor the sums in the coffers of the banks nor the currency adjustment fund is an unlimited amount, and, after all, the excuse that railway construction is a thing apart cannot be counted conclusive. We ourselves believe that much of the present commercial stagnation in Japan is due to the nationalisation of the railways. That operation meant, in effect, the sudden cessation of great works all over the Empire—works involving large employment of labour and substantial disbursements of money, to say nothing of the fact that railways themselves are a powerful agent of prosperity. The Fiji Shimpō takes the same view. It welcomes with both hands the resumption of railway building activity, but it greatly queries the possibility of maintaining the 4-per cent. standard in the face of this new issue of bonds. Unfortunately this subject, which should be treated on purely financial lines, seems likely to be dragged into the realm of party politics.

Public attention continues to be riveted on the railway question and on the correlated issue of bonds. A representative of the Hochi Shimbun has waited upon Marquis Katsura in the latter's capacity of Minister of Finance and has obtained some very plain explanations. The Marquis insists that the linking up of the Tokyo-Shimonoseki railway with the Korean and South Manchurian systems by bringing them all to the same gauge is one of the most pressing needs of the time. When the Panama Canal is opened, Japan will become a central point on the world's highway, and it behoves her to prepare for playing that role. People who have spread the rumour that in planning the widening of the gauge on the main trunk line of Japan, Baron Goto was influenced by Viscount Terauchi's opinion, are talking pure nonsense. The matter is wholly economic and has no connection whatever with military affairs. The truth is that previous budgets provide for a total of 100 million yen on account of the extension and improvement of railways, and what the Government now projects is to allot a further sum of 130 millions, spread over 13 years so that the work would be completed in 1923. That means an outlay of only 10 million yen annually, which sum can easily be obtained from the Deposits Bureau or other sources according to the financial opportunities of the moment.

Turning to the matter of riparian improvements, his Excellency explains that it is not possible to speak quite conclusively, since full investigations have not yet been made. But according to present appearances the total expenditure required will be 180 million yen spread over a period of 20 years. That means an annual outlay of 9 millions, and as some 5 millions are already paid by the Treasury every year by way of grants in aid of local works of this nature, it is evident that the Central Government's liability will be increased by only 4 millions; a sum which can easily be manipulated without recourse to bond issues.

As to the sum of 100 millions to be spent upon the development of Korea, it will be procured through the agency of the Bank of Korea just as the funds needed in Formosa were obtained through the Formosan Bank. Thus the transaction will not disturb domestic finance in any way.

It will be observed that Marquis

Katsura's explanation resolves itself into this, namely, that the Government contemplates an increased expenditure of 14 million yen annually on railways and riparian works, and that it looks to obtain this money from the Deposits Bureau, from exchequer bills and other sources independently of any issue of bonds.

In connection with the above, Mr. Tsukada, chief of the National Debts Bureau in that Department of Finance, has had to resign, and the duties of his post have been temporarily taken over by Mr. Wakatsuki, the Vice-Minister. We gather that Mr. Tsukada was the source whence the newspapers derived their information in the first instance, but it would seem that he was enunciating his own opinion, not formulating the views of the Cabinet.

The majority of the leading newspapers take the line that the resources of the Deposits Bureau are a limited quantity, and that the Government's repeated recourse to them must soon exceed the total available. Some critics ascribe to the Government an idea that the deposits in the Postal Savings Banks, which may be said to constitute the whole of the funds at the disposal of the Deposits Bureau, will increase at the rate of 30 or 40 million yen annually. But that is regarded as an over-optimistic estimate. At any rate the deposits in the Postal Savings Banks are not public property, and they must be represented by some solid asset. The publicists taking this view claim that the Treasury is throwing dust in the eyes of the nation. A notable fact is that several journals which were recently crying out for a liberal policy in the matter of railway facilities and riparian works are now so obsessed by the prospect of a further issue of bonds that they ignore altogether the purpose to which the proceeds are to be applied.

Baron Takahashi Korekiyo, President of the Specie Bank, is quoted by the Fiji Shimpō as pointing out that the non-issue of any additional bonds is certainly Japan's national policy at present, but this does not cover the question of railways, inasmuch as the law distinctly provides that these facilities shall be provided by recourse to bonds. Nothing has to be considered except expediency of time for making an issue, and to that extent the Government's choice may be trusted.

Mr. Soyeda, speaking through the columns of the same journal, dismisses the story as a mere phantom, and says that when it assumes solid dimensions there will be time enough to hack it.

Mr. Ikeda points out that, after all, there is question of only 14 million yen per annum, a sum too small to warrant all this outcry.

CHOSEN.

It appears that the calm which has brooded over the political world in Seoul since annexation became an accomplished fact, is now likely to be disturbed. The factor of disturbance is to be a resuscitated form of the journal started by the late Mr. Bethell namely the Dai-han Mai-il Shimpō. The former Korean editor of this sheet, Mr. Yang, is said to have associated himself with a French citizen, whose name appears to be M. de Remlie, and these two journalists are said to hold that although they have passed under Japanese jurisdiction by the abolition of the extraterritorial system, they are not bound to obey the injunctions of the Governor-General. This is an ingenious plea, but how it can possibly be advanced by a native of Chosen we do not understand, and it is more than doubtful whether the French Government would support one of its citizens in such a contention. Moreover we fail to see the use of attempting to make this subtle distinction. Messrs. Yang and de Remlie might go on gaily with their journalistic work, without troubling themselves about official interference and being fully assured that they will enjoy all wholesome freedom of criticism. The former Daihan Mai-il Shimpō, though an insignificant sheet in many respects, wrought incalculable mischief in its day, and no thoughtful person can pretend to acquit it of having been indirectly responsible for much needless suffering and even bloodshed. No friend of Korea can desire to see a replica of such a journal.

Messrs. Kim & Liu, leaders of the Korean insurgents, who were arrested a few days ago at Chefoo, have been safely carried to Seoul and handed over to the judicial officials there. It is said that two other men with a similar record are in hiding at Kiaochow and Tsintau, but whether it will be possible to lay hands on them seems to be considered doubtful. Of course the coöperation of the German Authorities may be counted on, but the extraterritorial system has always been notorious for furnishing asylums to law breakers.

One hears very conflicting accounts of the agricultural opportunities that Korea presents to Japanese immigrants. Some people claim that the Korean farmer has nothing to learn from his Japanese contemporary, while others allege the opposite. The directors of the Toyo Takushoku Kaisha are evidently of the opinion that an opening for the employment of Japanese skilled labour exists in this field, for they are devoting considerable attention to it. Lieut.-General Baron Usagawa, the head of the Company, has just returned to Tokyo and is quoted by the Shogyō Shimpō as saying that the first stage of the policy laid down by Prince Ito may now be said to have been accomplished. The Korean farmer has laid aside his distrust of his Japanese confrère and is willing to work side by side with him. The Company has 50,000 acres of land which it values at 65,000 yen, and it is now engaged in making arrangements for the immigration of Japanese agriculturists who will carry on farming operations side by side with the Koreans. The conditions of the land in question do not lend themselves to agriculture on a large scale such as is practised in Hokkaido. Settlers must be content to operate comparatively small holdings, but there is not the slightest reason to apprehend that diligence and patience will not be amply rewarded.

It has already been stated in these columns that Prince Li-O Junior intends to pay a visit to Japan in the spring of next year. The latest news, however, is that among the Yangpan and other publicists an idea is gaining ground that to postpone the visit for so many months will engender doubts in the mind of the Korean nation and that it will be wiser for his Imperial Highness to proceed to Japan in time to attend next new year's Levee.

A very strange memorial has been presented at the office of the Governor-General in Seoul by a certain Mr. Cho in combination with a number of fellow-thinkers. The memorialists urge that the capital of the Japanese Empire should be transferred to Hongju. This town is the capital of the province of Chungchang and is distinguished as a place where the rebellion broke out in 1907. It would have been interesting to learn the reasons advanced for this strange proposal, but the telegraph is silent on that head, though it adds that Mr. Cho and his fellow-thinkers seem to be entirely convinced by their own logic.

The Kokumin Shimbun has a long telegram from Seoul giving a very rosy description of the state of affairs in the Peninsula. It sets out by saying that the various allowances, pensions and gratuities granted by the Japanese Authorities to all classes in Korea have produced a most excellent effect, and that everywhere the sentiment towards this country is eminently friendly. This feeling has been enhanced by an exceptionally good harvest. Southern Korea has produced cereals 20 per cent. in excess of the average, and this fact contributes not a little to the people's satisfaction. The insurgents have practically disappeared, and the only disturbers of the peace are the so-called incendiary bandits, whose habit is to set fire to the people's dwellings. These miscreants used to be screened by the populace who feared the ultimate consequences of informing against them—a fear inspired by incompetence on the part of the police. But the Japanese police and gendarmes being regarded in a very different light, information is readily given to them and the apprehension of the bandits is correspondingly facilitated. Numerous associations have been formed throughout the Peninsula for the purpose of studying the Japanese language, and there is a palpable increase in the number of Japanese immigrants. Thus the Japanese population of Seoul at the close of October aggregated 34,792, being a growth of 324 as compared with the close of September. This does not include the people dwelling in the suburbs. If they were added, the increase would probably total 3,000. The paragraph from which we quote concludes by saying that the members of the Il Ching hoi are settling down earnestly to the agricultural work which has taken the place of their political propaganda.

AMERICAN POLITICS.

Naturally the political landslide which is taking place in the United States and which threatens to bury many ambitions and many reputations excites great interest in Japan. Conflicting accounts are published as to the relative numbers of the two parties in the House of Representatives. One telegram says that the Republican members have fallen from 217 to 177 and that the Democratic have risen from 174 to 212; and another account alleges that the Republican representation has dwindled from 225 to 172, and the Democratic has swelled from 169 to 223. All are agreed, however, that a great Democratic victory has been achieved and its consequences are eagerly discussed. It is thought that all the nations in the world are keenly interested. For if the seats of power in Washington come to have Democratic occupiers, the protection policy of the country will be modified with resulting reductions of import duties, and the Imperialistic policy with its corollary of inflated armaments, which constitutes the sign-board of the present Cabinet, will undergo radical alteration.

It appears to be thought, too, that the main cause of the Republican debacle is the tariff, and the secondary cause is Mr. Roosevelt's aggressiveness. As to the latter point the ex-President's proceedings have been designated in very frank terms. Mr. Roosevelt has been charged with "brutality," "shocking bad taste," and "lack of breeding." One newspaper describes him as a peripatetic politician who is playing at once a tricky and pusillanimous game. But we have to observe that in wealth of adjectives American journals know no peers.

Count Okuma is quoted as saying that, during their fourteen years of uninterrupted power, the Republicans have gradually drifted into abuses, the most notorious of which is their departure from the Monroe doctrine. Ex-President Roosevelt has hitherto been head and front of this movement. He is the great representative of American Imperialism and, if he were elected a third time, it cannot be doubted that the policy of over-sea expansion, of big armaments, and of the mastery of the Pacific would become the motto of his Government. The Democrats, on the contrary, will be opposed to any such policy. Nevertheless there is no game without a loss, as the proverb puts it. Decentralisation in domestic institutions, will follow, and decentralisation in this case means that the States will have increased competence to indulge in an anti-Japanese policy wherever their interests dictate such a course. In a word an amicable settlement of the racial problem in the United States will become more distant than ever.

THE PENSHIHU COAL MINE.

We find an interesting note upon this subject in the columns of the Fuji Shimpō. Our contemporary sets out by observing that the Penshihu Mine enterprise was undertaken by the Okura Company without any extraneous assistance whatever. Almost immediately after the inception of the work the Chinese preferred official and private claims, and the Okura Company agreed last June to regard the enterprise as a joint undertaking each side putting up one million yen as working capital. The Okura Company had already sunk more than its full share, and nothing remained therefore except that the Chinese should put their hands in their pockets and produce the stipulated amount. There then commenced, however, a series of interminable delays. The Chinese began by discovering that their superintendent, Mr. Chang, was not competent to discharge the duties of his post. They therefore substituted Mr. Li. All this entailed a considerable loss of time. Thereafter the Chinese pretexted the necessity of close investigation, and to all urging from the Japanese side the constant answer was that inquiries had not yet been fully completed. The fact is that now, after nearly six months delay, it becomes quite evident that the Chinese are not in possession of the capital needed. Apparently they are hoping to obtain a slice of the ten million taels which rumour assigns as Manchuria's portion of the big loan now under negotiation. But by this time the patience of the Okura Company must be well nigh exhausted,

CHINA.

The Viceroy at Canton is said to have issued further regulations for restricting the use of opium. Nothing definite is stated as to the terms of these regulations and it would almost appear that the telegrams had become confusingly mixed, for in the same context we find an item that the Viceroy of the Two Kiung, who of course has nothing whatever to do with the Viceroy of the Two Kwang, has limited the quantity of opium imported at Shanghai to 300 chests annually, and has further ordered that this quantity shall be reduced by 30 per cent. annually. British merchants are said to have entered a strong protest against this arbitrarily drastic action.

We gather from a somewhat ambiguous telegram published by the Mainichi Dempo that the Chinese policy of expelling all Korean residents from conventionally unopened regions has been extended to the Liaotung Peninsula. An order in that sense is said to have been recently conveyed to a number of Koreans settled in the neighbourhood of Kinchow, but owing to a protest on the part of the Japanese Consul the order has not yet been enforced. This question assumes a graver aspect the more it is examined. There can be no doubt, we presume, about China's right to restrict foreign residence to the treaty-port zones, but on the other hand to assert this right at the expense of people who have enjoyed the privilege uninterruptedly for half a century is a distinctly retrogressive policy and not consistent with the spirit of the age.

The Mainichi Dempo publishes a disquieting telegram from Mukden. It sets out by saying that a satisfactory settlement of the Fushun-colliery question between China and Japan is now regarded with much doubt and that the negotiations have been postponed indefinitely. Meanwhile some American projectors have made their appearance in the immediate vicinity, at a place called Hsintung, and have employed a number of Chinese workmen for the purpose of sinking an experimental shaft. This place is precisely on the disputed boundary, and pending a settlement of the dispute the Chinese Authorities are pledged not to sanction any boring. But—and it is here that the telegram becomes disquieting—American citizens have incited the Chinese to take this step as part of a programme mapped out for themselves by German subjects and United States citizens with the object of embroiling China and Japan, so as to provide troubled waters for their own fishing operations. It is not pleasant to read or to reproduce such comments, but since they evidently represent a belief prevailing in some quarters, it is as well that they should be recognised.

After all that has been said and telegraphed, the settlement of the Taoel Affair does not appear to be yet really in sight. The Chinese Authorities are showing themselves obdurate towards the Japanese demand for punishment of the offending officials, and until the demand is complied with, the Japanese are understood to be determined that the police force posted by them at Taoel shall not be withdrawn.

It is a singular fact that up to this moment of writing (Monday morning) no further intelligence has been received about the recently reported insurrection in Kwangtung province. The original telegram, received in official circles in Tokyo, spoke of the emeute as having considerable dimensions, mentioned the destruction of a church as one of the incidents, and alluded to the despatch of a considerable force of troops. Since then, however, there has been no further news of any kind. Something may come to hand before we go to press, but it is difficult to reconcile this silence with an affair of such magnitude as the first account suggested.
